perennial, and has every chance of being perpetual. That art may well be called divine which gave existence to such a work. German critics have often pointed to the English nation as setting an example without example, in their constant and always increasing veneration for Handel, who was, nevertheless, a German—Saxon born. In England they say, and say truly, that not only Handel's best operas and his best oratorios were composed, but that in England the best parts, at least, of his best oratorios are very generally known, while some of them are no less familiar than the noblest and most poetical of Shakspeare's plays. We should, at the same time, remember that it was the religious feeling of a large portion of the English community to which Handel so successfully appealed when, after abandoning opera, he gave himself up almost exclusively to the composition of oratorio. That not only The Messiah and Israel in Egypt—the oratorio of the Gospel and the oratorio of the Bible, the oratorio of the New Testament and of the Old—should have been produced, but so many sacred musical dramas founded upon prominent characters and incidents in Holy Writ should have been given successively and successfully to England, is a testimony to that firm and ardent faith in revealed religion which, despite uncontrolled sectarianism, distinguishes the English before all other nations. Handel has spoken to our common sentiment of religion, just as Shakspeare has spoken to our common feelings of humanity; and Handel enjoys this advantage—that, having spoken in a language which is universal, what he has said can be made intelligible to the whole Christian world without translation. It is right, therefore, that he should be fêted by the people to whom he directly and repeatedly addressed himself, and by whom he was always honoured, though occasionally misunderstood, amid the struggles of a life which terminated as prosperously as it had been conducted with manful vigour and unswerving integrity through a sea of troubles. It is a consolation for us to know that, notwithstanding the shifting vicissitudes of fortune, Handel lived long enough and died rich enough to bequeath to the Royal Society of Musicians a legacy of £1,000. His Messiah has brought tens of thousands upon tens of thousands to charity after charity among us, and though very considerably more than a century and a quarter old, will be heard with the decorous attention and enthusiastic delight on Monday next, the first day of the Festival, which has never yet failed to accompany even a moderately efficient revelation of its wonderful beauties.

MDLLE TIETJENS has advanced so far towards convalescence that she has been able to take carriage drives, and, on Thursday, left London for her country residence at Worthing.

JOACHIM.

One of the chief attractions promised for the recent Musical Festival at Liège was the appearance of the King of Violinists. But the great artist's admirers were doomed to bitter disappointment. He never came, and his place was taken by Signor Sivori. The following letter, written in French, explains his absence. It is addressed to M. Radoux, the director of the Liège Conservatory:—

"Cher Monsieur Radoux,—C'est avec des regrets profonds que je me vois forcé, par une maladie, de rester à Berlin, et de manquer à mon poste. Ma convalescence est très-lente, et je suis loin de pouvoir jouer, même chez moi, pendant plus de quelques minutes.

"Les jours dont je croyais pouvoir me faire fête en vous montrant toute ma sympathie pour l'événement artistique à Liège et en tâchant en quelque sorte de vous aider par mon concours, vont donc couler très-tristement pour votre confrère; mais je voulais au moins ne pas être à l'écart sans vous envoyer mes vœux sincères pour la réussite de la belle fête, et sans vous dire que mes pensées seront avec vous, et avec votre institut, auquel je souhaite de tout mon cœur un avenir plein de prospérité comme par le passé, et digne de sa grande renommée.

"Veuillez bien agréer, cher monsieur et confrère, l'assurance de ma plus parfaite considération, et me croire votre bien dévoué

"JOSEPH JOACHIM."

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE average annual value of the musical instruments made in Paris during the last six years has been twenty-three million francs, divided among three hundred and sixty makers, employing no fewer than five thousand workmen. Paris turns out every year one million three hundred and twenty thousand francs' worth of accordions. Pianos figure for eleven million four hundred thousand francs; organs, for nearly five millions and a half; wind, wood, and metal instruments, for nearly four millions; but bowed instruments, for less than half a million.

THE Museum of Musical Instruments at the Paris Conservatory has been enriched lately by various additions. Among these may be mentioned an ivory flute of the Louis XVI. type, ornamented with exquisite engraving and carving (from the Rossini collection); a fine Italian viola, by Grancino, superb varnish—a very rare example; a basse de flûte à bec (sixteenth century), from the Coussemaker collection, a very rare and important specimen for the reconstruction of basses de flûte à bec in the form of small columns; and, lastly, an ivory clarinet with two keys, primitive type, as invented by Denner of Leipzig in 1700 (the third key was not added before 1760); another rare specimen.

THE following will be the scale of remuneration for the leading artists at the Grand Opera, Paris, in a hundred years from the present time: a first tenor, 2,000,000 francs; a first basso, 1,400,000; a prima donna, 1,900,000; and a première danseuse, 1,600,000. This is not a chance guess. The figures have been calculated by M. Albert Lasalle according to the strict rules of Cocker. In 1777, a first tenor cost only 10,000 francs, and the other members of the company were paid in proportion. From 1777 to 1877 the salaries have increased twenty-fold. If, therefore, the salaries continue to increase at the same rate, M. Lasalle's figures for 1977 are correct. The question is: Will the salaries continue to exhibit this upward tendency? We must wait a century for an answer.

CONCERT.

THE fourteenth soirée of the Schubert Society, on Wednesday, the 13th inst., was of more than usual interest. The members who made their first appearance were Mdle Camponi, Mdme Thea Sandrini, Mdle Valadares, Mdme St Martino, and Herr Constantin von Kotzebue, vocalists; Miss Aloof and Herr Max Schrober, instrumentalists. Herr Constantin von Kotzebue, who possesses an agreeable baritone voice, gave two songs by Schumann, and created a real impression in a romance by Glinka (violinello obligato, Herr Schubert). Mdle Camponi introduced a "Serenata" (Braga) and a song of Buchner's. Miss Aloof gave two of Mendelssohn's sketches, and Herr Schrober a "Romance" by Wilhelmj. Herr Schubert played a new composition by Jensen ("Dreaming"), which he was called upon to repeat. The other members were Mdme Schubert, Herr Frank, Mdle Pachette, Signor Monbelli (vocalists), and Miss Ogden and Miss Ottley (piano-forte). The fifty-sixth concert of the society (for Herr Schubert's benefit) is announced for Thursday, the 5th July, in Langham Hall. The attendance, it is to be hoped, may be such as to reward the director for his zealous efforts on behalf of the society.

(TRANSLATION.)

"My dear M. Radoux,—It is with profound regret that I find myself compelled by illness to remain at Berlin, absent from my post. My convalescence goes on very slowly, and I cannot so much as play, even at home, more than a few minutes.

"The days which I was pleased to think I might spend in exhibiting to you all my sympathy for the artistic event at Liège, and in endeavouring to assist you to a certain extent by my co-operation, will be passed very sadly by your colleague; but I resolved not to be absent without at least sending you my sincere good wishes for the success of your interesting festival, and without saying that my thoughts will be with you and your institution, for which I desire with all my heart a future as full of prosperity as the past, and as worthy of its high reputation. I remain, &c."

MISS EMMA BARNETT's first pianoforte recital took place on Wednesday afternoon, June 13th, in St George's Hall. The programme is worth citing:—

Suite de Pièces, in F minor (G. F. Händel); Prelude and Fugue, in C sharp major (J. S. Bach); Characteristic Pieces, Nos. 1 and 4 (Mendelssohn); Impromptu, in G (Schubert); Gavotte, in G minor (J. F. Barnett); Sonata, in D major, No. 3, Op. 10 (Beethoven); Rondo, in E flat (Weber); Blumenstück (Schumann); Three Impromptus (J. F. Barnett), first time; Valse, in E minor (posthumous), Nocturne, in E flat, and Scherzo, in B flat minor (Chopin).

Miss Barnett, whose extraordinary improvement was generally remarked, played the works above enumerated like a thorough artist. She was compelled to repeat two of her brother's compositions—the Gavotte and the second of the Impromptus—which display both ingenuity and charm. After each group of pieces the intelligent young pianist was called back to the platform to receive well merited applause. Miss Jessie Jones and Mr Bernard Lane varied the programme with songs from Beethoven and Schumann, besides one of Mendelssohn's chamber-duets, well accompanied on the piano by Mr George F. Gear.

MR GANZ' matinée musicale was given on June 19th at Dudley House. One of its especial features was Brahms' Liedeslieder Waltzes, executed instrumentally by Mlle Anna Mehlig and Mr Ganz, and vocally by Mlle Loewe, Miss Helena Arnim, Messrs Shakespeare and von Boehme. These waltzes, full of charm and variety (first introduced in this country by Mr Arthur Chappell at the Monday Popular Concerts), were efficiently presented, a word of special praise being due to Mr Shakespeare for the delivery of his solo, "Nicht wandle." Mesdames Sherrington and Patey, Messrs Edward Lloyd and Santley were the other vocalists, each sustaining his well earned reputation, and each winning applause and a re-call. Mr Santley, in Sullivan's "Thou'rt passing hence, my brother," sang with true expression, and the effect was in proportion. Herr Wilhelm, in Gounod's "Meditation" and his own paraphrase from Die Meistersinger, displayed his usual fine tone, faultless mechanism, and elegance of phrasing. Mr Ganz, in a rêverie, "Vision du Passé," his grand galop, "Allons vite," and Schumann's "Kinderscenen," charmed by the vigour and finish of his style. He was also heard to advantage, with Herr Wilhelm, in a very effective fantasiestück, composed by the latter, and, with Signor Pezze (violinello), in a duet by Schumann. Balfe's lively and melodious trio, recently introduced at the Monday Popular Concerts, and so favourably commented on at the time, brought the entertainment to a close. This was performed with admirable effect by Mr Ganz, M. Paul Viardot, and Signor Pezze. Sir J. Benedict, M.M. Vera, Cowen, Parker, and Ganz were the accompanists. The picture gallery was crowded by a fashionable audience. F. P.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—Miss Kate Santley's Opera Bouffe Company is attracting large audiences to the Alexandra Theatre. The fair entrepreneur has completely won the public by her clever impersonation of Eurydice, in Offenbach's Orphée aux Enfers. The orchestra and chorus, under the able direction of Mr W. F. Glover, is remarkably good, and the mise-en-scène excellent. The company are to appear in Hull and Leeds during the ensuing fortnight.

NORWICH.—The concert lately given in St Andrew's Hall, by the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Union, was well attended. The principal vocalists were Miss Catherine Penna and Mr H. Minns. Miss Penna made her first acquaintance with a Norwich audience, and, judging from the applause she obtained—says a local journal—it will not be her last. The jewel song from Faust and the Scotch air, "O Nanny wilt thou gang wi me," tested her powers from two different points of view, and with the like favourable result. Mr Manns' contributions were Schubert's "Angel of Beauty," and a romanza by Robandi. He also joined Miss Penna in Mendelssohn's "Zuleika and Hassan." The overture to Joseph (Mehul), and Gade's cantata for voice and orchestra, Spring's Message, were included in the programme. In the first part the choir gave Mendelssohn's part songs, "Farewell to the forest" and "The open air," both well; in the second part Mendelssohn's "Early Spring," Handel's hunting chorus, "Oh, how great the glory," and the choral part of Beethoven's fantasia, the pianoforte solo part in which was admirably played by Mr Arthur E. Bunnnett. Mr W. Tuddenham and Mr A. E. Bunnnett played in masterly style the adagio and finale from one of Mayrader's concertante duets for violin and pianoforte; and a noteworthy performance was Schulhoff's "Grand valse brillante," by Miss F. M. Morse. Had encores been conceded, the concert would not have terminated until midnight. Dr Bunnnett conducted.

ORGAN RECITAL.

On Wednesday, June 13th, Mr W. T. Best gave his last recital but one on the great organ, The Hall, Primrose Hill Road. The programme was as follows:—

Organ Sonata (No. 2, C minor), Mendelssohn; Andantino (E major), Schubert; Prelude and Fugue (A minor), Bach; Fantasia de Concert sur, "O Sanctissimo," F. Lux; Funeral March, W. T. Best; Organ Concerto (C minor), Handel; Passacaille (B minor), Couperin; Overture founded on the Austrian Hymn, C. Haslinger.

The audience, one of the largest of the series, was very enthusiastic, recalling the "virtuoso" repeatedly. The applause after the Prelude and Fugue (Bach) must have assured Mr Best that his efforts were duly appreciated. Rarely, if ever, has this grand and beautiful work been better rendered. The great difficulties, both for hands and feet, were overcome with the utmost ease, the long pedal passage at the end of the fugue being especially a marvel of skill. But it is not only of the execution of which we wish to speak, but of the deep musical feeling which Mr Best infused into it. It would be needless to describe the manner in which the executant gave the several well-known items of the programme. His highly impressive and majestic Funeral March met with well-deserved favour. The ingenious variations on the hymn-tune, by F. Lux, served admirably to show off the resources of the organ and Mr Best's mastery over this style of organ music. A spirited overture, founded on the Austrian Hymn, by Haslinger, brought the recital to a brilliant conclusion. F. L.

LUDWIG RITTER VON KÖCHEL.

The Baron Von Köchel, Imperial and Royal Austrian Councillor, a gentleman highly esteemed far and wide, expired at Vienna, on the 3rd inst., in the 78th year of his age. He was at one time tutor to the sons of the Arch-Duke Karl, the victor at Aspern. Since 1842, when the education of his pupils was concluded, he occupied himself indefatigably with scientific studies and labours, chiefly in the domain of natural philosophy and music. He was the author of the Chronological Thematic Index of Mozart's Compositions, a work celebrated in musical circles, as well as of many writings on music and musical matters in Austria. Among these we may especially mention an exhaustive biography of J. J. Fux, Chapel-Master at the Austrian Court from 1698 to 1740. During the latter years of his life his exertions and enthusiastic admiration were devoted principally to the memory and compositions of Mozart. The entire collection of Mozart's works was undertaken by Messrs Breitkopf and Härtel chiefly at Dr Köchel's suggestion, and rendered possible by considerable sacrifices on his part. The funeral service was solemnised on the 5th inst., at 2 o'clock p.m., at the Church of St Augustin, Vienna. It was attended by the Arch-Dukes Albrecht, Wilhelm, Rainer, and many artistic celebrities. At 10 a.m., on the 8th inst., there was a Mass for the dead, when Mozart's Requiem was executed, the artists being Mad. Dustmann, Mlle Tremel, Herren Walter and Mayrhofer, supported by the band from the Imperial Operahouse.—Berliner Echo.

WHEN TO APPLAUD.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—To those lovers of music with scanty means who ascend to the tropical regions of Covent Garden amphitheatre it is a frequent source of annoyance to hear individuals applauding with more enthusiasm than discretion at inopportune times, generally immediately after the last note of anything sung that pleases them, thus drowning the finishing bars to be played by the orchestra, and completely marring the symmetry of the piece. Last night, at the finale of the first act of Tannhäuser, the "gods," as usual, began to applaud before the singing had ceased, and a little sensation was created by a gentleman resenting their bad taste (though in a somewhat noisy manner) by shouting ORDER!!! in stentorian tones, and afterwards (when the band had finished) calling out Now!!! setting the example by then clapping vigorously. Cannot Mr Gye set up a signal post of some kind to teach people when to be quiet and when to give vent to their enthusiasm?—Yours truly, C. R. E.

[Mr Gye will, doubtless, attend to this suggestion without an instant's loss of time.—D. P.]

BALFE'S MAZEPPA.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Having rehearsed for our College concert the chorus parts of this cantata, first produced in Ireland by our University Choral Society, January, 1865, I at first sought to hire the orchestral parts from Messrs Cramer, and ultimately from Messrs Hutchings & Romer, who appear to have purchased the copyright of the work. To my dismay, however, I received replies from Messrs Cramer, from Messrs Hutchings & Romer, and from Mr Alfred Mapleson, copyist and orchestral agent, that the score and parts were destroyed (!)—it does not appear whether through accident or design. This seems to be somewhat of a musical calamity, for Mazeppa is a work full of melody in both airs and choruses. Mme Balfe has, indeed, done me the honour to suggest that I should re-instrument the work of my distinguished fellow-countryman; but I should be sorry to do so if it were possible to procure the original scoring. In the hope of doing so, I venture to make known this matter through the widely read columns of the Musical World. Does any one in London know where a set of the orchestral parts of Balfe's Mazeppa can be found?

R. P. STEWART.

P.S.—I was able, by extraordinary exertions, to supply an orchestration for the final scenes—the mad gallop of the horse and the exulting chorus of the Cossacks who accept Mazeppa as their chief. The remainder of the work was necessarily accompanied upon a pianoforte, à quatre mains.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT'S CONCERT.

A crowded audience attended this concert in the Floral Hall on Monday afternoon, moved partly by attractions made familiar under the same roof through the agency of Mr Gye's entertainments, partly by certain special features, and partly—in a great measure, we may venture to say—by a desire to give practical evidence of esteem for a veteran master whose great talents are unquestioned, and whose deserts are large. In so far as the proceedings merely reproduced an opera concert, there is small need to dwell upon them. The usual artists—that is to say, all the leading members of Mr Gye's company—appeared, and sang more or less familiar airs. Among them, and the most successful, were Mme Patti, Mdle Albani, Mdle Thalberg, Mdle Marimon, Signor Nicolini, M. Capoul, M. Maurel, and Signor Cotogni. These were received with great favour, while, judging by applause and encores, their selections met the taste of the audience. With regard to the more special features, mention should first be made of those works in the programme illustrative of Sir J. Benedict as a composer, and especially of those taken from his St Cecilia. Mme Scacchi's singing of the chaste and devotional contralto prayer from this cantata gave, like the music itself, much pleasure; while the beautiful finale, as rendered by Mdle Albani, seemed more than ever worthy of the homage it has always commanded. In addition to these truly representative excerpts, the concert-giver's aria, "Figlia d'Erina" (M. Capoul), and his song, "The bird that came in spring" (Mme Adelina Patti), served to remind the audience that we have still amongst us a master over varied forms of his art. Save that he acted as one of the accompanists, Sir J. Benedict took but a modest share in what was done, his services being limited to a performance, jointly with Mr Charles Hallé, of Moscheles' well-known duet for two pianofortes, "Hommage à Handel." How he was received may be imagined, and it is but a trite reflection upon his welcome to say that year by year this concert shows how a faithful performance of duty by a man really competent to its discharge commands, in the long run, universal respect. It should be mentioned that a violin solo, by Mme Norma-Néruda, and the services of Mr John Thomas (harp), and Mr Radcliff (flute), were much appreciated.—Daily Telegraph.

BARCELONA.—Verdi's Requiem has been given at the Liceo.BRUNSWICK.—Minnie Hauk and Marianne Brandt have appeared at the Ducal Theatre as Elsa and Ortrud, in Lohengrin.

To F. C. Burnand, Esq.

SIR,—There is a narrow gauge in the Pennsylvania mining districts which runs around in this mountainous country with an abandon truly refreshing, skips over hills and down precipices, dodges around big stumps, straddles deep gorges on hoop-pole stilts that twist and bend beneath its tread and threaten to send the traveller 300 feet into eternal smash every moment, hangs by one foot on the side of the mountain's stone walls, bends around curves like a contortionist, runs on the wheels of one side, bumps the cars like a chop sea in the English Channel, was completed in January, cost 40,000 dollars, cleared itself in three months, charges one dollar for the trip, and is crowded with business.—Yours truly,

THEODORE QUITE (M.D.).

P.S.—Somebody was curious to follow a pound of silk from spinning until it became a lady's dress. I preferred following it after.—T. Q.

LIEGE.

(From a Correspondent.)

The Festival of the 3rd and 4th inst., to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the Conservatory, went off brilliantly, a result to which the presence of the Royal Family, of numerous official personages, and of a great multitude of visitors, as well as all kinds of exhibitions, lectures, competitions, and speeches contributed not a little. The direction of the Festival was, as a matter of course, confided to M. Theodore Radoux, present head of the Conservatory, who conducted with great skill his 950 instrumentalists and singers. The programme of the first day comprised: Beethoven's Symphony in C minor; Mendelssohn's Elijah, very well executed (the vocal solos being taken by Mad. Fursch-Madier, Mdle Keller, MM. Sylva and Dauphin); a "Hymne à la Patrie," by M. Rongé, and a dramatic cantata, Cain, by M. Radoux, two meritorious works. In the programme for the second day we may mention a fragment from M. Pierre Benoit's Escut; a fragment from Grétry's Richard Cœur de Lion; an instrumental interlude by Daussoigne-Méhul, and two choruses by Soubre—two gentlemen who preceded M. Radoux as directors of the Conservatory; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, played by Sivori (in place of Beethoven's, for which Joachim had been announced); airs from Fidelio, Oberon, and Stratonice, sung by Mad. Fursch-Madier and M. Sylva; and, lastly, a chorus by M. Gevaert, "Les Emigrants Irlandais," by the Choral Society, under the direction of M. Toussaint Radoux.

THE MANIAC MAIDEN'S SONG.*

I.

Gently flow, ye swelling billows,
O'er my Willie's ocean bed,
Soft the azure wave that pillows
On its breast my lover's head!
May syrens' song
His sleep prolong,
His bridal couch the sea nymphs spread!
Softly breathe ye sighing gales,
Lightly o'er his death-bed sweep.
Hark! the mermaids' song be-wails;
See around the Naiads weep;
They've made the grave
In ocean's cave,
And there I'll to his bosom creep.

II.

And see, my Willie spreads his arms,
And cries, "My Edna, haste thee
here; [alarms;
Here, sweet, shall cease fond love's
Can Edna aught with Willie fear?
Together blest
We'll sweetly rest,
Oh haste my bride, my Edna dear!"
With 'wildered gaze and throbbing breast
She sigh'd—to thee, my love, I go;
Then eager to the wild cliff prest,
And plung'd into the flood below.
By Willie's side
Now sleeps his bride,
Releas'd from every earthly woe.

BOLOGNA.—E. Cavazza's opera, Emma, has been produced. The singers were Pozzi-Branzanti, Mr Byron, and Sig. Valle.

MDLLE ROSAVELLA.

(From "Mayfair.")

"Mdle Rosavella, the other vocalist, appeared like an inmate of Oberon's realm. Everything about her is light and graceful; her voice has all the charm of the brightest soprano timbre, and the florid passages in Chopin's mazurka, 'L'Oiselet,' she gave with an easy, not to say airy, grace for which the Italian term leggiadria is the only appropriate equivalent. Taubert's song, 'In der Fremde,' a somewhat weak imitation of the Volkstied, gained depth of sentiment by her sympathetic rendering, and in her singing of Mozart's 'Deh vieni,' from Figaro, dramatic power of no common order became observable. Mdle Rosavella bids fair to rank amongst the most valuable acquisitions which the Italian stage owes to America."

WAIFS.

We regret to hear that Mad. Joachim, wife of the celebrated violinist, has been dangerously ill; and, on the other hand, we are glad to know that she is in a fair state of recovery.

Mdle Adèle Granzow, the popular danseuse, has just died at Berlin.

Sig. Monplaisir, the "choreographer," died recently at Monte Siro, near Milan.

Another small theatre has been opened in the Rue des Martyrs, Paris, as the "Athenæum."

Herr Friedrich Kiel has been created honorary member of the Società del Quartetto corale at Milan.

One of the successes at the late Hanover Festival, was Hector Berlioz' "Symphonie fantastique," conducted by Liszt.

La Reine de Chypre is in rehearsal at the Grand Opera, to be produced in July, followed by L'Africaine and La Muette.

Mr. Ricardo Linter's recital of Pianoforte music is announced for to-day, at Cheltenham. Miss Muncey is to be the vocalist.

Miss Hatte Schell, a young American, pupil of Mdme Marchesi will appear in September at the Royal Operahouse, Vienna.

Dr Hans von Bülow has left Bex in Switzerland, for Creuznach, to drink the waters there. His state of health is far from satisfactory.

The Paris Opéra-Comique will re-open on the 1st September with La Dame Blanche, the part of the hero being sustained by M. Engel.

Some musical performances by eminent artists were to be given at Cassel, between the 22nd and 24th inst., in aid of the Spohr Monument.

Le Partisan, comic opera by Count d'Osmond, will be produced next season at the Théâtre-Lyrique, after M. Kowalski's Gilles de Bretagne.

Mr. Marshall Hall Bell has returned to London after an absence of two years, in Algiers and elsewhere, quite recovered, it is hoped, from his long illness.

Herr Franz Kroll, pianist and composer, known for his edition of Bach's Wohltemperirtes Clavier, died recently, at Berlin, aged 57. He was one of the pupils of Liszt.

Mdle Krauss, who made her last appearance at the Grand Opera in Der Freischütz, has left for Vienna, to study with Mdme Marchesi the character of Selika in L'Africaine.

Professor Glover's pianoforte concerto, in A, played a few seasons ago by the composer at the Hanover Square rooms, is shortly to be published by Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co.

Verdi has agreed to the production of Aida at the Grand Opera, Paris. He has hitherto refused consent, on account of his dissatisfaction with the band when Don Carlos was brought out.

Miss Lillie Albrecht was the pianist at the afternoon concert in the Alexandra Palace on Monday. Miss Albrecht played Chopin's Grande Polonaise in E flat and Thalberg's "Mosé in Egitto."

Mademoiselle de Marseille is the title of the three-act libretto furnished by MM. Cormon, Alfred Blau, and Louis de Grammont, to M. Joncières, who has been commissioned by M. Carvalho to set it to music.

M. Edouard Alexandre, Hector Berlioz' executor, has presented M. Colonne with one of the conducting sticks used by the late composer. Accompanying the gift was a letter containing these lines: "The manner in which you interpret Berlioz' works, and the magisterial grandeur with which they are performed by your admirable orchestra, render you worthy to possess a memento of our beloved and regretted master."

SONNET.*

How sweet the calm that o'er the landscape steals,
When eve's soft tears begin to bathe the ground;
'Tis then the weary, jaded spirit feels
The rest kind nature sheds on all around.
The morning sun, with lusty glowing rays,
Invites to toil or pleasure all mankind;
And, oh, how few can hope to spend their days
Without a care to rasp or chafe the mind.
Sure then the hour when nature seeks repose,
And night's tall shadows everywhere abound,
Forget the world, in peace their eyelids close,
And shut the ear to every passing sound.
Then shall the mind, relieved from anxious care,
The toilworn body's gentle slumbers share. R. F. C.

MUNICH.—Kéler Béla, conductor of Gungl's orchestra at Munich, during the latter's absence, gave his first concert for the season in the popular garden establishment of the Englisches Café. The Munich papers state that his reception was most flattering.

BREMEN.—A new opera, Lancelot, by Herr Theodor Hentschel, will be produced in September at the Stadttheater, where the same composer's Schöne Melusine was first brought out.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 6d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

NEW PIANOFORTE PIECE BY MADAME OURY. "CONSOLATION."

Easy of execution, but melodious and effective. Price 4s.; Half-price Cash or Stamps.

"We wonder who has not, in the hour of trouble, more than once derived comfort from the sweet sounds such as David must have used to mollify the troubled spirit of Saul. What better name, then, to give a graceful strain of peaceful melody, such as must convey to the sorrowing heart feelings of rest and sympathy, than 'Consolation'?" Such is the title of a charming new pianoforte composition by that indefatigable and prolific writer, M^{me} Oury; prolific indeed, for the piece bears no lower an Opus number than 185. Its flow of peaceful melody, enhanced by the delicacy and variety of the accompaniment, and harmonised in the masterly style of an experienced writer, well fulfils the object of the title. In every sense of the word is 'Consolation' an admirable piece of music, and it must rank among M^{me} Oury's best efforts of the kind. As a morceau de salon it is of moderate difficulty, and of sufficient brilliancy to display the capacities of a proficient performer. The composition is dedicated to Mrs Graver-Browne, of Morley Hall, and published by Messrs Paterson & Sons, of Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c."

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

(RETROSPECT.)

June 22nd.

The grand preliminary rehearsal for the Handel Festival, to be held, as usual, in the Crystal Palace, is given to-day under the direction of Sir Michael Costa. At this rehearsal excerpts from all the programmes of the week will be gone through. Certain pieces from The Messiah, the oratorio for Monday; others from Israel in Egypt, the oratorio for Friday, the concluding day of the Festival; and, again, others from a miscellaneous selection announced for Wednesday, are to be tried. These last, for the numberless admirers of Handel who, knowing The Messiah and Israel by heart, may not be so infinitely conversant with his less generally promulgated works, offer exceptional attractions, and we are glad to see that no less than sixteen of the great Anglo-Saxon master's compositions, sacred and secular, have been laid under contribution. In fact, a more varied and attractive programme for the second day of the Festival could hardly have been drawn up. The Messiah and Israel are sure to bring their thousands—as they have never failed to do since 1857, when the first grand experimental performance was given as preamble to the centennial anniversary of Handel's death, two years later. Since 1859 the Festival has been celebrated triennially and with ever increasing interest. The reason for this enduring attraction is not far to seek. It has been truly said that "Handel, though a German by birth, is the greatest and most popular of English musicians." He did more for music in this country than any other man; and, as he is chiefly known among us by his settings of Biblical texts, his influence is by so much the wider among the vast numbers who, loving music on its own account, are all the more impressed by it when used for such purposes as in Handel's noblest inspirations. It has frequently been urged that to listen to The Messiah with the required attention is almost equivalent to an act of worship; and if this be true, the lengthened vitality of the work is easily explained. Into this argument, however, we need not again enter; it has been discussed incessantly; and, although 136 years have passed since The Messiah, composed in London, was first produced at Dublin, there seems very small likelihood of the theme being exhausted.

The general arrangements for the Festival, which begins on Monday afternoon, are on the usual magnificent scale. The chorus, made up from the London contingent of trained singers and amateurs and professionals for which we are indebted to the Sacred Harmonic Society, reinforced by singers from all our great towns where the constant practice of Handel is a habit, and the enormous band of instrumentalists will, as of old, fill up the entire space of the great Handel orchestra in the central transept, and be marshalled into order as usual by the experienced baton of Sir Michael Costa. The principal singers engaged are Madame Adelina Patti, Mdlle Albani, Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington, Edith Wynne, Suter, and Patey; Messrs Vernon Rigby, Edward Lloyd, and Cummings; Signor Foli, Herr Henschel, and Mr Santley. The absence of a name which has been gloriously connected with the Handel Festival since 1857—that of Mr Sims Reeves—will cause surprise in many quarters. As we have already hinted, the grand public rehearsal is held to-day; The Messiah will open the Festival on Monday; the miscellaneous selection is fixed for Wednesday; and the superb Israel in Egypt, on Friday, will, as by recognised precedent, form the climax.

June 23rd.

The public rehearsal yesterday was in all essentials like the public rehearsals on former occasions. There is absolutely nothing new to describe; but the fact may be reiterated that nowhere else, except at the Crystal Palace, could so imposing a spectacle be witnessed, nowhere else could such a vast number of music-lovers assemble within a prescribed space; and in no other than the Handel orchestra could such a host of singers and players be accommodated. The area of the great central transept and the galleries looking down upon it, thronged as usual, wore their accustomed bright and animated aspect, while outside the barriers were hundreds of eager listeners compelled to make the best of the circumstances under which they were placed. The orchestral arrangements were much the same as at the Festival of 1874—equal alike in numerical strength and efficiency. The directors of the Sacred Harmonic Society once more undertook the entire responsibilities; Mr Willing, their able organist, being again at his post, M. Sainton, their leading violin, at his, and, it need scarcely be added, Sir Michael Costa, their conductor, at his. The rehearsal, which began at noon, lasted about six hours, including the necessary interval allowed for refreshment between the first and second parts—enough music, all from one pen, it might be imagined, for three separate days. But amateurs, who come to this preliminary exhibition, which after all is no rehearsal, but rather a condensation of many of the leading features in the performances to follow, come chiefly for the purpose of getting as much as they possibly can out of a single sitting, leaving to others the choice of The Messiah, the "Selection," or Israel in Egypt, which constitutes the bonâ fide Festival. They must have had enough yesterday to last them for an indefinite period, and the wonder was to see so many of them fixed in their places to the end. First, we had two choruses from The Messiah; then the overture to what is styled the Occasional Oratorio; then "The King shall rejoice" (Coronation Anthem); then a recitative and air, "Call forth Thy power" (Mr Vernon Rigby), from Judas Macabæus; then a chorus, "Sing, O ye Heavens!" from Belshazzar; then an air, "Return, O God of Hosts!" (Madame Patey); a chorus, "To dust his glory"; another air, "Honour and arms" (Signor Foli); and another chorus, "Let their celestial concerts all unite," from Samson; the "Angels, ever bright and fair" from Theodora (Mdlle Albani); then the overture, an air (Madame Sherrington), with chorus from Athaliah; then an air, "In the battle," from Deborah (Madame Patey); and lastly, a recitative (Mr Lloyd), march and chorus, "Glory to God," from Joshua. These were all included in the first part. We cannot enter into such minute details about the second and third. Enough that the second part (mostly secular) began with the fine organ concerto in B flat (played by Mr W. T. Best, of St George's Hall, Liverpool), and comprised selections from Acis and Galatea, the opera of Ezio, Hercules, Dryden's Ode on Cecilia's Day, the opera of Orlando, and Joshua ("See the conqu'ring hero comes"), of course, including choruses and airs, the solo singers being Madame Sherrington, Messrs Lloyd, Santley, Vernon Rigby, and Foli; while the third was devoted to a series of "double choruses" from Israel in Egypt, added to the popular duet for basses, "The Lord is a man of war" (Mr Santley and Herr Henschel). It is not our duty to criticise what professes to be simply a rehearsal, and therefore reserve any remarks on the various performances till the proper time. The general impression created yesterday was so favourable as to promise well for the artistic results of what—omitting the experiment of 1857—must be regarded as the seventh "Handel Triennial Festival."

June 26th.

The Handel Festival began yesterday afternoon at the Crystal Palace with, according to custom, The Messiah. There was an enormous audience—more numerous, it is stated, than that of 1874, on the same occasion. At two o'clock precisely Sir Michael Costa was at his post, and the first chords from the orchestra gave fair promise of what kind of performance was to be expected. The prelude, which would seem to have little or nothing in common with that which comes after, is a masterpiece all the same. So vast a body of stringed instruments as we are used to at the Handel Festival is calculated to give real significance to the fugal movement, and to satisfy those not placed so far off as to dis-enable them from following its development with interest. The appealing recitative, "Comfort ye, my people," quite in another strain, and its joyous sequel, "Every valley shall be exalted," were given by Mr Cummings with so much genuine artistic feeling that we were sorry to see nothing else set down for him in this or the other two programmes of the Festival. As the overture had already displayed the qualities of the instrumental force, so did the bright and vigorous chorus, "And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed," set forth the strength and excellent training of the host of singers, men and women, summoned from all parts of the country to take an active part in this periodical tribute to the genius of Handel. What was here promised, it may be stated without further preamble, was carried out to the end. "For unto us a Child is born" was, as it seldom fails to be, a conspicuous feature; and side by side with this may be named "His yoke is easy," which brought the first section of the oratorio effectively to a close. In the ensuing part, which treats of the "Passion" of the Redeemer, and contains some of the noblest of Handel's choral pieces, the superb series beginning with "Behold the Lamb of God," continued, after the temporary interruption of the contralto air, "He was despised and rejected of men," by "Surely He hath borne our griefs," and ending with "And the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all" (set, like other passages to the text of Isaiah), was in every sense remarkable. The solemn theme of the fugue, "And with His stripes we are healed" (so like one in the Requiem of Mozart), was given out and answered with a steadiness, and the wonderfully animated "All we like sheep have gone astray"—arraigned by some of Handel's critics as undignified (!)—with a precision and marked accent which only such a conductor as Sir Michael Costa could have any chance of obtaining from a body of executants, vocal and instrumental, counting in thousands. Equally imposing was "He trusted in God that He would deliver Him"—another majestic fugue, in which may be detected, if such a thing can possibly be in music, a certain expression of irony. About "Lift up your heads," with its continually reiterated query, "Who is the King of Glory?"

(as Handel quaintly accentuates it), and of the magnificent "Hallelujah!" it is enough to say that both were irreproachably delivered from first to last. To have done with the choruses, which at no previous Handel Festival have been sung with more level excellence, we may conclude by saying that "Worthy is the Lamb," with its glorious sequel, "Amen!"—which perhaps more than any other choral piece in existence conveys the idea of a multitude simultaneously employed in the act of thanksgiving and praise—was a glorious climax to the whole.

The solo singers, in addition to Mr Cummings, who has been mentioned, were Mdle Albani, Mesdames Edith Wynne and Patey, Herr Henschel, Messrs Santley and Vernon Rigby. Mdle Albani, who, more than once at our country festivals, has shown her proficiency in Handel, gave further evidence of this by her singing on the present occasion. "Rejoice greatly" and "How beautiful are the feet" are airs of a widely different character; but both had been studied with earnestness, and in both the gifted lady was eminently successful. In "Come unto Him" Mdle Albani had to follow that experienced Handelian singer, Mdme Patey, whose first verse, "He shall feed His flock," created a deep impression. The two singers were well matched—which is paying a deserved compliment to each of them. Mdme Patey had much more set down for her, and, among other things, the pathetic air, "He was despised;" and with what genuine expression she gave it our musical readers need scarcely be informed. The Passion music, beginning with "All they that see Him" and ending with "But Thou didst not leave His soul in hell," together with the trying air, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron," was assigned to Mr Vernon Rigby, who has rarely sung better or entered with more spirit into his work. Mr Santley gave "Why do the nations so furiously rage together?" and "The trumpet shall sound" (trumpet obbligato, Mr T. Harper) as only Mr Santley can. The other bass music, including "The people that walked in darkness," fell to the share of that intelligent artist, Herr Henschel, and—last, not least—Mdme Edith Wynne undertook the soprano music in the third part of the oratorio, including that most devotional of all songs, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," to which she imparted the true feeling. Sir Michael Costa conducted with all his wonted energy, and Mr Willing presided with ability at the organ.

The "selection" for to-morrow, the second day, offers varied attractions, and, among the rest, some pieces that have not hitherto been given at the Handel Festival.

June 28th.

The second day of the festival, the programme of which, according to custom, consisted of a miscellaneous series of pieces, sacred and secular—the sacred, as it might have been expected, preponderating—was, so far as the attendance was concerned, even more successful than that of 1874. Nearly 7,000 non-subscribers, added to between 13,000 and 14,000 holders of seasons tickets, brought the number of visitors up to a total of 20,343. That the extremely favourable weather had something to do with this cannot be doubted; but at the same time it must be admitted that the selection was unusually varied and interesting. The opening piece was the overture to the Occasional Oratorio, which, sonorous and brilliant enough as it stands in the original score, is made trebly so by the orchestral adjuncts deemed requisite on these special occasions, and supplied with the utmost skill by Sir Michael Costa. A more effective performance could hardly have been desired; and the spirit-stirring march which forms its climax was unanimously encored. The overture was followed by "The King shall rejoice," perhaps the grandest of the four Anthems written for the Coronation of George II. and Queen Caroline (October, 1737). The imposing introductory chorus, and the final "Hallelujah," a fugue on two themes, which, though comparatively brief, is in Handel's finest manner, were both given with admirable precision. There were other choral pieces in the first section of the programme not merely noticeable on their own account, but because of the admirable manner in which they were executed by the vast company of singers under Sir Michael Costa's direction. Among these may be named "Sing, O ye heavens," from the too unfamiliar oratorio, Belshazzar, comprising another "Hallelujah" (in the fugal style), which, though also brief, is in the most original style of the composer—as the curious second interval of the second theme, added to the ingenious development of the whole, suffices to show. About the magnificent hymn of glorification, "Let their celestial concerts all unite," one of the grandest passages in Samson—an oratorio which Handel is said to have placed even before the Messiah, its immediate predecessor—we need only state that never in our remembrance has it been more superbly rendered. Here, again, we have a multitude in praise, and Handel giving expression to the universal enthusiasm with a power in which he has never found an equal. We scarcely know whether most to admire, in this chorus, the simplicity of its construction or its amazing power. "Glory to God," from Joshua, with its powerfully impressive second part—"The nations tremble"—was also a conspicuous feature in the first part of the programme. Among the striking choral displays of the second was "Galatea, dry thy tears," from the most touching and graceful of musical pastorals. "Tyrants now no more," from Hercules, a secular oratorio, which Mr Henry Leslie, following the precedent set by Herr Joachim in Berlin, has been endeavouring to reusucitate, and "The dead shall live," from the Ode to St Cecilia, equally call for mention. The peroration to the chorus from Hercules, "Horrid forms of monstrous birth," with its mysterious sequel, "The world's avenger is no more," forms one of those characteristic and impressive episodes of which Handel has given so many remarkable examples. We have only to add that all the choruses thus enumerated, besides others, to comment upon which in succession would be superfluous, were rendered in such a manner as to sustain the well-earned credit of the Handel Festival singers; and that almost in each particular they were thoroughly appreciated.

Among the other orchestral excerpts were the overture to Athalisk—which it would be both interesting and instructive to compare with that of Mendelssohn—and marches from Joshua and Judas Maccabeus—each of short duration, but each more or less imposing. One of the most important instrumental performances of the day, however, was that of the grand concerto in B flat, for organ with orchestral accompaniments, the solo part in which was given in masterly style, with faultless mechanism and genuine expression, by Mr W. T. Best, of Liverpool, an artist who has long deservedly ranked among the leading organists of Europe. Mr Best, who, in playing Handel, knows how to employ the modern resources at his command so as not in any way to interfere with the design of the piece or the character of the music, was never more successful than on this occasion. In the first allegro he introduced a cadenza of his own, chiefly constructed upon the theme of the succeeding movement, and here he displayed to the full his remarkable executive power. The applause that followed was not less unanimous than well deserved.

The solo singers were Mesdames Adelina Patti, Lemmens-Sherrington, and Patey, Signor Foli, Messrs Vernon Rigby, Edward Lloyd, and Santley, to all of whom some familiar pieces were assigned. Mdme Patti, who received a most cordial greeting, showed her appreciation of the compliment by singing both the airs set down for her to absolute perfection. The first of these was "Let the bright Seraphim," from Samson (trumpet obbligato, Mr T. Harper); the second was "From mighty Kings" (Judas Maccabeus). Each was followed by loud and continued applause, which in the last instance was so prolonged that, at a signal from Sir Michael Costa, Mdme Patti came back to the orchestra and repeated the whole. Another marked success was achieved by Mr Lloyd with "Love in her eyes sits playing" (Acis and Galatea), which evoked unanimous and well-merited applause; another by Mr Vernon Rigby, in "Call forth thy powers" (Judas); another by Mdme Patey, with "In the battle fame pursuing" (from Deborah), accompanied on the organ by Mr Willing; and another by Mr Santley, in "Nasce al bosco" (from the Italian opera, Erto). Mdme Sherrington sang "Heart, thou seat of soft delight" (Acis), with the most refined taste; Mr Santley, as might have been expected, gave appropriate devotional feeling to the air, "How willing my paternal love;" and Signor Foli threw all his well-known vigour into "Honour and arms scorn such a foe," the giant Harapha's contemptuous defiance of Samson. In fact, the solo singers without exception did their best, and the well-known trio, with semi-chorus and chorus, "See the conqu'ring hero comes" (Joshua), in which the leading vocal parts were sustained by Mesdames Sherrington, Clara Suter, and Patey, formed an imposing climax.

June 30th.

Yesterday the always attractive Israel in Egypt brought the Festival to an end. About this performance more next week.

HAPPIER THAN A KING.

Up yon sunny hill half way,
Stands my cottage old and grey,
Nestled 'mong the forest trees,
Kissed by many a summer breeze.
Thither, when my work is done,
Light of heart, I hasten on;
All my cares away I fling,
And there I'm happier than a king.
Watching at the garden gate,
Smiling stands my gentle Kate,

Bonnier than the sunset's glow
Resting on her, loth to go.
No bright gems deck her, my queen,
But on her brow ne'er frown is seen;
And tho' we boast not dainties rare,
We've love to sweeten homely fare.
Then what care I for wealth or fame,
Lordly hall or ducal name;
Round my hearth 'tis always spring,
And there I'm happier than a king.
LOUISA GRAY.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

(RETROSPECT.)

June 26th.

If Bellini's Sonnambula is brought out with a new Amina of more than average pretensions, it is tolerably sure to create a certain degree of excitement. Such has been the case from the time that Malibran first introduced the opera to an English audience, through an English version, when, some forty years ago, the well-known "manager-poet," Alfred Bunn, directed the fortunes of Drury Lane Theatre—among the most memorable instances of later days being the debut of Adelina Patti, as a girl in her teens, in 1861, and that of Emma Albani, in 1872.

On Saturday night general curiosity was raised by the announcement that Mdle Ethelka Gerster (Mdme Gardini), who has been playing with cordial recognition at the theatre in Kroll's Gardens, Berlin, would give fresh life to the village pastoral of Romani and Bellini, now on the verge of its half-century of existence, and still charming, not only because of its unobtrusive prettiness, but in virtue of many impassioned phrases that speak to us with the persuasive eloquence of genuine melody. We were also led to expect an Amina endowed with individuality so marked as to encourage the belief that a new and striking conception of a character with which we are about as familiar as with that of any heroine belonging to the repertory of the lyric stage was to be witnessed. The former condition at least was fulfilled. If the occasion had been the first performance of La Sonnambula, as well as the first essay of a débütante among us, the reception could not have been more enthusiastic, the applause more frequent, and, to say the truth, here and there, more indiscriminate. Mdle Gerster is by birth Hungarian. To Hungary the musical world is indebted for not a few distinguished artists—vocalists and instrumentalists; and we shall be only too glad if future opportunities of appreciating the talent of Mdle Gerster may enable us to class her among the number. At present it may almost suffice to state that everything she did, from the opening cavatina to the last finale, was, judging by the manner of its acceptance, considered not merely good, but, in the common French idiom, "hors ligne." Yet, with a voice of considerable range, and in the higher notes—as she takes abundant pains to show—capable, if skillfully managed, of feats beyond the common, Mdle Gerster is a very unequal singer, occasionally achieving feats that surprise no less than they please, but as often barely attaining the contemplated mark. The recitative preceding the cavatina of the opening scene, "Come per me sereno," for example, was declaimed with such well-considered expression as to engender a belief almost unanimous that another great singer was revealed to us, and the applause at the end was tumultuous; but the cavatina itself, notwithstanding some original and elaborate embellishments, was hardly executed with such invariable finish as to justify that conclusion. The love duet, however, with Elvino (Signor Fancelli), upon which the curtain descends at the termination of the first section of Act I, elicited renewed manifestations, and Mdle Gerster had still more reason to be satisfied with her appreciative and sympathetic audience. The following scene, where the sonnambulist unconsciously disturbs the privacy of Count Rodolpho (Signor del Puente) in his bed-chamber, evoked no less approval; while that of the mill, with the awakening of Amina, to find her innocence acknowledged and her love once more reciprocated, was a fitting climax. Each verse of the joyous peroration, "Ah non giunge," brought down unmeasured applause, and Mdle Gerster was thrice summoned before the curtain. Under the circumstances, we would rather postpone any deliberate opinion with regard to the new prima donna's assuredly exceptional capabilities as a vocalist. Her dramatic powers, we apprehend, will require less serious consideration. Mdle Gerster's second appearance is announced for Thursday night.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

(RETROSPECT.)

June 23rd.

The performance of La Figlia del Reggimento last night, in which Mdle Marimon, as the Vivandière, exhibited her most brilliant qualities both as singer and actress, had an interest apart, on account of the expected visit to the theatre of General Grant. About ten minutes after the usual time for commencement, the illustrious ex-President entered a centre box on the grand tier, accompanied by Mrs Grant and General Badeau. His appearance was the signal for unanimous applause, the whole audience rising to greet him. Then the orchestra, directed by Signor Vianesi, struck up the well-known melody of "The Star-spangled Banner," the solo verses in which were given by Mdle Albani with such genuine enthusiasm that one might have supposed, instead of being a Canadian, she had been born and nurtured on the other side of Niagara Falls. At the conclusion of this the applause was renewed with increased fervour, till, at length, General Grant resumed his seat, and the orchestral introduction to the opera was allowed to begin. The performance generally, in which Mdle Ghiotti, Signor Piazza, and Signor Ciampi (as the Marchioness, Tonio, and Sulpizio) took part, was remarkably effective. General Grant, however, having other engagements, was unfortunately obliged to leave before the finale to the first act. We have, however, authority for stating that, in the name of himself and his party, the General expressed much regret at not being able to remain until the end of the opera, having been so pleased with what he had heard.

NOTES UPON NOTES.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR MR EDITOR,—My "cara sposa" (this is pure Italian) and "s'en" (this is pure Derbyshire) have tried to be "wide-awake" ever since the fair "Belle" rang "fancy's knell;" not "O rest thee, babe," &c., but "restless babes," at four o'clock in the morning. 'Twas up "by four" this morning (but then the clock was behind). It is so necessary in these days of "higher development" (in which there may be some truth) to take Time by the fore-lock, and give a good pull—but I write to ask information. What is gained by the "high action" adopted by so many performers of undoubted ability? Surely this is not the "higher development" (of muscular power). Is it necessary to come to blows with the poor pianoforte? Is it to be announced, when we have arrived at "the Music of the Future," that Mr So-and-so would have a "pugilistic encounter" with a Broadwood (pretty babes in the wood); that the "Musical Gladiator" should appear with bare arms, when they want to "play down" an orchestra? Is it for "high art," or the "good of trade?" The "hammer and tongs" style cannot be conducive to the well-being of hammers of the pianoforte. Clementi, in his day, introduced the raising of the hand from the keys, then to fall gently, so as to give emphasis, without great force; but with tenderness, such as used in the days of "bussing" it on the pianoforte, or rather, "caressing the tone;" but now, in the days "when really gifted artists" seem to go up so high as never to come down, but float in the air, perhaps in search of Measars Maskelyne & Cook—"Spirits and Water," "'Gin' a body meet a body," "Whisk he up farther;" but this seems so Rum that one must retire to a Shruberry; but this is all very well for a public house, but what in a private house? Is it not unfair to the fair sex? Can they be expected to "punch" the keys and polish the ivories? "'Music' hath charms to soothe the savage breast." I do not pretend to say the fair "sect" would play for a match (even if it were Bryant & May's), but could they give such striking powers of their execution (oh! "murder," my pretty dears)? Would it not be alarmingly dangerous for the unfair sect to be near such a gentle player? Who knows but they might hit one's nose—the "crimson" might flow—"cries of the wounded" might follow; but is this the way for the fair sect to vanquish the unfair sect, when the fair sect can in so many other ways "win their way?" Would the bumptious and thumpius style of playing accord with Dr Marx's idea of "Music yearning for words." In a musical Koran, I read, Art is not a purely spiritual essence, like thought, with which science has to deal, nor faith, which is a matter of religion. Neither is it corporeal or material, like the works of nature. It is a living spirit revealing itself in corporeally perceptible forms—in corporeally perceptible forms. What is gained by the "high action?" The blow is greater; and let any one watch the hammers after such blows, it will be perceived that the very force given causes them to rebound. Certainly, in the case of reiterated chords, rapidly, between the two hands, it may be said that clearness of execution is gained; but still, for the sake of tone, and, indeed, in appearance, the closer playing the better. Thalberg, who produced such a volume of tone, always advocated close playing; and on one occasion, when he had been much complimented on his tone, Mr Cipriani Potter said, "You play close for your tone." Thalberg said that Mr Potter had spoken to him more sensibly than all the rest put together. Thalberg was a model of position at the pianoforte; so, also, our own Mdme Arabella Goddard; but so great in tone, and vanquishing all technical difficulties with the greatest ease. Fingers have their free action when the performer thus sits so quietly, without having such unnecessary recourse to shoulders or arms. With regard to the high action, so often adopted by performers of most undoubted and acknowledged great abilities, it is only the means that one has to complain of; and this might be prejudicial to the rising generation, who would be more likely to copy the (to me) rather defect than the so many beauties of gifted artists. I speak more particularly of the professional student in private society; I can hardly think the "pugilistic" style, or "high action," will maintain its place. Yet, believe me, that I am not so fully attached to the old traditions as not to adopt all the new fancies, could I see that any advantage was gained in so doing. The "high action" does not appear to act upon touch, which, of course, is more highly developed at the extremities of the fingers, which, when thoroughly educated and trained, give the performer the power of expressing all the various emotions which a musical composition might require; but the "high" action would seem to make any one forget that they had any fingers to act independently, wrist and fat to do the requisite work. Players have been advised to look at their arms, and hands, and fingers, and to analyse them carefully; then to have a graceful and natural position at the pianoforte, and not to give too much force from the shoulders or arms. Mr Dannreuther, in his most able work, Richard Wagner: His Tendencies and Theories, says that "the Music of the Future, understood in the sense of music that is ugly to us, but may possibly sound all right to our grandchildren, is a bugbear invented by an ingenious critic." Will the performers of the Future go up to the moon and return with such a firm touch to their pianoforte? Would this be the way in which music, the language of all men, possessing the requisite equalising power, which, resolving the language of intellectual perception into that of feeling, makes a universal communication of the innermost artistic intuitions possible? The present "high action" in playing may, perhaps, only prove to be "the fashion" or the "foppiness" of the day." The closer playing, which many may like to designate "old-fashioned," may then become "new." I shall be glad to know, certainly, what is gained by the "high action." I am, I trust, open to conviction, if it is at all warrantable in appearance and general effect. Do the glorious Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues of Sebastian Bach (such wonderful lessons in part-playing! thereby requiring such variety of tone; full of intellectual and mechanical difficulties, almost humiliating to many clever players, who would scarcely ever dream that works by such an old master should require such really subtle execution)—would Bach be improved by the "high action"? It would be a step from the sublime to—I will not say what; it is so generally understood. Would the performance of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Sterndale Bennett, Hummel, Moscheles, Schumann, &c., be improved by the high action? However, I do not wish to have an action brought against myself for defaming the digitals of my brother artists, neither should I like to receive the blows that are given to the poor (though not dumb) animal, the pianoforte. I am not speaking of any individual; it is merely a general sort of survey of hands that go up in the air, in desert-space, not knowing when they may come down again. Dr Stainer, in his masterly work, A Theory of Harmony Founded on the Tempered Scale, takes as motto (from W. F. Donkin, on Acoustics): "The whole structure of modern music is founded on the possibility of educating the ear, not merely to tolerate or ignore, but even in some degree to take pleasure in, slight deviations from the perfection of the diatonic scale." And Dr Stainer himself says: "Modern music owes much of its beauty to the use of doubtful chords." Does not the high action in playing tend to verify all this in a very funny manner? Will not the carrier-pigeon style of performance ensure slight deviations from the perfection of the diatonic scale, and the soaring above increase the doubtful chords when the player does come down again—rather uncertain, certainly? In the old work by Avison, On Musical Expression, mention is made of the foppiness of the harpsichord players, always sprinkling their chords, and coming in so sharply or smartly on the singers; nothing is said about "high action." The great Sebastian Bach (according to Forkel) used to laugh at players who seemed to have all thumbs; and, to quote from Herr Ernst Pauer's Historical Pianoforte Lectures (so full of thought, observation, research, and judgment), "Bach was undoubtedly the greatest performer of his time. The chief feature of his playing is said to be the highest degree of distinctness in the tones produced from the keys. This is, I believe (W. A. H.), not gained by the high action. It is further related that Bach held his fingers bent in such a manner over the key-board that the finger-tips appeared in a downward vertical line, each finger at every moment ready for action. In taking a finger off the key-board he drew it gently inwards, with a sort of movement very like taking up coin from a table. Only the end joint was moved; all the rest remained still. Each finger was equally well trained. The tranquil grandeur and the dignity of Bach's playing were eminently remarkable. Bach took quick times, and rendered his performance so intelligible and interesting that it sounded like speech. Passionate passages he never expressed by violent or spasmodic movements, but solely relied on the power the composition itself possessed." So it appears that this most excellent description of really fine playing belonged to the "high art" school, and was unaided by the "high action." It has been said that with Dussek the pianoforte seemed to undergo a new development. The cross-hand passages, arpeggios, &c., of Dussek* seem to favour a supposition that there was little inking after the high action. So it may be said of the two Scarlattis, Domenico Scarlatti gave up the cross-hand work in his later years, when he became very slow—to quote again from Herr Pauer, who humorously remarks—"a physical condition of things which interfered in a very appreciable degree with his ability to cross his hands over the key-board in playing jumping passages." Now, supposing all the promoters of the high action become very fat (and I don't see why they should not), will the labour attendant upon "the high action" keep down obesity? But should they become fat, with all their ritualistic practices, what are they to do? They could not say, "We've got no work to do." It would be, "We can't do the work." Poor, wretched, misguided individuals! where are their hands? Have they ever come down since they were last "floating in the air," so "oft in the stilly night," in their banquet-hall deserted. The only chance for the "high action" promoters would be to have their nails well cut, and take to the legato style; and as the legato induces the "leg arter" the pedal, in order to sing (like a kettle) on the pianoforte, the understanding takes a turn at the treadmill work, giving up the perspiring for expiring efforts at such very sentimental expression. I perceive that at Messrs Maaskelyne & Cook's performances one of the gentlemen float in the air, taking up a cabinet. It may be that some professors of the "high action" may wish to take up a pianoforte. Fancy an "Iron Grand" of Broadwood's flying about in the air; the going up—and then, the coming down—of the pianist and his "piano." To quote again from Herr Pauer, he says that "there is a certain analogy in the genius and career of Hummel and Liszt. Both these composers were born in Hungary; both were distinguished for the highest degree of technical execution. (Liszt is now considered to be in full practice, for at a musical performance given the other day, in which three of Liszt's most distinguished pupils played, I believe, including von Bülow, it was generally admitted that Liszt "was the master still.") Both (Hummel and Liszt) contributed to make the pianoforte a fashionable instrument; and, lastly, both became directors, or capellmeisters, in Weimar. Hummel enjoyed the rare benefit of the tuition of Mozart for a full year, and even was privileged to live in the great master's house. Michael Kelly, in his Musical Reminiscences, describes a foot-race between himself and Attwood† round Mozart's garden. Attwood was then living with Mozart, and taking lessons from him, having been sent over by George the Fourth. Michael Kelly considered that the Irish and Italian languages were so much alike in sweetness. I knew a professor of the Irish language—at least his wife (a highly respectable woman in her way, who kept an early coffee-stall, and was a quack doctress) told me so—I quite forgot to ask him his opinion upon the Irish and Italian languages. It is said that Hummel achieved feats (in playing the pianoforte) never heard of before. Everybody believed he had reached the culminating point of technical execution. (Yet one does not hear much about "the high action," although such passages as those, for example, in the conclusion of the first movement of the Concerto in A minor, and Fantasia, Op. 18, would seem to favour "a little going up and little coming down.") My own remembrance of Hummel is that his was great playing—the manner in which he interpreted his own works. He has been considered to have united the classical and bravura styles more than any composer of eminence. There was no "high action" in his playing. Hummel made his first appearance on his second visit to England in his own concerto in A flat. After the most lovely "first tutti," the entry of the pianoforte was made by Hummel with such calmness, quietude, and grace as to command attention; his fat fingers "picking" out the notes with such marvellous dignity and tone, he held his audience spell-bound. Dr Ferdinand Hiller, in his preface to Mendelssohn's Letters and Recollections, says truly that—"Music cannot be described; language is totally incapable of giving even the most distant idea of a musical composition." And, indeed, the same may be said of musical interpretation or performance; and many of the great critics of the day must have felt how difficult it is to write upon such an ideal and "spiritual" subject as music. Although there is a great power of public instruction going on at the present day, the analytical programmes, which should be read before the performance, so as to listen with all one's might, and this acquired knowledge—nor, how could the "high action" be observed, if any pianist "took to that line of the profession," if reading the programme, although some might now and then feel that there was an uncomfortable sensation going on somewhere? After the performance, to read a well-written critique upon the actual performance as it took place, the musical student will perceive all this so suggestive, and how much he has to feel out in the ideal of his art; to be learnt, and not taught. But to go back to Hummel. His playing was so musicianlike, so elegant and refined, you always felt that he was the composer as well as the player. Hummel's personality was so different from that of his music. He had the appearance of a country farmer (when I saw him), fond of wearing a white hat, and even going out to evening parties with the said beaver. But let it be remembered that Hummel was patronised by all the Courts in Europe. I think if we could all hear Hummel now we should admit what a real healthiness of style, without sleight of hand tricks, yet with wonderful and profitable execution.

* Qy. Where are they?—D. P.

A good story is told of a young professional lady applying to a justly celebrated performer to give her lessons; upon which he said that he rarely gave any lessons, but that he would give her the advice to practice till she considered herself perfect, and then do as he had done, retire for twelve years and practice fifteen hours a day. Now to a really true artist there must be always interest in doing so much; because to a real musician there is such variety that it is not the same thing over and over again, as the outside unthinking world fancy it to be. Granted that there is much that is mechanical to be overcome—that which may be termed dry execution, the “means to an end;” but, if the end is well kept in view, the ardour of the thorough student can never be quenched, but, on the contrary, be stimulated over and over again to fresh exertion. I really believe in this being a pleasurable life of musical study. It has been said that: “Of all human arts, music has justest pretences to the honour of antiquity.” We scarcely need any authority for this assertion; the reason of the thing demonstrates it, for the conditions and circumstances of human life required some powerful charm to bear up the mind under the anxiety and cares that mankind soon after his creation became subject to. And the goodness of our blessed Creator soon discovered itself in the wonderful relief that music affords against the unavoidable hardships which are annexed to our state of being in this life; so that music must have been as early in the world as the indispensable arts. For, if we consider how natural to the mind of man this kind of pleasure is, as constant and universal experience sufficiently proves, we cannot think he was long a stranger to it. Other arts were revealed as bare necessity gave occasion, and some were afterwards owing to luxury; but neither necessity nor luxury are the parents of this heavenly art. To be pleased with it seems to be a part of our constitution; but 'tis made so, not as absolutely necessary to our being, 'tis a gift of God to us for our more happy and comfortable being; and, therefore, we can make no doubt that this art was among the very first that were known to men. Plutarch, in his Treatise on Music, which is nothing but a conversation among friends about the invention, antiquity, and power of Music, makes one ascribe the invention to Amphion, the son of Jupiter and Antiopa, who was taught by his father; but in the name of another he makes Apollo the author, and, to prove it, alleges all the ancient statues of this god, in whose hand a musical instrument was always put. He adduces many examples to prove the natural influence music has upon the mind of man; and since he made a god the inventor of it, and the gods existed before men, 'tis certain he means to prove, both by tradition and the nature of the thing, that it is the most ancient as well as the most noble science. Yet we never hear of old Plutarch or Apollo being given to shutting their eyes and attending to the high action; therefore it can hardly be an old fashion revived. If, in 1877, the high action is so high, as it is at present, what will it come to in 1977. With this melancholy reflection I must, at present, come to a half close. In the few words I have written I have intended nothing personal, and again I say I am open to conviction, can it be proved, that the high action is beneficial to pianoforte playing.—Yours truly, W. H. HOLMES.

MUSICAL CRITIC.

(To the Editor of the “Musical World.”)

SIR,—Allow me to point out the incorrectness of the term “musical critic,” the compound word “music-critic” being preferable. Usage ought not to sanction expressions obviously ungrammatical. What would be thought of any one who would say “musical master” instead of “music-master,” or “artistical critic” instead of “art-critic”? I think these two examples sufficient to prove that “music-critic” should be used to describe a critic or reviewer of music, and that when we speak of a “musical” person, we mean one who is a performer of some kind or other. ALBANI THE POLYGLOT, &c.

(From the “Pall Mall Gazette.”)

It seems to be the appointed duty of Mdle Albani to welcome the distinguished personages who from time to time visit the Royal Italian Opera. Last year she sang for a future ruler, and her song was “God bless the Prince of Wales;” on Friday evening the favoured guest was a retired ruler, and the anthem of the occasion was the “Star-spangled Banner.” Apart from her intrinsic merits, which can scarcely be over-estimated, Mdle Albani is peculiarly fitted by the circumstances of her birth, education, and early life for complimenting the magnates of all civilised lands. Homer was claimed as a native by many cities; the honour of having produced Mdle Albani is disputed by several great nations. Her stage name could not but recall to General Grant the American city from which it would seem to have been derived; and, hearing her sing with a sort of enthusiasm the American national air, he may be forgiven for having regarded her as belonging in some measure to the United States. But if Mdle Albani did indeed pass a portion of her childhood at Albany, she was born in Canada, which is an English possession, and she sings English and, above all, Scotch ballads in a way which shows her to have been “to the manner born.” Her Parisian admirers, however, will say that in the part of Canada from which Mdle Albani comes the French language is spoken and the inhabitants are of French descent, and, like Mdle Albani's parents, have French names. What would all this have profited Mdle Albani, the Italians will ask, if she had not studied singing in Italy, where, moreover, she made her first success on the operatic stage? Here the Germans may appear and point out that, admirably as Mdle Albani represents the heroine of Italian opera, and charmingly as she sings Italian music, it is above all in the works of Wagner, and in the impersonation of Elsa, Elizabeth, and Senta, that she has made her distinctive mark. The Germans would be quite right, the Italians would not be at all wrong, there would be much to approve in the French view, and the representations both of the English and of the Americans would be well worthy of attention. Americans, English, French, Italians, and Germans would at least have agreed in applauding Mdle Albani's singing of the American national air.

At 7 p.m., performance in the Theatre. At 8 p.m., Farewell Convivial Meeting for the visitors in the Cursaal. Horn Quartet from the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, with co-operation of the Salzburg Liedertafel. Friday, 20th July: Early meeting at the railway refreshment room at 7 a.m. At 8 a.m., departure for St Johann. Visit to the Liechtenstein-Klamm. Conveyance free. Return at 3 p.m. Arrival at Salzburg at 6 p.m. Second performance in the Theatre, at 8 p.m. Herr L. Bösendorfer, piano manufacturer to the Emperor of Austria and the Imperial Court, has kindly lent one of his renowned grands for the concerts of the Festival.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

MR. SIMS REEVES' benefit concert, is fixed for Wednesday next at the Royal Albert Hall, assisted by Mme Christine Nilsson, Miss Anna Williams, Mme Antoinette Sterling, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mme Trebelli, Mr Edward Lloyd, Signor Foli and Mr Santley, the London Vocal Union, and Herr Wilhelmj. Mr Sims Reeves will sing "Deeper and deeper still" "Waft her, angels," "Tom Bowling," "All's well" (with Mr Santley), and "The Magic Wove Scarf" (with Mme Christine Nilsson and Mr Santley).

MAD. ANNA DI BELLOCCA, who was in London for a few days last week, has left for Paris. It is reported that Mr Mapleson has engaged her for his next autumnal tour, and that she will appear next year at Her Majesty's Theatre.

MR. WILLIAM DORRELL, the distinguished pianist—we are glad to inform our readers, among whom he counts many friends—having entirely recovered from his late indisposition, is now resuming his professional duties with redoubled energy.

IN announcing the success of Madlle Gatineau, who carried off the second violoncello prize at the Paris Conservatory, M. Ernest Reyer, musical critic of Les Débats, says: "I am always pleased when I see a young lady devote herself to the study of the harp or the violoncello. It is one less to play the piano."

DURING a rehearsal at the Grand Opera, Paris, one of the coryphæi duly sang the line of somewhat singular French:

"Ma hache sur son front ne s'est pas fait attendre," which may be rendered by the line in equally singular English:

"My axe on his forehead has not made him wait."

"It appears," remarked some one present, "that punctuality is the politeness of—axes."

THE Paris Figaro is now publishing a series of "Kissingen Letters," in one of which M. Perivier relates a conversation he had with Prince Bismarck's Son, after a fruitless attempt to "interview" the Imperial Chancellor himself. Count Herbert Bismarck remarked among other things: "Besides the German papers, my father reads the French and English. In the Figaro, the letters written by M. Albert Wolff on the Bayreuth Festival especially pleased him. The Prince is opposed to Richard Wagner's music, and for this reason was delighted with M. Wolff's Letters."

THE "GREEN ROOM."—Another addition to the already long list of London Clubs has just been made under this title at the western corner of Adelphi Terrace. As its name would imply, the "Green Room" Club is intended mainly for the use of actors and dramatists, and no one unconnected with literature, art, or learned professions is eligible for admission. The inaugural dinner of the Club was held on Saturday afternoon at the Criterion Restaurant. The Duke of Beaufort presided, and among those present were Messrs Irving, James, Neville, Thorne, Hon. Lewis Wingfield, Frank Marshall, Ferrand, Durlacher, Marks, Harcourt, Hawkins, and Loveday. Dinner over, the guests inspected the new rooms, which command a view of London from St Paul's to Westminster Abbey, and have been decorated by a "Committee of Taste," consisting of Mr Murray Marks, the Hon. Louis Wingfield, and Mr Forbes Robertson.

A NEGATIVE NOVELTY (from the Pall Mall Gazette).—If the appearance of Mdle Albani in oratorio was the great positive novelty in yesterday's performance, there was a novelty also of a negative kind which cannot be passed over. Mr Sims Reeves, our greatest singer, and one who is especially great in sacred music, was not among the artists engaged; though in justice to the directors of the festival it must be added that he was one of the first to whom an engagement was offered. That terrible question of "pitch," which has caused so much annoyance, and which might so easily be settled by our conforming—in England as in all the principal continental countries—to the "normal diapason" of France, is understood to have been connected with Mr Sims Reeves' unwillingness to sing. To replace Mr Sims Reeves is rather a formidable undertaking; but the airs in which this first of living tenors has so often been heard were sung correctly, energetically, and with good expression by Mr Vernon Rigby. (How about Mr Cummings, beneficent Mail?—"Comfort ye, my people," and "Every valley!"—A. S. S.)

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

SIGNOR GARCIA'S CONCERT.—On Tuesday evening, June 19th, Sig. Garcia gave his fourth annual concert at St James's Hall to a full audience. This year he appeared not only as a vocalist but also as conductor, having organised a special choir for the evening, many of the members, however, being from the now defunct St Cecilia Society. The work performed was new to London audiences. The Fable of the Fairest Melusina (Das Märchen von der Melusine) is a cantata for soli, chorus, and orchestra, composed by Heinrich Hofmann, from a poem by Osterwald, the English translation being by Professor George Boyle. The legend bears some resemblance to the story of Undine. The scene is laid in the forest of Bresilia, where a secluded fountain is the haunt of the Naiads, Melusina being the fairest of all. Count Raymond, whilst hunting in the depths of the forest, becomes enamoured of Melusina, and, after dismissing his hunters, woos her from her retreat with a song. Melusina appears, and an animated duet succeeds, at the conclusion of which they are betrothed; Melusina, however, makes a stipulation that she should be free every seventh morn, and that her husband should not then seek her, or ask any questions; upon this—as in the promise of Elsa to Lohengrin—all depends. Raymond swears he will rather lose life than prove false to his oath. For a time all goes well, and the first part concludes with the rapture of the lovers and a chorus of rejoicing nymphs and huntmen on their way to the castle. The second part opens with a duet for the auspicious Mother, who worries her son Raymond about the absence of his wife. A chorus succeeds, with the curses of the mob against the harmless nymph, whom the people call a witch, and blame for the famine which has happened to fall upon the land. Raymond, distracted, seeks his wife, in order to show his mother and people that they are unjust in their suspicions. He finds Melusina and her sisters, as water-nymphs, bathing at the fountain. At his appearance the nymphs fly and summon the Spirit King, "so stern and strong to avenge the wrong." He commands that Melusina and Raymond part for ever. Raymond, with one long kiss, gently dies in Melusina's embrace. She is gently forced away from her dead husband by her sisters, who whisper her to forget. But the legend declares that in the murmuring of the fountain a gentle sighing can often be heard, as if Melusina still watches and sorrowed over her loved one's grave. The music, although not thoroughly original, is still very melodious; the choruses for ladies' voices (nymphs) being especially brilliant, both for voices and accompaniment. Miss Lisa Walton (a pupil of Sig. Garcia) has a good soprano voice, and sang the music allotted to Melusina like a thoroughly trained musician, although evidences of nervousness were apparent. Sig. Federici as Count Raymond, Mdme Garcia (Klothilde), and Mr Finney (Sintram and the Water King) were equally successful. The cantata was accompanied on two grand pianos and harmonium, by Messrs Henry Thomas, Marlois, and T. Jones. Among the miscellaneous pieces were many attractions. It is sufficient to cite the duet singing of Mdles Friedländer and Redeker, than which nothing can be more charming; the singing of Sig. and Mdme Garcia, Mdle Friberg (a new contralto), and Sig. Foli, who sang a new Italian song ("Patria"), by Tito Mattei, accompanied by the composer and the instrumentalists, M. Wieniawski (piano) and M. Paul Viardot (violin), the latter gentleman playing with rare finish. MOSES AP-GWFFYR.

MR JOHN THOMAS (harpist to Her Majesty the Queen) gave a harp concert at St James's Hall on Thursday afternoon, the 21st inst., which really justified its special title, for the harp was the only instrument used on the occasion. It was heard in solos, in accompaniments to the voices, and also in combination; for a band of harps, each performer being a skilled player, drew many and varied strains from the harmonious strings. The large audience present appeared delighted with this exhibition of the manifold power and quality of the harp, and to realise the fact, that this ancient and graceful instrument was capable of expressing, in its own peculiar manner, all emotions of the never-resting heart. In times not far back, before that despot the pianoforte stole supremacy over Apollo's court, the harp was admired by the listening world, and glorified by poets. Who, even now, dare describe Heaven's choir filled with grand pianos? If the harp were never more heard it would live in the eternal words of genius and inspiration. As a Welsh harpist Mr John Thomas was first known, and he early obtained honours in his native country; with which, however, he was not content. Did he think that amongst the blind the one-eyed was king? He could scarcely be so hard upon the Welsh, that self-elected musical nation of the world; yet he showed judgment in wishing for something higher than praises from rustics, although Cambrian, and an honourable ambition to exercise his craft before London and continental audiences. Pencerdd Gwallia appeared at his concert in the threefold capacity of composer, performer, and conductor, in each of which he manifested ability. His setting of Byron's lines, "There be none of Beauty's daughters," was sung by Mrs Osgood; and the barytone song, "Home and love," by Mr Lewis Thomas. Characteristic pieces, entitled "The Seasons," were played by Mdle Servantes and the composer; whilst arrangements for the full band of harps received the aid of his personal conduct. Besides the above mentioned, vocalists of distinction assisted; amongst whom were Mdme Edith Wynne, Miss Robertson, Mdle Enriquez, Mdme Sterling, and Miss Henrietta Beebe. The last named lady, being a stranger, commands especial notice. She possesses a charming voice, and so well trained as to call forth approbation and an encore in Bishop's "Tell me my heart." Mr William Shakespeare sang Donizetti's "Una furtiva lagrima" with skill and vivid expression. The entire concert was a great success.

SIGNOR ARDITI'S CONCERT.—With the permission of the Earl of Dudley, who placed the drawing-rooms of his mansion in Park Lane at Signor Arditi's disposal, the popular composer and conductor was enabled to offer his patrons an excellent entertainment, carried out under exceptionally pleasant circumstances. The assemblage was large and brilliant, and the programme throughout received with demonstrations of unqualified approval. Made up as it was, however, for the most part of familiar things, rendered by artists equally well known, it is only necessary to give a brief résumé of the principal features. Mme Trebelli, who was warmly greeted, had to comply with an encore after singing a bolero by Dessauer, for which she substituted Bizet's "Habanera." Both Mrs Osgood and Mme Rose Hersee met with cordial applause—the American lady, for her well-known and admirable rendering of Signor Randegger's air from Fridolin, "Repose and Peace," accompanied by the composer; and the English artist, for the finished vocalisation displayed in "Where the bee sucks." Signor Arditi's compositions were represented by Mme Campobello-Sinico in "Leggero invisibile;" Mme Pernini in a new valse, "Les Belles Viennoises;" polka solo on the drum by the very youthful son of the concert-giver, who played with surprising spirit and facility, and was loudly applauded. Mlle Ida Corani gave another composition of Signor Arditi's, "The Page's Song;" and other attractive pieces, vocal and instrumental, were contributed by Miss Alice Fairman, Miss Purdy, Mr Shakespeare, Signor Campobello, Signor Bonetti, Signor Rizzelli, Signor Federici, Mlle Pommereul, and M. Henri Ketten. A dramatic recital, by Mme Doche, was also a welcome feature, the accomplished actress being heartily received and applauded.

A CONCERT was given under distinguished patronage, at Onslow Hall, South Kensington, on Friday, June 22nd, for the benefit of the Argyll Home, Oakley Crescent, Chelsea. The following ladies and gentlemen vocalists assisted, supported by members of the choir of the Old Church, Chelsea:—Mrs Davidson, Mrs Clare Royse, Miss Sannemann, Mr Aspinall, Mr A. Bury, Mr O. J. Dullea, Mr C. Beckett, Miss Lillie Albrecht (piano), and Dr John Day (violin). Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm and his motet, "Hear my prayer," were given with good effect, as were the songs and duets comprised in a varied and attractive programme. Miss Lillie Albrecht earned unanimous applause for her remarkably clever performance of Thalberg's Mosé in Egitto, with other pieces, among which as deserving special note were a Berceuse by Mr Cowen, and her own brilliant variations on a popular Scotch melody. We are glad to state that the Argyll Home will be substantially benefited by the result of the concert.

Mdlle MARGUERITE POMMEREUL and Mons. Louis Breitner gave an evening concert at the new concert-room of the Royal Academy of Music on Tuesday, June 26th, assisted by Miss Nita Gaetano, Signor Urio, Signor Franceschi, and Signor Predazzi. We subjoin the programme:—
Sonate pour violon et piano, en La mineure (Rubinstein)—Mlle Pommereul et M. Breitner; Aria, "Un aura amorosa" (Mozart)—Signor Urio; Prelude et Fugue, en La mineure, pour piano (J. S. Bach)—M. Breitner; Nocturne (Chopin), and Tambourin (Leclair), violin—Mlle Pommereul; "L'oiseau s'envole" (Masset), and "Vivere e Godere" (Campana)—Signor Franceschi; "Im autum" (B. Franz), Miss Nita Gaetano; "Le soir" (Raff), Romance (Schumann), Etude (Chopin), Mazurka (Breitner), pour violon—M. Breitner; Airs russes, pour violon (Wieniawski)—Mlle Pommereul; "Rendi 'l sereno al ciglio"—Signor Urio (encored); Serenade (Braga)—Miss Nita Gaetano; Rhapsodie hongroise, pour piano et violon (Liszt et Joachim)—Mlle Pommereul et M. Breitner.

THE annual concert of Mdlle Victoria Bunsen, the admired Swedish contralto, on Monday, June the 18th, at the residence of Captain and Mrs Coster, Harley Street, attracted a brilliant and aristocratic audience, including the German Ambassador Count Munster and his daughter, the Ladies Gordon and Hampson, Sir Charles and Lady Rowley, the Count and Countess Stenbock, &c., &c. Mdlle Bunsen, who was in excellent voice, was heard to advantage in "Di tanti palpiti," from Rossini's Tancredi, a romance by Mr Oberthür, "Je voudrais être" (harp obbligato, Mr Oberthür), and a French romance by M. Depret, "L'amour trahi," together with some national Swedish melodies, given, we need hardly say, con amore and to perfection. Mdlle Felicia Bunsen played, with the composer, Mr Oberthür's brilliant duet for harp and piano on motives from Weber's Oberon. Several well-known vocalists assisted, including Mme Marie Roze, who sang the "Chansonne Indienne," from Auber's Premier Jour de Bonheur, Mr Drummond, who gave Blumenthal's "The Message," Mr Trelawny Cobham, who sang with taste and expression, "Where'er you walk," from Handel's Semele, and Mme Luisa Gage, who gave with effect a romance by Miliotti, "Una stella." Mr Oberthür's performance of Parish Alvars' harp "Serenade," and Mdlle Castellan's violin fantasia on Rigoletto (Alard) were both received with favour. Messrs Lindsay Sloper, Ganz, Cowen, le Marquis D'Havet Zuocardi, and Signor Massoni were the accompanists.

Another Crisis.

DR GRIEF.—Again! More nips of Raff?

MR SIDNEY HAM.—No!—of Rubinstein.

DR GRIEF.—I shall never cure you, if you go on in this way. Rubinstein's worse than Raff.

MR SIDNEY HAM.—I will mend my ways.

DR GRIEF.—You'll be taking Liszt next.

MR SIDNEY HAM.—Oh no! I'll give up stimulants.

(From "Punch.")

Diary of my Ride to Khiva.

(Still in Prison—Diary Continued under Difficulties, but Sent all the Same with Marvellous Regularity.*)

Evening.—What evening I don't know. Ah, pity me in prison! If they still continue to think I am "Lord Bright," they will perhaps have an iron mask made for me, and immure me here for years. If they have any sense of humour, they wouldn't have an iron mask, but a pantomime head with goggle eyes and a perpetual grin, so that when I showed my face at the window ("Only a face at the Window"—song for the occasion), the warders could say to any outsiders, "See how happy he is! always laughing!" . . . I am writing this, with a sharp nail, on my pocket-handkerchief. . . . Perhaps the washerwoman will see it. . . . What will she do with it? . . . All hangs on that. I tremble for the fate of the Pig. . . . I am afraid that these Borderers don't kill and eat pigs, they torture them. . . . Still, Herr Grüntz (the Pig) has got the bag of letters hung round his neck, and if they'll only spread them out before his snout, he'll introduce himself. . . . But ah! should Herr Grüntz meet the Cossack torturer with his knout, which will get the best of it—that snout or this knout? (Another idea for a book of travels—ideas flow in prison—it is so quiet—The Knout and the Snout—a Traveller's Tale.) . . .

Sunset.—The Gaoler's Daughter came to fetch my things for the wooshki. . . I pressed her hand . . . she placed her finger on her lips . . . while there is life there is hope. . . She is gone . . . again I am alone, with a white mouse in the corner, and a spider that has come out for an evening walk through its web in the angle of the window. Sitting down suddenly, I become aware of my pack of cards in my tail coat-pocket, for I was in evening dress when taken prisoner (being generally in this costume, in case of having to give an entertainment impromptu with Pig and Circassian and tricks with cards), and I have not been able to change.

Sun down—Lights up. Commenced teaching the White Mouse carté. An apt pupil, but possessing neither the solidity nor gravity of the Pig. Governor sent to say he is coming to see me. He entered, preceded by two men bearing dipzki (i.e., long thin tallow candles). On their retiring he discovered himself. The patient whom I had cured with the hair oil! He produced my pocket handkerchief, which had been sent to the Washerwoman, and which the Washerwoman had immediately forwarded to him. He advised me not to do it again, for it would only be waste of time, as the Washerwoman, a stupid person, invariably sent everything of the sort to him, and had to be rewarded for her fidelity by the Government, out of which he (the Governor) did not make anything, except by way of adding to his stock of linen. He had, he added, quite a remarkable collection of haberdashery, for all the prisoners wrote on their pocket handkerchiefs, shirt-fronts, false collars, &c., and so he had not had a linendraper's bill for years. I undertook not to do it again, and the Governor promised (out of gratitude for his cure, and his magnificent growth of hair and whiskers, in consequence of the dose of hair oil) to wink at anything I might do in the way of escape. To show his friendly spirit, he began by winking at the cards and the white mouse. Then he withdrew, but most thoughtfully returned to wink at the spider, and then, having winked at everything all round, he left, not however before he had lost one rouble to me (and paid) over the three-card trick, which was evidently quite new to him. What a charm there is in novelty!

Night.—Night-Lights brought by the Gaoler and his daughter. For a consideration they smuggled in some wickski. From my cell I can see one of the small windows of the Governor's room. It is a mere slit, just enough for the Governor's eye, which I recognised placed close to it; and true to his promise, he is winking at the wickski. We are safe. Gaoler brought in his own pack of cards (he said he never trusted prisoners), and insisted on teaching me a Cossack game, at which he is an adept, called Ykook Dnilb. He dealt out about fifteen packets, face downwards, and asked me to choose and give him one of them. If the card at the bottom of the pack so chosen should be an ace, then he would pay me on all the other bottom cards (except aces, for "ties pay dealer"), and if it should be the Czar (the highest) then I should pay him on all. A clever player at this game can, I believe, so arrange as to "force" the choice of a pack. I was hesitating, when suddenly the White Mouse ran out, hopped on to one of the packs, and ran off again in a frightened manner. Gaoler swore he'd have the hole stopped up. It suddenly occurred to me that I would choose the pack on which the Mouse had squatted, and give that to the Gaoler. Scarcely had I placed my finger, hesitatingly, on the pack in question, when, happening to look up, I caught the Gaoler's Daughter's eye (or the eye of the Gaoler's Daughter—vide first Russian Exercise Book), which by its expression, coupled with a movement of her hands and head, seemed to say, "Oh my! what a born idiot you are!!" . . . Too late to retract without a row. Gaoler insisted on taking up the pack where I had placed my finger. I protested. I said I only placed my finger there by accident. Gaoler savage. I yielded. I gave him the Czar! Gaoler's Daughter's eye seemed to say, "Well, you are an ass!" Yes; but once bitten, twice shy. And then, as I reminded the Gaoler, we hadn't settled to play for anything. True. In his eagerness the old humbug had forgotten this. Would I make it a rouble on each pack for the next deal? Certainly—a rouble or a double—that is, a two-rouble piece. Deal as before. I hesitated which to choose. Oddly enough, the Spider came down on a long line, hung over a pack, and then ran up again, and disappeared. I looked up: Gaoler's Daughter's eye said "Don't!" and, by a movement of her charming head, indicated that the pack in the right-hand corner would be the one to try. All this in a second. It flashed across me that the Spider and the Mouse had been trained by the Gaoler. That they are, so to speak, "his creatures." I followed the girl's advice and chose the pack in the right hand corner. Gaoler turned pale. Asked me if I wasn't mistaken. I replied, politely, "No," and presented him with the Ace!! There were no other aces turned up, and he had to pay me on all. A double per pack was, for fourteen packs, fourteen doubles, that is, twenty-eight roubles. I asked him for the money playfully, and said, by way of a jeu de mot, "I am sorry to trouble you for the coin." He was wild. He kicked out at the White Mouse, which was innocently standing on its hind legs in a corner, and sent it flying into its hole, then threw the three-legged stool at the Spider, who was out of sight in a jiffy. The stool broke the web and the window pane. Gaoler wouldn't play again, but said he would go and get me the money, as he hadn't so much about him. Before I could answer, I saw his daughter, behind his back, speaking to me in the dumb alphabet. She said, "Let him go: as he owes you money, you won't see him again." In a second it flashed across me . . . the one obstacle to my escape was removed . . . I had got rid of my Gaoler!

Midnight.—Gaoler departed. Meditating on the events of the evening, I could not help arriving at the conclusion that the Gaoler must be an uncommonly clever man. But what a pity to see talent like his so thrown away! Because really he must have taken no end of pains to train the White Mouse and the Spider. And what could he have got by it? A few roubles from an occasional prisoner. If I could only have trusted him, I would have proposed a partnership in "a travelling business." But I am afraid he would be too suspicious for a partner. . . . All quiet. From my window I think I can still see the Governor's eye winking at everything that is going on under his nose. Hark! From below I hear the splash of the waters that wash the base of the tower. . . . On the draw-bridge, I can distinguish the sentinel's tramp and the pass-word for the night. For strategic purposes it is a Turkish word—"Bosh." "Khiva là?" is the question. "Bosh" is the answer. "Pass Bosh, and all's well!" is the reply.

The bell of the old Kromesky (the name of a chapel belonging to the Tartar Dissenters), sounds two. Then all is still. . . . I lean against the prison-bars, and wonder whether . . . Hark! . . . A barrel-organ played pianissimo . . . and the tune . . . "Oh Leonora Addio!" from Trovatore . . . so suggestive—Leonora outside, Manrico within . . . I am Manrico within, and I commence the strain: then the quick part (Leonora's portion) is taken up, outside, by the organ. Why not by the human voice? Because, clearly, it is somebody who can't sing, or who has not got a human voice. Through the pane of glass, broken by the Gaoler in his passion, I stretch out, and see, leaning against the outside wall, an awkward female figure, in an old-fashioned "poke bonnet," playing a small organ. I recognise the organ—it is the one that we have never parted with on our tour, it having been invariably used for accompaniment to the Pig's performance, and it was the handle of this I had taught the Pig himself to turn . . . It is the Pig . . . disguised in the poke bonnet . . . The Pig in the Poke!! . . . He sees me, and in the moonlight spreads the letters out before him, "Escape by Private Wire." Suddenly, under my nose, comes up the side of the tower,—the Wire. I fasten it to the top bar. I stop for one moment to put the cards and the White Mouse in my pocket (he seemed to implore so hard not to be left behind), and descend the Wire. . . . I am descending slowly but surely . . . and writing this with the other hand so as not to loose time . . .

* All we have to remark at present is that, acting on Counsel's opinion, and we've had some of the best that could be got at the Bar, sending the Office Boy out for it regularly every two hours in this hot weather, we reserve what we have to say till the right moment comes for speaking, and then from Fleet Street to Bow Street is but a step, and thence—But, of course, we may be wrong after all.—Ed.

As I go down I catch sight of the Governor's eye, through the slit in the wall, winking at my escape. . . . Bless him! . . . In the court-yard the Governor's carriage, the Gaoler's Daughter, the Pig in disguise, and the barrel-organ are waiting. Not a moment is to be lost. . . . We gain the first drawbridge. . . . "Khiva la?" "Boah!" I reply, imitating the Governor's voice (I shall add "Imitations" to my Entertainment, on my return). "Pass Bosh, and all's well!" . . .

Once again we are challenged . . . same business as before . . . at last we are out on the high road . . . and free!! "But," as the Pig says on his letters, "we have now a squeak for it."

THE FLYING DUTCHMAN.

(From "Mayfair.")

The genesis of the libretto of the Flying Dutchman, strangely enough, is, in some indirect way, connected with the English stage. Such, at least, is the opinion of one of Wagner's commentators, whose remarks in a volume on "The Music of the Future," published some years ago, may be summed up in the following manner. The legend of the "Flying Dutchman," the Wandering Jew of the ocean, dates from the sixteenth century, and is an embodiment of the unsettled feeling of the epoch caused by the discoveries of a new faith by the Germans, and of a new world by the Spaniards. Captain Vanderdecken, as is generally known, attempts to double the Cape of Good Hope in the teeth of a gale, and swears that he will go through with it were he to sail till the end of the world. His oath is accepted in its literal meaning by the Evil One, who compels the unfortunate Dutchman to roam for ever over the ocean, far from his wife and his beloved Holland. Such is the rough old legend; but modern poets have taken pity on the weary wanderer of the main. Various dénouements have been invented, that adopted by Wagner being embodied in a curious fragmentary story by Heine. In the Memoirs of Herr von Schnabelewopski—alias Heine himself—the great humourist relates how, on his voyage from Hamburg to Amsterdam, he observed a vessel with blood-red sails, probably the phantom ship of the Flying Dutchman, whom, shortly afterwards, he saw in the flesh on the stage of the last-named city. The new feature added to the old story is this—that instead of unconditional doom, Vanderdecken's sentence is eternal homelessness unless he be relieved by the love of a woman "faithful unto death." The devil, stupid as he is, does not believe in female virtue, and consequently permits the captain to go ashore and take a wife once every seven years. Many unsuccessful attempts have been made by the poor Dutchman, till at last he meets with a Scotch (according to Wagner a Norwegian) skipper, and by the display of wealth, readily obtains his consent to a proposed marriage with his daughter. The daughter—Senta—has formed a romantic attachment for the doomed sailor, whose story she knows, and whose picture hangs in her room. By the likeness she recognises the real Flying Dutchman, and, in spite of her discovery, accepts the offer of his hand. At this juncture Schnabelewopski-Heine is, through an unforeseen and indescribable incident, called from the theatre, and returns only just in time to see the Dutchman on board his own ship, setting out for another voyage of hopeless despair. He loves his bride, and would save her from sharing his doom. But she, "faithful unto death," throws herself into the waves. Thus the spell is broken, and the Flying Dutchman, re-united with his bride, enters the long-closed gates of eternal rest. The idea of the Dutchman taking a wife first appears in a play by the late Fitzball, running at the Adelphi during Heine's visit to London, from which source the German poet most probably derived his beautiful idea of the redeeming love of woman further developed in Wagner's drama.

HAMBURG.—A number of German operatic singers, under the management of Herr Ferencz, Grand-Ducal Singer, of Weimar, have constituted themselves into a company, for the purpose of giving performances in Bergen, Christiana, and Stockholm. They are to embark from this port.

WAIFS.

ALBANI'S SENTA.—A more charming Senta than Mdle Albani could not well be imagined. She is not a dramatic singer in the sense that Mdle Tietjens or Mdme Materna are dramatic singers, but the gentle, dreamy nature of Wagner's heroine is realised by her in the most impressive manner. Her delivery of the ballad was exquisite, and throughout the piece her sympathetic soprano was turned to excellent account. With qualities such as these, she bids fair to be the Senta of the Italian stage.—Mayfair.

Mr and Mrs Emile Berger are passing their vacation at Nairn, N.B. From 1870 to 1876, both inclusive, some 280 new operas were produced in Italy.

M. Gounod has been decorated with the Commander's Cross of the Crown of Italy.

Fifty thousand francs are to be spent in re-decorating the Salle Ventadour for next season.

Mad. Materna has renewed her engagement at the Imperial Opera-house Vienna, for six years.

Señor Pablo de Sarasate will give concerts in Copenhagen and Stockholm during next winter.

M. Pasdeloup has returned to Paris with his orchestra from his concert tour in the French provinces.

The Imperial Opera-house, Vienna, closes on the 1st July, and does not re-open till the 14th August.

The Emperor of Austria has conferred the title of Imperial Austrian Chamber-Singer on Mad. Pauline Lucca.

Alarming reports have lately been circulated concerning the state of Vieuxtemps' health, but, happily, without foundation.

Sig. Ponchielli is composing two new operas: Olga, book by M. D'Ormeville; and I Mori di Venezia, book by Sig. Ghialanzoni.

The number of concerts given in Paris from the 3rd October, 1876, to the 6th June, 1877, amounted to four hundred and fifty-two.

A comic opera, Quentin Metzys, words by M. E. Dubreuil, music by M. E. Cherouvrier, has been accepted at the Théâtre-Lyrique.

The Komische Oper Joint-stock Company, Vienna, is to be wound up forthwith. Its losses during three years amount to no less than 557,282 florins.

Herr Heinrich Dorn, the Capellmeister, who has been seriously ill, but is now better, has gone to complete his convalescence at his Loschwitz Villa, near Dresden.

The French Minister of Fine Arts sent M. Charles Lamoureux to this country for the purpose of studying the organisation of the Handel Festival, under Sir Michael Costa.

Herr Joseph Tichatschek, the Nestor of German tenors, will celebrate on the 11th July, in Dresden, his 70th birthday. A committee has been formed to do honour to the event.

Miss Prytherch (Mrs Gerard Coventry) was the pianist last Saturday evening at Riviere's Promenade Concerts, and was recalled after her brilliant performance of a Rondo by Weber.

A new barytone, known in Italy as Sig. Strozzi, has been engaged by M. Carvalho at the Paris Opéra-Comique. He is a Frenchman and former prize-man of the Paris Conservatory, whose real name is Stroheker.

M. Albert Vincentini has been suffering from an abscess in the head. He has now recovered sufficiently to resume his managerial duties. Great changes are being effected in the company at the Théâtre-Lyrique.

Françoise de Rimini, words by M. Barbier, music by M. Ambroise Thomas, will be put into rehearsal at the Grand Opera, Paris, immediately after the performance of L'Africaine, that is to say, almost immediately.

Sig. Ferri has already engaged three tenors, Signori Masini, Stagno, and Campanini for the coming season at St Petersburg and Moscow. He has, also, signed with Mdmes Christine Nilsson, Heilbron, and Gerster. He is now in Paris, negotiating with Mdle Jenny Howe.

The receipts of the Société des Auteurs, Compositeurs, et Editeurs de Musique, for the financial year 1876-1877 amounted to 531,258 fr., 75 c., and the expenses to 112,331 fr., 47 c., or about 25 per cent. The expenses are undoubtedly high, but there is great difficulty in collecting the sums due.

Scaffolding has been erected in front of the Grand Opera, Paris. The edifice will be thoroughly cleaned for next year's Grand Exhibition. Advantage will be taken of the opportunity to add to Auber's bust the date of his death, and, it is to be hoped, to rectify that of Meyerbeer's birth from 1794 to 1791. Lastly, gas pipes will be laid along the bottom of the loggia and the top of the façade.

An international match of vocal associations is to be held in Paris during the Grand Exhibition under the direction of M. Laurent de Ritté. More than 30,000 persons will, it is said, take part in it.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—Professor Monk in the chair. On Monday, June 4, Mr C. K. Salaman read a paper on "English as a Language for Music." The prejudice which has long existed against English as a language for music probably dates from the introduction of Italian opera; it was soon found that it did not answer to employ English translations of the Italian text. Each language has its own music; and it is the transference of the music of one language to the words of another which is frequently objectionable. The existing prejudice is also contributed to by foreign singers, who attempt to sing in English, but are not able to pronounce it properly; even English singers are frequently defective in this respect. The imperfection of the phonetic elements of the language was admitted, and the way was pointed out in which the roughness ought to be evaded. The early Italian composers studied the musical quality of the language they employed with a care of which we have no conception. English has a special advantage in the extent and expressiveness of its vocabulary; Handel's songs are enough to show that any defects must be sought for elsewhere than in the language. Messrs Ellis, Osborne, Cummings, and the chairman, took part in the discussion which ensued.—Academy.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr. Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr. Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 873 and 1462. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

NEW PIANOFORTE PIECE BY MADAME OURY.

"CONSOLATION."

Easy of execution, but melodious and effective. Price 4s.; Half-price Cash or Stamps.

"We wonder who has not, in the hour of trouble, more than once derived comfort from the sweet sounds such as David must have used to mollify the troubled spirit of Saul. What better name, then, to give a graceful strain of peaceful melody, such as must convey to the sorrowing heart feelings of rest and sympathy, than 'Consolation'? Such is the title of a charming new piano-forte composition by that indefatigable and prolific writer, Madame Oury; prolific indeed, for the piece bears no lower an Opus number than 185. Its flow of peaceful melody, enhanced by the delicacy and variety of the accompaniment, and harmonised in the masterly style of an experienced writer, well fulfils the object of the title. In every sense of the word is 'Consolation' an admirable piece of music, and it must rank among Madame Oury's best efforts of the kind. As a morceau de salon it is of moderate difficulty, and of sufficient brilliance to display the capacities of a proficient performer. The composition is dedicated to Mrs Graver-Browne, of Morley Hall, and published by Messrs Paterson & Sons, of Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c."

The Fifty-fourth Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine has just been celebrated here. The artists engaged were Mlle Lili Lehmann (soprano) and Mlle Amelia Kling (contralto), of Berlin; Herr Wilhelm Candidus (tenor), Philadelphia; Herr George Henschel (barytone), of Berlin; and Señor Pablo de Sarasate (violinist), of Madrid. The first day was devoted to Haydn's Seasons, which had not been heard on the banks of the Rhine in its entirety—though fragments of it were given in 1828, 1865, and 1869—since the 10th May, 1818, when the first of these Festivals was inaugurated with it at Düsseldorf. The chorus this year numbered 549, and the orchestra 137. The performance, under the direction of Ferdinand Hiller, was highly successful. On the second day the first piece was the overture to Die Zauberflöte, played respectably, but no more. Then came Sig. Verdi's Missa da Requiem, which was performed under the personal direction of the composer, who had come for the express purpose. On making his appearance in the orchestra he was loudly cheered, and, as he was about to occupy the seat occupied in bygone years by such musicians as Mendelssohn, Ries, Spontini, Schumann, Spohr, Onslow, and many more, a lady stepped out from the Chorus and, in her own name and that of her sisters in art, offered him a splendid ivory and gold conducting stick. The gold handle bore the initial V in diamonds, surrounded by a laurel wreath upon blue enamel. At the conclusion of the Requiem, the maestro was the recipient of another present—a silver laurel wreath, tied with a golden bow. On each leaf was the name of one of the fair donors, admirers of his dramatic works. The Managing Committee, also, had, the day before, presented their guest with a copy of Professor Kaspar Scheuren's new Rhein Album, for which the artist had supplied two fresh title-pages expressly designed and executed by him for the occasion. On the first title-page are views of Cologne and Florence, beautifully executed in water-colours. Between and above them, respectively, are Verdi's portrait, and an inscription, bearing his name, his birthplace, and the date of the year in which he was born. Underneath are three pictures. The one in the middle has reference to the Requiem, that to the left represents the last scene from Aida, and that to the right is typical of the composer's Stringed Quartet, which has been performed in Cologne. Light arabesques of flowers, out of which peep children playing various instruments, surround the whole. The second title-page contains the dedication and signatures of the Committee. Over the dedication is a view of the hall of the Gürzenich. In the arabesque framework are the arms of the German Empire, those of the Kingdom of Italy, and of the three confederated Festival-Towns, Cologne, Aix-la-Chapelle, and Düsseldorf. Independently of these material evidences of respect, the reception of the Requiem was one series of continuous ovations. The execution of the work was, on the whole, satisfactory. The Requiem was succeeded by Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This was its twelfth time of performance at these Festivals. It was first included in a Rhenish Festival programme at Aix-la-Chapelle, on the 23rd of May, 1825, when Vienna was the only city in which it had been heard. Referring to this fact, Herr Hanchecorne, of Düsseldorf, says in a pamphlet he has recently published:—

"The Ninth Symphony then existed only in manuscript. Ries, the director of the Festival for the year 1825, was charged by the Managing Committee to ask his illustrious master for a copy of the score and of the separate parts. After long delays, caused by the sufferings of the great composer, who was doomed to die two years subsequently, Ries at length received on the 23rd March—that is, two months only prior to the concert—the object of his demand, but very incomplete, for the first three numbers were only in score, while of the last there were only the separate parts. For this long and important finale, it was necessary to re-write the score from the parts (a task which took thirty-four days), while, at the same time, several copies had to be made of the parts. Fancy how little time there was left for the rehearsals of such a work, then utterly unknown, and declared by Ries to be 'frightfully difficult.' If to this remark we add the fact that there were numerous errors in the hastily copied parts, the reader will not be astonished at hearing that Ries, to his great regret, was compelled to make some cuts in the Adagio, and suppress the Scherzo entirely. Despite all this, the work produced a profound sensation, and was the object of general admiration, a feeling which, judging by the comparative frequency with which the work is performed, has never declined."

The programme of the third day comprised: Part I. Overture to Manfred, Schumann; Air from Fidelio, Beethoven; "Agnus Dei" from Verdi's Requiem; Air from Spohr's Faust; Symphony in C major (new), Dr Ferdinand Hiller. Part II. Violin Concerto, Mendelssohn (played by Señor de Sarasate); Three Romances; three Violin Solos, with orchestral accompaniment, "Prelude," "Menuet," and "Moto perpetuo," from Suite by Raff (Señor de Sarasate); four Romances by Henschel (sung by the composer); and National Hymn, "Heil Dir im Siegerkrang," arranged by Dr Ferdinand Hiller for solos, chorus, and orchestra. The three Romances first named were to have been sung by Mlle Kling, while the air from Fidelio was assigned to Herr Candidus, but both artists were incapacitated by illness from appearing, and replaced, respectively, by Mlle Assmann and Herr Ernst. An especial attraction on the third day was Hiller's Symphony. The manner in which it was greeted fully bore out the success it had previously achieved at the usual Gürzenich Concerts. The veteran composer was enthusiastically applauded by his fellow-townsmen, who are justly proud of him. Señor de Sarasate, too, was the object of most hearty manifestations of delight and approval.

At the rehearsal on the last day Ferdinand Hiller read a letter in French from Verdi. Annexed is a translation:—

"My dear maestro Hiller,—If I could only make speeches like you, I would appear this moment at the rehearsal and express to the charming ladies who sing in the chorus my admiration and my gratitude for the zeal and talent with which they executed my Requiem. I would act in the same way to all the members of the chorus and orchestra, which are truly magnificent. It is owing to the energy and talent of all concerned that so fine a performance has been achieved. I am neither a master of language nor can I pay compliments; I, therefore, leave to your cleverness and amiable disposition the task of understanding my heart, and beg you to offer, in my name, my thanks and best wishes to all concerned. Thank them, also, for the marks of esteem which they have lavished, in so able and gentle a manner, on me. I feel honoured and proud at having been invited to one of these grand Festivals, in which all your great composers have taken part, and I cherish the warmest wish that these gatherings may continue with equal brilliancy to the honour of Germany and of universal art.—Yours truly,

"G. VERDI."

After the supper, which, as usual, closed the proceedings on the third day, Hiller drank Verdi's health in French and German. After praising his visitor as a composer, he said it was the maestro's presence which had attracted so large a concourse to Cologne. He added, by way of peroration, that, while applauding Verdi the artist, Germany was welcoming the Italian citizen, the friend of Victor Emmanuel, and that his presence on German soil was a sign of union between Italy and Germany, two nations that feel more and more the necessity of such a union.

At one time, by the way, it was by no means certain that Verdi's Requiem would be performed. Many persons alleged that none but classical works ought to be selected for the Festival, and that the Requiem was an affected, shallow, frivolous composition unworthy such an honour. They asserted, likewise, that it had been chosen merely for the sake of enticing Verdi to Cologne, and attracting thereby large multitudes. In some clever remarks at the head of the programme, Ferdinand Hiller combated these assertions, but, in so doing, deeply wounded the Wagnerites, who considered that certain passages in what he said were highly offensive to themselves. They particularly objected to the following:

"The most salutary fact connected with this work" (Verdi's Requiem) "is that it forms a living protest against the encroachments of an absurd system of vocal music, in which the servants are transformed into the masters, and in which a man, instead of being able to sing with all the expansion of an artist's soul, is reduced to pronouncing distinctly some few wretched words, a system which is and always will be an absurdity, even when handled with genius and applauded with fanaticism. However, before people have had time to recover from their mistake, the system will be consigned to the colossal lumber-room where are kept the errors in æsthetics, philosophy, poetry, and prose, to which our own age, enlightened though it be, has not failed to contribute its share."

In reply, the Wagnerites attacked Hiller tooth and nail, but the worthy and respected Stadtcapellmeister carried too many guns for them, and the Fifty-fourth Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine proved a decided success, and added a fresh proof of the old adage: All's well that ends well. N.

* Delayed in transmission.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL. (RETROSPECT.)

The concluding day of the Festival, as rarely fails to be the case, proved the triumph of the week. The oratorio was Israel in Egypt; and as the interest of these grand performances is mainly concentrated in the achievements of the 3,000 chorus singers who take part in them, it is not to be wondered at. In no work of the kind—the Messiah itself not excepted—has Handel dealt so marvelously with this important element of musical expression. The first section of Israel (latest, it is believed, in the order of production) comprises no fewer than thirteen choruses, which, with scarcely any interruption, follow one upon another. These, it need hardly be stated, are the choruses descriptive of the plagues with which Moses, striving for the exodus of the chosen people, afflicted the Egyptians, their obdurate taskmasters. To hear them sung as they are sung under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, with the resources at the command of the Crystal Palace directors and the Sacred Harmonic Society on such exceptional occasions, is to hear them as they can be heard under no other circumstances. After Mr Lloyd had spoken the recitative, "Now they arose a new King over Egypt, which knew not Joseph," the first chorus, "And the children of Israel sighed," gave a foretaste of what was to come; and this was strengthened by the forcible delivery of "They loathed to drink of the river"—a piece of suggestive writing enough to convince anyone that those who rail against the fugal style as a medium of choral expression are strangely in error. Nothing could more emphatically convey the sentiment and meaning of the words. Why Handel declined treating the curse of frogs and pestilence in the choral form has been often discussed, though it seems to us clearly explained by the fact that the curse of flies, lice, and locusts constitutes the theme of "He spake the word," the characteristic double-chorus immediately following. This was given in a manner difficult to surpass. "He gave them hailstones for rain" created the accustomed impression, and was encoored with such unanimity that Sir Michael Costa, autocrat as he is, was unable to resist the appeal. Here, again, we have an example of how Handel could produce a tremendous effect by aid of the simplest expedients. The mysterious choral recitation, "He sent a thick darkness over the land," a frequent test of the ability of large bodies of singers to keep steadily in tune, so extraordinary and unanticipated are its progressions, was mastered with perfect ease, and at the final sentence, "Even darkness which might be felt," there was scarcely a noticeable difference in the pitch. "He smote all the first-born of Egypt," "But as for His people," and the imposing climax, "There was not one feeble person among their tribes" (a peculiarly Handelian touch) were not less happy; while with the quaint fugal episode, "And Egypt was glad when they departed," the singers took as much pains as with anything else that had preceded it, the result, even to the most tutored ear, being in the highest degree satisfactory. Thence to the conclusion of Part I. all was to match. The fortissimo, "He rebuked the Red Sea," was as grand as the succeeding pianissimo, "And it was dried up," was impressive. Equally fine was "He led them through the deep," leading up in stately grandeur, to "The waters overwhelmed their enemies," the magnificent peroration—a grander execution of which was probably never heard. The succeeding chorus, "And Israel saw that great work," which brings the first part of the oratorio to a conclusion, is simply a comment upon what has gone before, but the manner of its performance was on a par with the rest.

We cannot enter into the same minute details about Part II., "The song of praise of Moses," which Handel originally called "Exodus," and which is merely a recapitulation of the miracles described in the first. That it begins and ends with a chorus, "Sing ye to the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously," in olden times familiarly styled "The horse and his rider," every one is aware, and that it contains some of the most splendid among the choruses of Handel all musicians know. The performance generally of these was singularly correct and almost uniformly effective. We may especially refer to "With the blast of Thy nostrils" and "The people shall hear and be afraid," the two most elaborately-constructed and difficult of the entire series, the rendering of which by such an enormous body of voices was little short of marvellous. That, apart from "The horse and his rider," the strongest impression created on the multitude of listeners was by the stirring double chorus, "Thy right hand, O Lord," with its jubilant sequel, "hath dashed in pieces the enemy," may be taken for granted. But enough has been said with reference to the choruses to convey a general notion of how our English lovers of Handel, when assembled together in thousands, can do justice to Handel's music. All the applause they obtained was legitimately won; and they have a just right to feel proud.

The solo vocalists have not nearly so much to do in Israel as in other oratorios of Handel, but what they have to do is important. When it is stated that the leading singers were Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington, Edith Wynne, and Patey, Herr Henschel, Messrs Edward Lloyd and Santley, it will be at once understood that none other than trained and competent artists were employed. As is invariably the case, the two pieces which obtained the most applause were the duet for basses, "The Lord is a man of war" (Mr Santley and Herr Henschel), and the tenor air, "The enemy said, I will pursue." The last was given by Mr Lloyd with such spirit and vigour that the audience insisted upon an encore, and Sir Michael Costa assenting, the air was repeated amid renewed applause. Madame Patey's solos were "Their land brought forth frogs" (Part 1) and "Thou shalt bring them in" (Part 2), to Madame Edith Wynne being assigned "Thou didst blow with thy wind"—each being sung in the best and purest taste, as were the duets, "The Lord is my strength" (Madame Sherrington and Madame Wynne), and "Thou in Thy mercy" (Madame Patey and Mr Lloyd). Madame Sherrington declaimed the recitatives of Miriam, which usher in the final chorus, "Sing ye to the Lord."

The National Anthem, as arranged by Sir Michael Costa, was then given by chorus and orchestra, and, after loud and repeated applause, the vast assembly dispersed. The total number of visitors present was 19,455. We may conclude with saying that the management of the festival was in the highest degree creditable to all concerned. No hitch, no disappointment, occurred during the week. How much of this is due to the careful supervision of Sir Michael Costa need scarcely be urged.

(From "the Graphic," June 30.)

By the time these lines are printed the sixth "Triennial" and eighth bond fide "Handel Festival" at the Crystal Palace will be over. To enter into any fresh account of its original intent would be superfluous. For how many years it is destined to last can only be a matter of speculation. The originally professed object has now no further significance; and, as we do not hold Triennial Festivals in honour of Shakespeare himself, it is hard to explain why such celebrations should be perpetually kept up in the name of one, however illustrious, who, though during the most fruitful period of his artistic life, a resident in England, was by birth a German. Meanwhile, apart from these considerations, the Handel Festival maintains its supremacy, as not only the foremost thing of its kind in England, but in Europe. Nowhere else—not even in Germany—could such an army of singers and players, so generally competent and so enthusiastic in the cause upon which they are engaged, be brought together under one roof, for one common purpose. That Handel-worship among us does not solely spring from a love and veneration for music which in its way has never been excelled, but from strong sympathy with the themes it has so eloquently set forth, is unquestionable. "The Lord gave the word, great was the company of preachers"—says the Psalmist—a chorus by the way, which, though essential to the significance of the ensuing air, "How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Gospel of peace," is too often omitted—(as on Monday); but great as was the company of the preachers then, and still greater since, never did preacher discourse more convincingly on a subject of the deepest interest than that preacher whose name was Handel. Even Jeremy Taylor, to whom we are indebted for "The Liberty of Prophecy," would have acknowledged this without a murmur. Thus Handel is doubly enshrined in the affections of the English people, in whom the sentiment of revealed religion, whatever Locke may have written about "innate ideas," would seem to be innate. In the Festival held this week at the Crystal Palace we have listened to two imperishable masterpieces, the Oratorio of the New Testament and the Oratorio of the Old—The Messiah and Israel in Egypt, one illustrating, in sublime strains, the redemption of mankind, the other, in strains scarcely less sublime, the deliverance from bondage of God's chosen people. We cannot but think that the order of their presentation should be reversed—that Israel, in fact, should be given first and The Messiah last. Here, however, we have to deal with artistic prejudices. Israel, which shows how Handel could not merely invent for himself, but make free use of the works of his predecessors and contemporaries, ranks higher in the opinion of some (musicians especially) than The Messiah, wherein, inspired throughout, he relied exclusively on his own magnificent resources. But grand as is Israel, The Messiah is yet grander. The respective themes alone, treated by a musician like the "Saxon Giant," would render that inevitable. Israel is the fifth, as The Messiah is the sixth of Handel's nineteen English oratorios; yet while the Gospel of peace, and love, and charity must always take precedence of the Exodus of the Hebrews, however marvellously set forth, any attempt to surpass Handel in either achievement would be futile. In addition to these unrivalled pieces, we have had a miscellaneous selection which, on the second day of the festival (Wednesday) separated one oratorio from the other. Beginning with the overture to the Occasional Oratorio—which the additional instrumentation found expedient makes almost overwhelming, even in such a vast arena as that of the Crystal Palace Central Transept, where the orchestra alone is capable of accommodating little short of 4,000 performers, vocal and instrumental—the programme included various excerpts from compositions both sacred and secular, all, as a matter of course, by Handel. A few more unfamiliar things—such as the excerpts from Belshazzar, Athaliah, Deborah, Hercules, and Joshua—would have been welcome. At the same time it must be admitted that Wednesday's programme was both varied and interesting. Perhaps on no former occasion have the performances been more striking and effective. The choruses, especially, almost without exception, were superbly rendered; and it is gratifying to know we have at command a multitude of singers so thoroughly conversant, not only with The Messiah and Israel, but with the less generally familiar among the works of Handel, secular as well as sacred. About the orchestra, and Sir Michael Costa, the eminent chief whose conductor's stick it obeyed with military discipline, to say anything in praise would be to repeat an oft-told story. The leading vocalists during the week have been Mdmes Adelina Patti, Edith Wynne, Clara Suter, Lemmens-Sherrington, and Patey; Mlle Albani; Messrs Cummings, Vernon Rigby, E. Lloyd, and Santley; Herr Henschel and Signor Foli—the name of our greatest singer in oratorio, Mr Sims Reeves, being absent for the first time since 1857, when the earliest experiment with what speedily grew into the Handel Festival, as we now recognise it, was tried, under the auspices of the Sacred Harmonic Society, the zealous directors of which are still its active promoters and managers. Not a single duet was comprised in the programme of Wednesday's selection; so that each vocalist was permitted, like a fixed star, to shine with unborrowed light. That the lucida sidera, in their respective spheres, were Adelina Patti and Emma Albani, will readily be imagined. Both were received with enthusiasm, Albani in the most important soprano music of The Messiah, Patti in two of the great soprano airs from Samson and Judas Maccabeus—"Let the bright Seraphim" and "From mighty kings." So unanimous and demonstrative was the applause bestowed upon the latter that Mdme Patti had no alternative but to return to the platform and repeat it, from beginning to end. She has never sung more finely, or more convincingly declared herself an accomplished mistress in a style of music possessing so little in common with that with which she is ordinarily accustomed to delight the many admirers of her genius.

Of the performance of Israel in Egypt (yesterday) and the general results of the festival, with regard to the success of which no doubt can now be entertained, we must defer speaking.

SIMS REEVES not AT THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

(From the "Daily News," June 30.)

In recording the close of this year's Festival, it is impossible to avoid expressing a feeling of regret (such as must have been widely experienced) at the absence of Mr Sims Reeves, whose co-operation has been so important a feature at each of the previous celebrations. No singer has so especially identified himself with the tenor solo music of Handel; which, heretofore, was probably never—and, perhaps, hereafter, may never again be—so finely rendered as by him. His transcendent merits as an exponent of the pathos, dignity, and declamatory grandeur intended by the composer (but so rarely realised by the interpreter), will long live in the memory of the appreciative section (now a large majority) of the musical public. These remarks imply no disparagement of other excellent English tenors who have obtained deserved eminence as Handelian singers. They themselves would be among the first to admit the supremacy which has long been maintained by Mr Reeves.

The Dying Swan.

(SONNET.)

Restless and more troubled eddies on
The river's current toward the northern sea,
And on its dreariness a dying swan
Is being shrouded o'er by destiny,
Whose brackish mists press cold upon the wan
And solitary prey. And now the land Grows vague on either side the mighty stream.

Night creeps in, stretching and tremendous.* Grand,
In mingled dread and quiet, Ocean lies,
Sooth'd by the soulful mist o'erclimbing gleam†

Of dreaming bird; then through the evening light
A mystic sadness echoes to the skies,
And on that sound the spirit wings its flight.

REULING.

Ludwig Wilhelm Reuling, "K. K. Hofopern-Kapellmeister A.D.," or "Imperial and Royal Chapelmaster on the Retired List," died at Munich on the 26th April, after a long illness. Born on the 22nd December, 1802, the deceased received his first instruction from his father, who was Inspector and Town-Pastor of the Evangelical Church, Darmstadt. His precocious talent was fostered by the celebrated organist, C. M. Rink, with such good results, that, when only seven years old, he was allowed to play in the orchestra of the Grand-Ducal Theatre. In 1824 he went to Vienna to finish his education. He studied there under Ignaz v. Siegfried, and, thanks to Beethoven's mediation, under Alois Förster, the celebrated professor of general bass. That he might prolong his stay in the Austrian capital, he began giving lessons and composing. His compositions displayed talent, and quickly attracted notice. Without pretensions to any particular musical value, they fulfilled their object and were favourably received. Foremost among them may be mentioned Das Fest der Handwerker, a piece which, thanks to the music, ran more than one hundred nights when first produced, and is still an attraction on the German stage. Reuling also composed for the Kärntnerthor Theater (1830-36) various ballets, such as Die Vestalin (in which he employed several motives from Spontini's opera of the same name), and various operas, comprising Ulysses and Alfred der Grosse, which last achieved a great success in 1840. Another opera, Der letzte Graf von Anzor, was never performed.

VIENNA.—The late Dr A. W. Ambros, whose premature death is so deeply regretted, left behind him a collection of some 1,500 different musical works, dating from the 15th, 16th, and 17th centuries, arranged by him in full score from the original notation. It is, perhaps, the finest collection in existence of old Netherlandish, Italian, and German masters. Its value is, moreover, greatly increased by historical and biographical notices, and critical remarks, constituting a rich store of materials for connoisseurs and practical musicians. According to report, Herr Wilhelm Westmayer, of this city, in conjunction with an art amateur, outbidding all offers from abroad, has purchased the collection from the family in order to present it to some art institution in Austria for the public benefit.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

(RETROSPECT.)

We are scarcely bold enough to speculate upon the motives which influence the actions, generally so inscrutable, of an opera director; but it is fair to suppose that Mr Gye, in producing the Duke of Saxe-Coburg's Santa Chiara trusted somewhat to the position of the author, and the fact that he is the brother-in-law and cousin of our Queen. If he did so, results showed the usually astute manager to have been, for once, out in his reckoning. The public did not care a jot about Santa Chiara, either for its own sake or for its origin, and no more of them attended the performance than were required to make up the worst house of the season. Into the causes of this it would be interesting, though perhaps bootless, to enquire. Some amateurs, with a just knowledge of amateur capacity, may have argued with themselves that no one of their number, and a reigning Duke least of all, could write an opera worth hearing. Others, acquainted with the musical works of the Coburg family, may have formed conclusions leading to the same practical result; while others, possibly, may have brushed up their recollections of an earlier opera from the same source brought out 25 years ago at Her Majesty's Theatre under the then moribund management of Mr Lumley. Casilda—so the work was called—is said to have had a succès de courtoisie, and the critics of the day, not to be outdone, pleasantly remarked, "As the production of an amateur who makes that the amusement of his leisure moments which to master thoroughly demands the undivided attention of a life, it may be regarded with complacency, if not altogether with indulgence." Casilda was played twice, and then disappeared from the stage, and even from the frequented chambers of memory, till Santa Chiara came to remind us of its existence in the lumber-room. We will not disturb it there, but turn to its successor—a work which his Royal Highness was good enough to compose, during, or shortly before, 1854. Its first performance took place in October of that year; and in 1855 it was produced at the Grand Opera of Paris, where, like Casilda in London, it seems to have been received with courtesy. The Duke was grateful for permission to figure on so illustrious a stage, and bestowed orders, snuff-boxes, bracelets, and trinkets upon the manager and artists with a profusion which it would pain the Covent Garden people to hear described in full. But Santa Chiara did not keep a place before the public. Like the sister work it vanished, and we are utterly powerless to conceive any reason, apart from that already named, why Mr Gye thought fit to bring it again into the light of the lamps. To tell the simple, honest truth, Santa Chiara, its orchestration excepted, is a worthless thing. At this some may remonstrate with shocked voices, saying, "The composer is a Royal Duke, and criticism should remember the fact." True, the composer is a Royal Duke, and as such deserves respect. But when he puts aside the sceptre to wield the pen we know nothing of him as a Prince. He must take his chance with common folk, for there is a republic of art as well as of letters, and within its frontiers the only grades of rank are determined by ability. Regardless, therefore, of the distinguished origin of Santa Chiara, and judging it as though we had to deal with an opera by Brown, Jones, or Robinson, we say that it is worthless, and ought never to have found a place on the Covent Garden stage.

The libretto, written by M. Gustave Oppelt upon another by M^{me} Birch-Pfeiffer, is unfortunate in its subject. Nothing can be conceived more wanting in moral purport. It introduces us at the outset into an atmosphere of villany, and keeps us there with but an occasional breath of purer air, all to no purpose, unless to convey the trite lesson that a murderer may come to a bad end. In the first act we witness the attempt of the Czarewicz Alexis to poison his wife, Charlotte of Austria, after heaping upon her all possible humiliation. The attempt fails because the Prince's physician substitutes a sleeping draught for the death potion, and we, who are in the secret, discern that there is yet hope for Victor de St Auban, a young Frenchman who loves the Princess, and is loved by her in return. The second act shows us the funeral rites performed over the supposed dead body. But Charlotte is not buried alive. A worthy archimandrite so arranges that, while the Court is busy with religious duties, the Princess is carried off, leaving an empty coffin for the mourners to bewail. In the third act Charlotte has become the idol of Italian peasants, to whom she is known for her goodness as Santa Chiara. Both Alexis and St Auban soon appear on this new scene. The amiable Prince, having attempted his father's life, is flying from justice, represented by the young Frenchman and other agents of the Czar. St Auban and Santa Chiara meet, to the astonishment of the lover, who believes her dead; and just then Alexis enters. The two men prepare to fight, but the apparition of the Princess so terrifies her husband that he stabs himself. What follows is indicated when Santa Chiara falls into the Frenchman's arms. Upon this story we shall waste no words. It is morbid and unhealthy in the extreme, without a single redeeming feature. As for the funeral act, its ghastliness is an offence, and not even a tolerant, good-natured English audience could refrain from expressions of displeasure. Our comments upon the music must be equally brief. It is hopelessly dull from beginning to end, and has not even the merit of a good imitation. All that the Duke says is his own, but, unhappily, never worth the saying, and the opera streams on without exciting the faintest musical interest, much less showing any of the high qualities which alone are able to justify such a work before the public. Taking the opera altogether, our astonishment at its production is unbounded, and every amateur who witnessed the performance on Saturday night will join us in counselling Mr Gye to adopt, in future, a different standard of choice. Even the reputation of the Royal Italian Opera could not survive many such mistakes.

The performance did little to make amends for the character of the work. The scenic effects were as good as usual at this house, while M. Capoul as St Auban, Signor Cotogni as Alexis, M^{lle} Smeroschi as Bertha (a favourite attendant), and M^{lle} D'Angeri as the heroine, exerted themselves strenuously. But nothing could save the opera. The claque applauded, but the hisses of a portion of the audience proper spoke the feeling of the majority, who sat in solemn silence.—Daily Telegraph, July 2nd.

BERLIN.

(From a Correspondent.)

The Royal Operahouse closed on the 23rd June. From the 1st September, 1876, up to that date, there were 219 operative performances. This number does not include a morning performance of Grisar's opera, Bon Soir, Sig. Pantalon, but it does include the plays with music, such as Struensee, Preziosa, A Midsummer Night's Dream, Manfred, &c. The performances were furnished by 47 works of 29 composers. The novelties were: Die Folkunger, 5 acts, Kretschmer; Der Widerspänstigen Zähmung, 4 acts, Götz; Genoveva, 4 acts, Robert Schumann; and Der König hat's gesagt (Le Roi l'a dit), 3 acts, Delibes. The following is the respective number of times the different operas were represented:—12 times: Lohengrin. 10 times: Der Widerspänstigen Zähmung, Tannhäuser, Il Trovatore. 9 times: Der Freischütz, Faust. 8 times: La Fille du Regiment, Fidelio, Das Goldene Kreuz. 7 times: Le Nozze di Figaro, Guillaume Tell. 6 times: Der Fliegende Holländer, Die Folkunger, Le Prophète. 5 times: Die Maccabäer, Le Domino Noir, Genoveva, Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor, Don Juan, Die Zauberflöte, Les Huguenots, Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg. 4 times: Iphigénie en Tauride, La Muette. 3 times: Fernando Cortez, Mignon, Cesarion, Le Roi l'a dit, Euryanthe, Joseph en Egypte, Hamlet, L'Africaine, Stradella, Le Postillon de Longjumeau, Martha, La Dame Blanche. Twice: Armide, Rienzi, Aida, Tristan und Isolde, Le Porteur d'Eau, Oberon, La Juive, Bon Soir, Sig. Pantalon. Once: Jessonda. The order of the composers ranged according to the number of performances is: R. Wagner, 37 performances, with 6 works; Mozart, 17, with 3; Meyerbeer, 15, with 4; Weber, 14, with 3; Verdi, 12, with 2; Auber, 10, with 3; Götz, 10, with 1; Gounod, 9, with 1; Beethoven, Brüll, and Donizetti, 8, with 1; Rossini, 7, with 1; Gluck, and Thomas, 6, with 2; Kretschmer, 6, with 1; Flotow, 6, with 2; Rubinstein, Schumann, and Nicolai, 5, with 1; Spontini, Adam, Delibes, Taubert, Méhul, and Boieldieu, 3, with 1; Grisar, Halévy, and Cherubini, 2, with 1; and Spohr, 1 with 1.

JULY.*

The rose said to the swallow
One bright day in July,
Thy flight I long to follow,
Would I had wings to fly.
But tell me, summer bird,
What hast thou seen and heard;
In wandering hast thou found
That bright and hallowed ground
Where sorrow dwelleth not?
Tell me of that fair spot,
That dell of calm repose,
Where dieth not the rose,
Where tear-drops never flow.
Oh! speak, I long to know.

Then sadly spake the swallow:
The spot I've tried to trace,
And searched till I am weary,
But cannot find the place.
Yet far and wide I've flown,
To haunts by you unknown,
And tried my best to find
One quite contented mind,
One that hath felt no pain;
The quest has been in vain.
You will be grieved to know
Each heart hath its own woe;
But all is for the best,
This world is not their rest.

RICHARD WAGNER'S TOILET AT HOME.*

The piquant feuilleton concerning Richard Wagner, which I informed you would shortly appear, was published on Saturday in the Neue freie Presse. Spitzer, the well-known author of the Wiener Spaziergänge, has thoroughly worked out the materials at his command, and not let slip so favourable an opportunity for displaying, under Bengal fire, Wagner's character from a perfectly new point of view. In the preface to some articles which he entitles Censuren, and which, by the way, are utter failures, Wagner says: "But my object in this collection is something more serious than to write books; I am desirous of rendering an account of myself to my friends, so that they may be enlightened with regard to much that is difficult to be understood in me." Spitzer desires to assist the composer in carrying out the above notion, and, perhaps, the fact of some one else besides himself devoting his energies to the task, which the composer considers so exceedingly serious, of contributing to our enlightenment respecting him, may get over the objectionable circumstance of the public's seeing the composer only in the light in which he considers it advisable to be seen. Painters and sculptors have idealised away from his head all the mean and ugly traits which force themselves upon the spectator at the first glance; his partisans, too, have surrounded Wagner, the man, with a nimbus, which encircles him with a brilliancy rendering him unrecognisable; and though anyone who can read may discover his real character in his writings, the master has protected the products of his mind, as Wotan protects his daughter, the Walkyre, with a "flickering glow" of wearisomeness, verbal inflation, and obscureness of thought, against the reader "der frech es wagte, dem freislichen Felsen zu nahen."

Wagner, in pink satin drawers, white satin jacket, richly padded pink satin dressing-gown, with a satin sash, five ells long! Who would have believed it possible!—Spitzer takes his "materials" from a collection of sixteen letters written by Wagner. He calls his article "Letters from Richard Wagner to a Dressmaker." Nothing can be happier than the motto which heads the article, "Wie gleicht er dem Weibe!"† (Walküre, Act I., Hunding). Spitzer says, "In a catalogue lately published by a dealer in autographs of a highly interesting collection of original musical manuscripts, I found offered, for sale, sixteen letters 'of a peculiar nature' written by Richard Wagner in the years 1865-1868." I am in a position to supplement what Spitzer tells us. The well-known composer, K., in Vienna, a zealous collector of and dealer in many things, especially coins and musical manuscripts, came into possession, heaven knows how, of these sixteen letters from Wagner, to which were added three or four letters of similar purport from the pen of Mme Kosima. In his catalogue, which was distributed a fortnight since, and comprised manuscripts of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, &c., the following notice appeared towards the end: "Wagner Richard: 16 Letters, mostly from Lucerne in Switzerland, with some from Munich and its environs, dating from the years 1865-1868, and one of the year 1864, from Penzing (near Vienna)—all these letters are of a peculiar nature—with 9 interesting documents extra, relating to them." "The somewhat high price demanded for these letters," as Spitzer tells us further on: "slightly diminished my wish to purchase them, though it greatly increased my curiosity, and, as the latter was luckily shared by the editor of the Neue freie Presse, I was soon enabled to buy the letters and publish them for the amusement of the numerous readers of the paper." This piece of information, also, I can amplify. The letters were purchased by a private person for 100 florins, and passed from him into the hands of Herr Spitzer; unless, as is more probable, they were bought for Herr Spitzer at first.

But I will no longer keep your readers in ignorance as to the contents of the letters, and you may as well have two or three printed. All the others turn on the same subject, and mostly contain fresh orders.

Dear Miss Bertha,—I am sorry to say that I cannot let you have anything this week, for matters are not going on at all as I could wish, and I shall have probably to be up and stirring to look after my affairs in other places myself. But do not be under any apprehension. Believe me that I am most desirous of fully satisfying and recompensing you, the very instant it is possible, for your patience. On this you may rely. Respectfully your obedient

RICHARD WAGNER.

Penzing, 22nd March, 1864.

This was succeeded soon afterwards by the following from Starnberg:—

When I saw you last May in Vienna, you expressed a wish to receive further orders from me.

I feel myself still under obligation to you; furthermore, you are acquainted with the models which I use for my house clothes, &c., and it is difficult to find here a good stock of materials from which to choose; besides, I prefer having some one to supply me. If, therefore, you like to furnish me permanently for the future with what I want, I am contented; only I should desire both for this, as well as for all you may lay out, as the latter cannot be calculated in advance, an annual account, which I should always settle at the end of the year. If you can comply with my wishes, I would at once let you have some orders. In this case, I should feel much obliged by your giving me the information I require about the following things:—

1. Can you obtain at Szontag's a good heavy satin, of the light brown colour I enclose?
2. Likewise of the dark pink?
3. Can a good quality of the enclosed light pink be had for from 4 to 5 florins?
4. The same for the blue, only I should like it lighter; by no means darker.
5. Has Szontag a sufficient stock of the new red or crimson coloured heavy satin, with which you lined my white dressing gown (with the flowered pattern)?
6. Have you still any of the dark yellow, of which we made the curtains for the little tables?

Please let me have proper patterns, in small pieces, of these 6 colours and fabrics, and, at the same time, be kind enough to inform me whether you can entertain my proposal. I should like you to do so, because such a plan is the most convenient for me, and its adoption would enable me to give you constant employment.

I trust you have still the patterns for the cut of my clothes.

In expectation of your answer, I remain respectfully your obedient

RICHARD WAGNER.

For the present: Starnberg near Munich.

P.S.—Do not confound No. 2, the dark pink, with the old violet pink, which is not what I mean, but real pink, only very dark and fiery.

To F. C. Burnand, Esq.

DEAR SIR,—It is not in France alone that the financial year just past has proved less satisfactory than the year preceding for the theatres. In Germany there has been a diminution of 10 per cent. in the receipts of the Society of Dramatic Authors and Composers, the returns being 98,000 and 108,000 marcs respectively. Mark, when marcs are spoken of, "respectively," something more is expected—if only "k" in lieu of "o"—as, per example, a hard Kaiser in lieu of a soft Cæsar. "Sieze her" does not hit it; so keep your pun for another occasion. Thine, with reverence not easy to define in a crucial sense,

BARBAGRIGLIA.

MARSEILLES.—Mdlle Jenny Howe has been singing here.

DIEPPE.—A theatre has been opened connected with the Casino.

GHENT.—A grand Musical Festival, under the direction of M. Waelput, will shortly be given here.

VIENNA.—The Komische-Oper has been knocked down for 600,000 florins to the Town Enlargement Board, and will probably be razed to the ground.

VENICE.—The Fenice will not be opened this year, in consequence of a great many persons having refused to rent the boxes hitherto occupied by them.

CARLSRUHE.—A fine Concert Room capable of accommodating more than 5,000 persons has been opened. It is a great deal larger than the Gürzenich, Cologne, or the Musikvereinsaal, Vienna.

NEW LAMPS FOR OLD.
(Arabian Nights.)

DR W—E.—Well, G—z, we have had some new lamps.
PROFESSOR G—z.—Yes—but I think the old lamps give purer light. Phil—c the Elder has made the same mistake—as W. G. C—s must own. "A. C." of the "Pops," himself, should mind what he's about.

DR W—E.—And A. M—s, with his Maseppa.

PROFESSOR G—z.—Oh! oh! oh!
DR W—E.—Ah! ah! ah!

RICHARD WAGNER TESTIMONIAL.

COMMITTEE.

Lord LINDSAY, M.P.
Dr W. POLE, F.R.S.
Hon. RICHARD GROSVENOR.
Mr GEORGE CRITCHETT.

Rev. H. R. HAWES.
Dr F. HUEFFER.
Mr J. S. BERGHEIM.
Mr EDWARD DANNREUTHER.

A TESTIMONIAL of Regard in commemoration of his Visit to England will be presented to Herr WAGNER. The Committee appeal to all his English friends and admirers to join in it. All contributions will be duly acknowledged in the Times. Cheques to be made out to the Honorary Treasurer, Hon. RICHARD GROSVENOR, 12, Orme Square, W., and crossed "The Wagner Testimonial Fund—Messrs Drummond."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ERRATUM.—In the notice of Mme Sainton's Concert at the Royal Academy of music, inserted in the Musical World of June 6th, for "Miss Howe" read "Miss Hoare" sang "Rejoice greatly."

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.'s, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyl Street (First Floor). It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 7, 1877.

SALZBURG MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

AT the "Ovation," which will form part of the second day's proceedings (18th July), on the Kapuzinerberg, before the Pavillion, in which, as we know, Mozart concluded Die Zauberflöte, one of the pieces performed will be a Hymn for mixed chorus, with reed-band accompaniment. The words of the Hymn are by Dr Märzroth, and the music by the Capellmeister, Herr Max von Weinzierl. Actuated by reverence for the great composer, the Baroness Bertha Schwarz has adorned the little garden round the Pavillion with a bust of him, the principal events in connection with the production of Die Zauberflöte being recorded on the pedestal. There has been a very lively demand for places, so that nearly all the seats at twenty florins and nearly all those at five are taken. There is still, however, a tolerably large number left of places at fifteen and ten florins for all three concerts. They may be procured of Herr Karl Haalinger, Vienna (No. 19, Graben), and of Herr Karl Spangler and Herr Heinrich Dieter, here. In order to spare visitors all trouble as to apartments, the Apartments Committee (Wohnungs-Comité), with Herr Scheible, the Vice-Burgomaster, at its head, will pay due attention to all questions and directions regarding apartments during the festival, provided the questions and directions are forwarded early enough. Finally, intending visitors are again reminded that return tickets, available for a fortnight, are issued at the reduction of a third by the following railways:—The Empress Elizabeth, West; the Crown Prince Rudolph; the Franz Joseph; the Bohemian, West; the Austrian State; and the South.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—On Thursday night one of the finest performances of Lohengrin ever heard was given under the direction of Sir Michael Costa. Wagner himself would have gone into ecstasies with Christine Nilsson's Elsa, and would have been more than satisfied with the Lohengrin of Signor Fancelli. The other leading parts were sustained by Mme Marie Roze, Herr Rokitsansky, and Signor Galassi. More in our next.

M. FRANCIS PLANTE, the acknowledged chief of French pianists, played on Thursday afternoon at the French Embassy for a most worthy charity. About the charity it is not in our province to speak; but we have a right to express our entire acquiescence with all the praises that have been lavished on M. Planté by his compatriots. He is a great artist, in the truest acceptation of the phrase—a very great artist, indeed.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

AUBER composed 44 operas; Bellini, 10; Carafa, 34; Coccia, 37; Donizetti, 66; Halévy, 32, 4 of which have not been performed; Mercadante, 59, including some never performed; Meyerbeer, 15; Mozart, 20; Pacini, 115, including cantatas and oratorios; Lauro Rossi, 29; Rossini, 39; and Verdi, 27.

Mlle LOUISE BERTIN, who died not long since, was very nearly setting La Dame blanche. According to the Gaulois, the facts are as follow. As Scribe was going with the manuscript to the Salle Favart, without having any notion to what musician the management intended entrusting his libretto, he met M. Armand Bertin, editor of Les Débats. "What have you under your arm?" asked the journalist. "A manuscript, I suppose?" "You are not mistaken; it is the libretto of a three-act opera." "What is the title?" "La Dame d'Avenel." "Have you a composer?" Scribe smelt a rat. Bertin was going to suggest his daughter. But Scribe had only a very limited amount of confidence in the lady. On the other hand, it was dangerous to offend the autocrat of so influential a journal as Les Débats. "I am deeply sorry," he replied, not without a little hesitation, "but I am bound to—" "To whom?" "To Boieldieu." With these words, the two speakers parted. But Scribe did not pursue his road to the theatre. He hurried off to Boieldieu's. "My dear fellow," he exclaimed, rushing in like a madman, "look at this immediately, and, should M. Bertin ask whether you are going to compose the music, as I have asserted, do not give a negative answer, I beg of you. If you do, I am undone, ruined." At this moment, there was a ring at the composer's door. It was the proprietor of Les Débats. He had not lost a minute in coming to test the truth of Scribe's allegation. Boieldieu gravely informed his visitor that it was he who was going to set the book. And thus it came to pass that Mlle Bertin did not compose music for La Dame blanche.

A MUCH vexed question has at length been definitively settled in Germany. The real composer of the famous German Christmas Carol: "Stille Nacht, heilige Nacht," long supposed to be Michael Haydn, the brother of Joseph, has at last been discovered by Herr Ludwig Erk, the indefatigable labourer in the field of research connected with folk's song. Not only has the composer been discovered, but the writer of the words as well. The name of the latter was Josef Mohr; that of the former, Franz Gruber. In 1818 Mohr was assistant priest at Obendorf, near Salzburg, and died as priest at Wagram, in 1848. Franz Gruber was born on the 26th November, 1787, at Hochburg, Austria. It was on Christmas Eve, 1818, that, in the schoolhouse at Armsdorf, near Obendorf, the well-known song was heard for the first time. Gruber died as organist at Hallein, 1863.

"INDIA without elephants is as bad as Africa without dromedaries, or Siberia without white bears!" said, in dire distress, M. Halanzer, manager of the Opera in Paris, who wanted to introduce elephants in Le Roi de Lahore. At one time, he thought of dressing up horses, supplying them with tusks and an indiarubber snout. Horses were procured from the Cirque Franconi, and everything was going on swimmingly, when the plan had to be abandoned. The horses began to neigh, and neighing elephants were more calculated to injure than assist the new work. What chance would Le Roi de Lahore have had with a Parisian audience whose risible faculties had been excited by the phenomenon of neighing elephants?

FROM the manuscript of the yet unpublished second edition of Sig. G. Paloschi's Annuario Musicale, we learn that Mozart entered on the career of dramatic composer when he was 12 years old; and Weber and Carafa, when they were 14. When Galuppi and Zingarelli had their first opera performed, they were 16; Generali, Pacini, Petrella, Lauro Rossi, and Cagnoni, 17; Giuseppe Mosca, Rossini, and Luigi Ricci, 18; Boieldieu, Handel, Mchul, Cherubini, Salieri, and Donizetti, 20; Alessandro Scarlatti, Paër, Raimondi, Meyerbeer, Lortzing, and Ponchielli, 21; Paisiello, Luigi Mosca, Spontini, Conti, Bellini, Marschner, Pedrotti, De Gioia, and Gomez, 22; Jommelli, Sarti, Cimarosa, Morlacchi, Pavesi, Coppola, Balfe, Wagner, and Rubinstein, 23; Pergolesi, Hasse, Sacchini, Grétry, Orlandi, Hérold, Mercadante, and Marchetti, 24; Graun, Portogallo, Leo, Coccia, and Benedict, 25;

Piccinni, Adam, Federico Ricci, Ambroise Thomas, and Verdi, 26; Flotow, 27; Gluck and Halévy, 28; Monsigny, Gossec, Lesueur, and Auber, 30; Mayr, 31; Philidor, Anfossi, and Gounod, 33; Lulli, 39; Félicien David, 41; Tritto, 45; and Rameau, 50. (Meanwhile, how about Macfarren?—D.P.)

ACCORDING to the report of the Société des Auteurs et Compositeurs Dramatiques, the following were the receipts of the Paris lyrical theatres for the financial year extending from the 1st April, 1876, to the 31st March, 1877: Grand Opéra, 3,189,277 francs; Opéra-Comique, 804,153; Théâtre-Lyrique, 1,140,161; Renaissance, 832,376; Bouffes-Parisiens, 428,437; Théâtre-Taitbout, 93,981. No returns are made for the Théâtre Italien. Compared with the receipts for the preceding financial year, from the 1st April, 1875, to the 31st March, 1876, these figures show a falling off thus distributed: Grand-Opéra, 462,037 francs; Opéra-Comique, 6,053; Théâtre-Lyrique, 283,465. At the Renaissance there was an excess of 109,896 francs, and one of 90,693 at the Folies-Dramatiques. It must be observed, however, that last summer the Opéra-Comique was closed for three months, and for only two the summer previous; that there can be no parallel between the Théâtre-Lyrique and the Gaité, where the fairy spectacles realised receipts corresponding to the enormous sums laid out upon their production; and that, if the receipts of the Grand-Opéra have diminished, the average returns for each performance remains 18,000 francs, which, it must be admitted, is a satisfactory result. The diminution of about 725,000 francs in the receipts of the other theatres of Paris is in no way inexplicable or alarming. The authors' rights for the same period were, in Paris, 1,710,000 francs; in the country, 580,700, showing a decrease of 64,000 for the financial year.

A CONTRIBUTOR to L'Indépendance belge gives the following details concerning the libretto of La Esmeralda, which Victor Hugo wrote expressly for Mlle Bertin:—

"In 1827, a work entitled Le Loup-Garou, music by Mlle Louise Bertin, words by Scribe and Mazères, was performed at the Opéra-Comique. It contained some pleasing romances. In 1831, Mlle Bertin brought out at the Italiens a three-act Faust, somewhat mystic and, it is said, religious rather than dramatic. One day Victor Hugo was favoured with a visit by M. Bertin, Senr., portly and superb, as he lives in the marvellous canvas painted by Ingres. 'I have come,' said M. Bertin, addressing the poet, 'to ask a great favour.' Fancy M. Bertin, the all-powerful, asking a favour, when from the sanctuary of the office in the Rue des Prêtres-Saint-Germain-l'Auxerrois, he and the Journal des Débats had obliged Charles X. to capitulate! M. Bertin proceeded to explain that his daughter, Louise, rendered almost helpless by a cruel disorder, consoled herself with poetry and art for the sad realities of life. He added that her great wish, her one dream, was an opera taken from Notre-Dame de Paris. 'Can you let me have a libretto?' said he. 'Rossini and Meyerbeer have made the same request, and I refused them,' replied Victor Hugo; 'but I shall be happy to please you. Mlle Bertin shall have a libretto taken by me from Notre-Dame de Paris.' Such was the origin of La Esmeralda, with words by Victor Hugo, and music by Mlle Louise Bertin.

"Some days after the news of this art-partnership had been published in the papers, Meyerbeer, meeting Victor Hugo, said: 'It will not be a success! Ah, if I had only had that book! Are you aware you have made Mlle Bertin a present of five hundred thousand francs?' Mlle Bertin's Esmeralda is no contemptible performance, but there was something colossal in the subject which naturally overwhelmed a woman's powers."

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—The third "classical concert" is to be given to-day, under the conduct of Mr Weist Hill, our distinguished English violinist, who is labouring hard, and with success in proportion, to make good music hold its own on the hill of Muswell, as it has long done in an opposite direction. Mr Weist Hill is just the sort of man for the situation. He loves music, and music loves him—or else the splendid performance, a month ago, of Sterndale Bennett's ineffably beautiful Naiads counts for nothing.

MERSEBURG.—Herr David Hermann Engel, organist at the Cathedral, died a short time since. He enjoyed a high reputation as an executant, a composer, and a writer. He was the author of the admirable treatise, Zur Geschichte der Orgelbaukunst (A Contribution to the History of Organ-Building.)

Still Another Crisis.

DR GRIEF.—Old fellow! this is too bad. I have cured you of Raff and Rubinstein, and warned you about Liszt.

MR SIDNEY HAM.—They said 'twas for my good.

DR GRIEF.—Thou hast fed upon corpse. I know it by the symptoms.

MR SIDNEY HAM.—Only on sham corpse—only on Santa Chiara.

DR GRIEF.—Hæu cauda! A cure is now inconceivable. Ham! thou must be sliced!

MR SIDNEY HAM.—Oh no! You told me to go in for simples—

DR GRIEF.—Lodomy and calamy—"twa simples" of proved efficacy; not Casilda and Santa Chiara.

MR SIDNEY HAM.—What shall I do?

DR GRIEF.—Remain in bed for a month, and take this draught.

MR SIDNEY HAM (swallows draught).—Oh! It's worse than Chiara!

DR GRIEF.—Better than Casilda. Go sleep, Ham; I'll wake you at the end of the month—

MR SIDNEY HAM.—Slice me not, oh Dr Grief! (Falls asleep.)

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

HERR CARL BOHRER, from the Royal Opera, Dresden and Stuttgart, gave a morning concert at 24, Westbourne Park, on Saturday, the 30th of June. There was a select and appreciative audience and an interesting programme. The concert began with C. Oberthür's Trio for violin, violoncello, and harp, a composition of decided merit, which was excellently played by Herr Jos. Ludwig, M. Albert, and the composer. Mme Ziméri, who sang Meyerbeer's "Nobil Signor" and a song by Gumbert with taste and expression, met with a flattering reception. Mdle Camponi had to repeat a song by Hölzel, and Mme Belval, "My Mother's Song" (Ganz). Signor Urio gave Donizetti's "Una Virgin" and a new song by Herr Bohrer, "Un giorno d'estate" (encored). Mr Leigh and Mr R. H. Dalton, both pupils of Herr Bohrer, were also heard to advantage, the former in a song by David, the latter in the Romance from Wagner's Tannhäuser, and a cavatina by Donizetti (encored). The concert-giver himself was greatly applauded for his rendering of Mozart's "Non più andrai" and Schubert's "Der Wanderer." Being "encored" in the latter, he gave a spirited "Bacchanale," the composition of Lord Henry Somerset. The instrumental pieces were a Grand Galop de Concert, by Ganz, played by the composer (encored); a violin solo, played by Herr Ludwig; and a violoncello solo, played by M. Albert. The conductors were Signor Predassi, Mr Ganz, Mr Oberthür, and Herr Lehmeier.

Mr Frederick Chatterton gave an interesting harp recital at Willis's Rooms, on Thursday afternoon, June 28th, taking advantage of the occasion to introduce to public notice several of his own advanced pupils. The principal event of the afternoon was, in fact, the performance of a march for ten harps, by Mr Chatterton, played admirably by lady pupils (amateurs) of the talented composer, and loudly re-demanded. Miss Mary Chatterton and Miss Ada Clark each contributed a harp solo to the programme, and the first named also joined Mr Chatterton in a duet for two harps on airs from Norma. Mr Chatterton chose for his solo a fantasia of his own composition on themes from Robert le Diable, and, being encored, played a selection of Irish airs. He was assisted in the vocal parts of the programme by Miss Helen D'Alton, who received a well-deserved encore for "When you and I were young," and Miss Pattie Laverne, who gained another for her charming rendering of the ballad, "Little Nannie." Miss Venu Roy and Mdme Julia Woolf also took part in the concert. Mr George Forbes conducted. —F. J.

MR HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR (A hurried sketch).—Extra concert. The director's benefit. Full rooms; enthusiastic audience; no encores, but frequent re-calls to receive well-deserved applause. The audience seemed bent upon hearing again "The Bells of St Michael's Tower," by Sir R. P. Stewart, but Mr Leslie appealed to their forbearance, pointing to what they had still to do. Mdme Patey, owing to hoarseness (which would not have been discerned in her singing), was allowed to leave when she had sung Mr Leslie's new song, "The spreading oak," Miss Robertson singing a song of Sterndale Bennett's, in place of the trio of Mr Leslie's at the end. "The Lord is a man of war" (Santley, Henschel), a splendid example of perfect vocalisation, both singers in full command of unsurpassed powers, each trying to do their very best; noble emulation. The choir had many opportunities of showing their state of perfection, not only in excerpts from the facile pen of the conductor and many others, but also in the motet for double choir, "Sing ye to the Lord," of John Sebastian Bach, which seemed to give as much pleasure to those who sang as to those who listened. At the conclusion the choir sang "God save the Queen," and Mr Leslie received an ovation that must not only be gratifying to him for past exertions, but also an incentive to further labours. DILETTANTE.

UNCHANGING LOVE.*

The flowers all saluted her,
As she amongst them press'd;
They bade her note the pillager,
Destroying each fair breast.
"Thy lover's false," they said, "beware
The canker's poisonous sting."
But to their words she gave no care,
And thus did blithely sing—
"My love is true as yon bright sun
Keeps in its path above;
Hepled'g'd me, when my heart was won,
His never-changing love."

The stars peep'd out from night's dark
Whilst she her love did wait; [veil,
And sweetly sang the nightingale
A love-song to his mate.
But soon the clouds began to low'r,
And winds fell whispering,
"Thy lover's false"; but in her bow'r
The maid did blithely sing—
"My love is true as yon pole star,
Fix'd in the heav'n above;
Nor place nor time can ever mar
His true, unchanging love."

VALLADOLID.—The Teatro Calderon re-opened with Les Huguenots. Signor Stagno was Raoul.

DESSAU.—Herr W. Stöbel, formerly organist at the church of Peter and Paul, Moscow, died here a short time ago.

HALLE.—Herr Robert Franz, the well-known Lieder composer, has resigned his post as professor of singing at the Academy in consequence of deafness.

COPENHAGEN.—Some Italian operatic artists, headed by Mad. Trebelli and Herr Behrens, will sing during the summer in the Tivoli Concert Room.

STOCKHOLM.—A new opera, Wikingarne, by M. J. Hallström, composer of The Mountain King's Daughter, was to be produced on the Crown Prince's birthday. Faust is in rehearsal. Mad. Grabow, who sang a year ago, at the Grand-Opéra, Paris, will sustain the part of Marguerite.

DORDRECHT.—The Second Musical Festival of the Netherlands, recently celebrated here, was a brilliant success. The first day's programme contained two Cantatas for soloists, chorus, and orchestra, Le Hollandais volant, by M. Richard Hol, and Der Feenschleier, by Herr G. A. Heinze. The pieces on the second day were M. F. A. Gevaert's Van Artevelde; a Pianoforte Concerto, written by M. L. Brassin, and played by a pupil of his, M. Kwaast; and a Violin Concerto, by M. W. Kes, a former pupil in the School of Music, established by the King of Holland in Brussels.

THE STOLEN SYMPHONY:

A REMINISCENCE OF AUGUST CONRADI.

By FERDINAND GUMBERT.*

Hereupon, in co-operation with Conradi, I drew up the notice which caused the explosion in Vienna. The reader must know Vienna and the Viennese to have a notion of the excitement produced when the following declaration appeared on the 10th September, 1846, in No. 109 of the Wiener Musikzeitung :—

How Herr Conrad L. endeavoured to mystify the whole Public of Vienna, by the public Performance of some one else's Symphony.

Herr Conrad L. has had the unexampled audacity to have performed under his name, in the Theater an der Wien, a Symphony, No. 4, A minor, which I composed, and to which I affixed the motto: "Wer nie sein Brod mit Thränen ass." This is a positive fact. Directly I heard of the transaction through the Viennese papers, I wrote to Dr August Schmidt, a gentleman with whom I am personally unacquainted, but who had been described to me as a man of honour. At the same time, I enclosed the initial motives of the four movements of the Symphony. Dr Schmidt had these motives laid before the Capellmeister, Herr Suppé, who conducted the Symphony the evening it was performed, and Herr Suppé at once affirmed them to be those of the Symphony (L.'s Symphony), which he had conducted. So gross a violation of the rights of intellectual property, and such a barefaced fraud upon the public never before came under my knowledge. During the time of our acquaintance, Herr C. L. borrowed from me a large number of compositions, songs, quartets, overtures, and symphonies, invariably under the pretext that: he considered them so good that he wished to play them through at home in order to render himself thoroughly acquainted with them. I readily and without a thought gave him what he asked; I frequently remarked, however, that, on being returned, my scores contained numerous pencil-marks, as though some one had copied them out, and evidently marked the passages to which he had come.† Moreover, when Herr L. returned my scores, which were merely stitched together in sheets at the time I lent them, they were always bound in pasteboard, while the title-page (on which I always wrote my own name, the name of the work, and the dates of my beginning and completing the latter), was invariably, strange to say, carefully pasted to the inside of the cover. At that period, I did not, in my carelessness, pay any attention to the fact, but, at present, I suspect, not without reason, that even then Herr L. passed off my labours as his own. With works of the symphony class, such a course of action is very easy, for who hears anything in Germany of the symphonies of a young German musician? Herr Möser, the Musical-Director, was kind enough to have one of my symphonies performed in his class, to gratify me and to exercise his pupils; but I have never been fortunate enough to get any of them performed in public; it was reserved for Herr L. to do this, and in so far I am bound to be grateful towards him. Only he should not have had the audacity to wish to deck himself out in others' feathers—how could such a mystification remain undiscovered in a large capital like Vienna!

Herr Conrad L., too, is himself inwardly more conscious than anyone else that I am too well acquainted with his musical capabilities not to be aware he could never write a composition of any importance, not even a symphony. Should it be required, I am ready at any moment to send my original score (as I worked it out—not a fair copy) to Vienna.‡ As regards my musical capabilities, the celebrated pianist, Franz Liszt—now in Vienna—is in a position to speak; he himself, too, personally looked through a second symphony by me (that in D minor).*

I call upon Herr L. publicly to acknowledge that the symphony in A minor, with the motto: "Wer nie sein Brod mit Thränen ass, &c.," performed in the Theater an der Wien is not his symphony, but one he borrowed of me—that it is my work.

Should Herr C. L. fail, in the course of a week to make this acknowledgment, agreeably to the truth, in the Wiener Musikzeitung, he will compel me to state what has really been his career, and to what extent he is entitled to speak upon musical matters. I have known him from his schoolboy days to the time of his going to Vienna, and I think he will gladly be spared the humiliation of such a narrative.

I most heartily thank the public of Vienna for the kind forbearance with which they received my work. I thank, also, the manager, Herr Pokorny; the conductor, Herr Suppé; and the band at the Theater an der Wien, for the care they bestowed on the performance of a young German musician's work, and I only deeply regret that I was not allowed to hear what I myself had written.

AUGUST CONRADI.

Berlin, the 3rd September, 1846.

After the lapse of only a few days, Dr Schmidt wrote me a letter, describing the colossal effect produced by the above. Unfortunately, I cannot give his exact words. Conradi asked me to lend him the letter that he might show it to his father and mother and to his friends. He kept it, and, after his decease, it was not to be found among his papers. Dr Schmidt said: "Conradi is the man of the day; let him come at once to Vienna and conduct his Symphony himself in the Theater an der Wien; everything is arranged." But I must be short. In Herr W., the Commercenrath, at whose house we both gave lessons, Conradi found a true Mæcenas, who gave him the money for his travelling expenses. On reaching Vienna, he conducted in person his Symphony, and achieved a triumph such as he had never dreamt possible. He who had involuntarily procured him this triumph, the Symphony-Thief, had long previously disappeared from the Austrian capital. That, under such exceedingly favourable circumstances, Conradi did not obtain what he had so often desired, the post of conductor in some theatre, arose solely and wholly—as I learned subsequently—from his peculiar disposition, which then, and repeatedly afterwards, caused him to let the proper moment slip by. Personally, too, he wanted refinement, both in dress and manner, or, in a word, a taking appearance and bearing, qualities which the Viennese do not like to miss in their favourites. The "Stolen Symphony" was, however, the real beginning of Conradi's career. His name became suddenly known; he easily obtained a place in the Stadttheater, Stettin; and music-publishers sought his co-operation. How it came to pass that, with his great natural gifts and thorough musical knowledge, he afterwards cultivated only the lightest kinds of music, that he wrote—and with a very prolific pen—only farce-music, dances, and pot-pourris, compositions which could not possibly afford him any artistic satisfaction, is a question not very easy to answer; but such unlooked-for phenomena often occur in the process of development through which an artist passes. It is perfectly certain that the mortification of seeing no attention paid to his more serious works—even after the affair of the Vienna Symphony—was what first drove Conradi in this direction. Subsequently he was dazzled by the pecuniary result obtained, thanks to his facility in writing with so little effort; and this state of things continued to the last. There are only two observations from Conradi's lips that supply a clue to what he thought on this head. The one dates from the time when he was conductor at the Wallner Theater, and used to compose the music for Kalisch's popular farces of the day. I once said to him: "By-the-bye, do you ever think of your Symphonies? Do you never feel a wish to hear your A minor Symphony once again?" "Ah! old boy," he answered with a sigh, "those were pleasant dreams; but with my Symphonies I might have died of starvation, while now I live very respectably." The second observation I heard shortly before his death. He

* I hereby certify that I have had the pleasure of knowing Herr August Conradi not only as a gifted composer and thorough musician, but as a man worthy respect. I further certify that, at Weimar, in January and February, 1841, he was my constant companion, and will answer for his word.

Vienna, the 8th September, 1846.

F. LISZT.

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

† Herr L. attempted the same manœuvre here, also, but was not so successful as in Berlin. Here, too, he had an oratorio, which had been lent him, copied without the knowledge of the composer. But his plan was frustrated, by the composer's being informed of what he had done, and claiming his property back. Herr L., however, does not merely have other persons' compositions copied, he borrows the scores of well-known composers to look through, and then circulates them further as he chooses. Proofs of this are in my hands.

A. S. (AUGUST SCHMIDT.)

‡ We beg Herr Conradi to do this without delay, and are confident that, prompted by his good feeling, Herr Pokorny, the manager, will, in order to save a young composer's honour, have the work performed under the name of its real author.

happened to speak in the presence of Herr Hugo Bock, the present publisher of this paper, about the "Stolen Symphony." Hereupon, Conradi remarked, with a sarcastic smile: "Aye, aye, my name has gone through some very peculiar phases. At first I was called Conradi, the symphony-composer; then, Conradi, the farce-composer; and now, Conradi, the pot-pourri-composer."

On the 28th May Conradi died, aged only fifty-two; on the 30th we took him to his last home. His coffin was covered with heaps of the most fragrant flowers. The officiating clergyman, in a speech as full of energy as of deep feeling, dwelt upon the good qualities of the Deceased, both as a man and as an artist. When he mentioned, among other things, the "Stolen Symphony," I gazed once more sorrowfully at the coffin, and said gently to myself: "Poor friend! these blooming garlands can no longer please you, and will soon be withered up; but the garland which was the first in your life, the garland offered you by a great and art-loving city, the garland given you for the 'Stolen Symphony,' is one which will never fade. That I was privileged to be instrumental in procuring it for you is something which affords me some little consolation at this parting hour. Farewell, August Conradi, repose in peace!"

Diary of my Ride to Khiva.

Communicated by Private Wire.—Thrilling Adventures.

My Khivan Karavan now consists of the Pig and Alphabet in the boot (beautiful sign for an old inn, "The Pig and Alphabet"), with the barrel-organ (which was instrumental in my escape from prison), the Gaoler's Daughter in rumble, the Sleigh-driver's Boy who has stuck to me from the commencement, and it grieves me to be unable to reward such fidelity by paying him his wages—but, after all, this only increases the obligation on my part; and, as I explained to him, "You see, my lad, I am so far from my native land." Then there's my new horse. It was the Governor of the prison's horse, or the horse of the Governor of the prison, or the horse of the prison's governor (vide Little Peter's Primer. First Russian Exercises).

A better or truer mare was never foaled.* Lastly, there's my latest novelty, which accompanied me, in my pocket, from prison—The Musical Mouse.

Slight jealousy between the Learned Pig and the Musical Mouse. Whenever the Pig begins to practise with his letters (as he has to do every day), the Musical Mouse begins to whistle and sing, just to put him out, and make him wild. This annoys the Pig, who spells things wrong, and doesn't answer things properly. Consequently I am obliged to beat the Pig. Whereupon he grunts piteously, and spells out, "cuss that Mouse!" if I could only smooth matters over, and bring them together, it would be a fortune!

The Mouse is invaluable in tricks with cards, having been trained by the Gaoler, who used to cheat his prisoners—the old villain! The Mouse—I have christened him "Ridiculus Musurus Bey" (and "assisted by Herr Gruntz" will look well in the bill—if I can only bring them together!).

Night.—Halt of the caravan. Spent greater part of the night in teaching Pig the Shadow Dance from Dinorah, by moonlight.

Next Day.—Sun out. Blazing hot. Snow melting all round. Mountains of snow gradually becoming less and less in the distance, under the genial influence of the sun.

3.30 P.M.—Distant mountains melted. First view of Khiva. See distinctly the name over the gate. Gaoler's Daughter comes out of tent.

Strange to say, the Gaoler and his daughter had invariably paid their visits to my cell, either in what she romantically termed "the gloaming," or late at night, and as the small dipkis (little tallow candles) didn't give much light, I had never really seen her by day. Now I do see her by day, I should say that her father must have been well over seventy and must have been married very early. I begin to regret the Unfair Circassian.

6 P.M.—Frost commencing. Snow mountains gradually being iced. View of Khiva less and less. Dinner. Pig waiting. The Private Band (the Singing Mouse) in attendance. The party consists of self and the Gaoler's daughter. I am polite to her. Very. I hint that to prevent any scandal (scandal about my grandmother!) she had better return to her father, the Gaoler.

With tears in her eyes, she rises from her seat, and throwing her arms round my neck, exclaims, "O son of little overfed ones! Never!"

* R. R. said precisely the same thing of former horse—killed with the ass by Private Electric Wire.—T. Q.

"Nay, my much-caressed moon-faced daughter of a blooming Turnkey in Asia," I reply, "just think of what the world will say."

"O sweetest little son of much-pampered parents, I care not for the world! I am yours—for ever!"

"You are! You are!" I returned (for it was no sort of use having a row about a difference of opinion).

"And O well-rounded and sleekly-combed-and-parted-down-the-centre one, will you always love me as you do now?" she whispered, hanging on to my neck. (She weighs sixteen stone if a pound).

"O, much-underdone round-of-beef-faced" (a great compliment this) "daughter of an elderly, half-paid, underfed Turnkey in Asia," I replied, in my softest tones, "I will love thee always as much as I do now," which was strictly true. (For, need I say it, the Poll of my heart is at home, and my heart is true to Poll! bless her dear eyes! And she's just come into a little fortune, so I hear; but this makes no difference to me.)

10.—Constructed a new frigidometer with an empty bottle, a cork, and a piece of string. (Principle patented.) Frost set in hard. Mountains shaping up to points. Gaoler's daughter, feverish. Sobbing. What shall I do? I offered to pack up, ride off, and fetch a doctor from Khiva.

"And leave me here?" she exclaimed, furiously. "Why, you pitiful, underbred, overfed son of an eighty-four-tonner!" she cried, becoming, I regret to say, abusive.

I remonstrated. She called me "a son of a marine gastronome!" and threw a boot at me. Row. I pointed out that I had meant well. She gradually calmed down.

10.30.—Bitter cold—snow, ice, sleet. Sat in to supper. Wickski and explanation. I make wickski cobbler. We ice it in snow, and suck it up through straws. (Shall teach Pig to sit in chair and suck wickski cobbler through a straw.) We sit on the bank of the river (the Oxus, I suppose, judging by the position of the stars, as I've lost my maps), sipping our wickski cobbler, she and I.

SONG.

"In the happy days when we were young,
We sat by the river, she and I,
The barrel organ was by my side,
And all was peace and harmony."

More wickski cobbler; more straws. Ha! do I see my way out of it? 'Tis the last straw that breaks the Cobbler's back. . . . Good. The last straw! She sleeps! My Lady sleeps!! Hooray! Now to pack up! and off!! Away to Khiva!! Hark! what is that?

A trill—a sweet, sweet trill . . . a warble. . . . The Gaoler's Daughter awakes. "What is it?" she murmurs. Not to rudely answer her, I reply, "Nothing." This does not satisfy her. We listen. Trilling as of a sweet bird continuing—

"Ha!" she exclaims, a little more than half awake, "it is the Song of the Mudlark."

We are beside the river, and the tide is low.

"And how shall I catch the Mudlark?" I asked, as I pensively ground the organ (playing the Russian River Song of The Little Volga Boy) and gazed into the starry heavens, still listening to the lovely trill with which my accompaniment was in perfect harmony. If I could only have got the Gaoler's Daughter (it struck me) to plunge into the mud after the Mudlark . . . perhaps . . . Well, perhaps, she might not have been able to catch that lark. And I—and I should have erected a monument, with the touching inscription, "Sacred to the memory of poor Miss Stick-in-the Mud, the beautiful Gaoler's Daughter." I should have put in "beautiful," because de mortuis, &c. . . . But it was not to be.

"Chuck him a kopper-koppeck, O son of overpaid and much-muddle-headed parents," she replied, sleepily; "and the Mudlark will dive for it."

I hesitated.

"What!" she continued, suddenly rousing herself, and the Tartar acid, so to speak, effervescing, "you let 'I dare not' wait upon 'I dare!' Give me the kopper." It was a brilliant flash. But it was the last. The wickski cobbler had done its work. I placed the straw in her mouth. By the movement of the straw I could tell which way the breath was . . . the straw dropped . . . she sank . . . breathing heavily . . . a sweet, peaceful, childlike (for her age) sleep.

11.30.—The trill continued. Lovely!! Ha! I see now! It is the Mouse! I sat listening—enthralled, silent—by the banks of the rippling Oxus.

Midnight.—I make the above notes. Serve out wickski to myself, and return to the bank. The moon shines brightly. The Governor's Horse is browsing in the field. The Pig is snoring. The Mouse is singing. The Gaoler's Daughter is murmuring stupid somethings in her sleep. "Lullaby, lullaby! Baker's man!" or whatever the Nursery Rhyme is. I forget exact quotation. Suddenly I hear a grunt—a restless, irritable grunt.

By my side is the Pig with Alphabet.

What is it?

He spells out the answer. "Can't sleep if that infernal Mouse is to go on whistling and singing all night."

"Pig," I replied (on the Letters), with grim humour, for I was determined not to give in to his whim, "Pig, you're a bore!"

He squeaked, and gave a sort of half-laugh, as only pigs can, and retired. To express it, humanly speaking, the Pig smiled, but never forgave the satire.

I retire for the night. Up with the Mudlark to-morrow, and off to Khiva.

6 A.M.—Awoke by a fearful shriek, something between a whistle and the highest note—C in alt.—in the register of that eminent tenor, Signor Timberlegs.

What on earth could it be! I rushed out of the Karavan-tent.

The Truth.

(By desire.)

The real new horse.* *

* * It is Governor Queer's horse, or the horse of Governor Queer, or the horse of the queer Governor. That a better or a truer mare was never foaled by foaler is unquestionable, or it would not have been presented, without reference to sale or return, to our hook-nosed, pot-bellied contemporary's "R. R.," or to the "R. R." of our hook-nosed, pot-bellied contemporary, by his (R. R.'s) less enthusiastic admirer, THEOPHILUS QUEER.

WAIFS.

Herr Wagner, it is said, intends stopping at Ems for a month.

Mdme Marie Sass has undertaken a tour in the French provinces.

The Paris Opéra-Comique closed on the 30th June for two months.

Mdlle Ethelka Gerster was married at Prague, on the 14th ult., to Sig. Gardini.

Les Dragons de Villars will shortly be performed at the Paris Opéra-Comique.

For the second Silesian Musical Festival nearly all the tickets have been sold.

M. Charles Garnier has just published the third part of his Nouvel Opéra de Paris.

Herr Carl Gramman, the composer of Melusine, has finished a new opera entitled Thumelda.

The Emperor of Austria has bestowed the Gold Medal for Art and Science on Mad. Marchesi.

The Vienna Komische Oper was put up to auction on the 18th ult., but there was no bidder.

Mdlle d'Yven, a pupil of Mad. Viardot, is engaged for next season at the Théâtre Italien, Paris.

Mad. Pauline Lucca's starring engagement in Vienna proved so successful that it was prolonged.

Herr Henschel, the barytone, has composed a grand opera for the Royal Operahouse, Munich.

A French operatic company, during a long tour in the far East, were especially successful at Batavia.

Mdlle Vergin has left the Paris Opéra-Comique, and signed an engagement for the Théâtre-Lyrique.

Mr Vernon Rigby is "specially engaged" for three concerts at the forthcoming Leeds Musical Festival.

Herr Max Zenger's new opera, Wieland der Schmidt, will be produced at the Theatre Royal, Munich.

The German danseuse Mdlle Adele Grantzow is now somewhat better, and hopes are entertained of her recovery.

Mad. Kainz-Prause has left the Royal Opera, Dresden, and gone to reside at Bonn. She will probably retire from the stage.

The second and concluding volume of Gevaert's Histoire de la Musique dans l'Antiquité will not be published till next year.

Dr Ferdinand Hiller has had conferred upon him the Officer's Cross of the Vaken Crown of the Grand-Duchy of Luxembourg.

Mr Joseph White, a violinist, touring through South America, has received the Order of Bolivar from the President of Venezuela.

The Paris firm of Pleyel-Wolff offer a yearly prize of 500 francs for a Sonata, Trio, or Duet, in which the principal part is assigned to the piano.

La Reine de Chypre will be performed about the 20th inst. at the Grand Opera, Paris. M. Halanzier has expended 250,000 francs on the scenery and costumes.

The regular season of the Théâtre-Lyrique terminated on Thursday, the 31st ult. The theatre will probably be opened for a short time for spectacle or buffo opera.

Mdlle Rosine Bloch will for the first few nights sustain the part of the heroine in La Reine de Chypre, at the Grand Opera. She will then be succeeded by Mdlle Barbot.

Herr von Hülsen, Intendant-General of the Prussian Theatres Royal, has had three months' leave of absence granted him by the Emperor Wilhelm for the benefit of his health.

Herr G. Conrad (Prince George of Prussia) has completed another drama, taken from old Jewish history and entitled Adonia. It will be performed at the National-Theater, Berlin.

In order not to interrupt the run of Le Roi de Lahore, M. Halanzier has brought up M. Salomon's leave of absence. Mdlle de Reazké will shortly be replaced as Sita by Mdlle Baux.

M. Melchissédéc has cancelled his engagement with M. Vizentini at the Théâtre-Lyrique. So, by the way, have other artists—Mdlle Salla, for example—cancelled their engagements.

Herr Heckmann has been appointed professor of the violin at the Conservatory, Rotterdam, in place of Herr Wirth, who has become a member of the staff at the Conservatory, Berlin.

M. Wekerlin, librarian of the French Conservatory, has seventeen operas in his portfolio. Yet the only opera, L'Organiste, ever produced by him, was played more than a hundred nights.

The ballet of Sylvia, in two acts, instead of three acts and five tableaux, its original form, has been revived at the Grand Opera, Paris, Mlle Sangalli again sustaining the part of the heroine.

Condemned in 7,000 roubles damages, for breach of contract, Herr Johann Strauss has come to an understanding with the Czarsko-Selo railway company, and will conduct some concerts at St Petersburg.

M. Pasdeloup and his Orchestra will visit Amiens, Saint-Quentin, Rouen, Caen, and other towns in the North West of France. Mlle Cécile Ritter, and her brother, M. Théodore Ritter, accompany them.

M. François Hippolyte Réty, died, aged 87, on the 31st May at the Paris Conservatory, where he had acted as treasurer above fifty years. He was father of M. Charles Réty, formerly manager of the Théâtre-Lyrique.

Miss Nelly Harris, the well-known dramatic artist, daughter of the late Augustus Harris, has married Mr Horace d'Arcueil Sedger. It is to be hoped that this happy event may not deprive the stage of one of its brightest ornaments.

The German Gesangverein in Mexico have forwarded to the poet, Herr von Holtei, 1686 marks, the receipts of a concert given for his benefit, which Holtei has made over to the Cloister of the Brothers of Charity for tending the Sick Poor.

Having rejected the terms offered him, M. Joncières will not set for M. Carvalho the libretto written by MM. Cormon, Alfred Blau, and Louis de Grammont, and entitled Mlle de Mareville (and not Mlle de Marseille, as erroneously announced).

TONIC SOL-FA COLLEGE.—Professor Macfarren has awarded the first prize in the Senior Examination in Musical Composition to Mr H. Coward, of Sheffield, and the first prize in the Junior Examination to Mr G. C. Clark, of Mow Cop, Staffordshire.

The first number of a new journal, Hudební a divadelní Vestík, devoted to the interests of profane and sacred music, as well as of Bohemian theatres and vocal associations, has been published at Prague. It is to appear three times a month.

It is impossible, says the Boston Courier, to view the rear elevation of the stylish young man's shirt collar, without thinking of the business revival that would take place, if our merchants would utilize this white expanse for advertising purposes.

A new four-act comic opera, Die Offiziere der Kaiserin, words by Herr Ernst Weichert, music by Herr Richard Wüerst, will be produced next season at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, Mlle Mallinger sustaining the principal female character.

A general meeting of the Association des Artistes Musiciens was held, on the 24th ult., in the large room of the Paris Conservatory, Baron Taylor occupying the chair. The Association is flourishing, and possesses an annual income of 63,000 francs for distribution in pensions and occasional grants.

At a recent meeting of the Paris bar, the question: "When an opera has been accepted, can the librettist cause it to be brought out contrary to the wishes of the composer?" was answered in the negative. The answer is opposed to the judgment pronounced in the case of Gille et Gillotin, in which M. Sauvage, author of the words, triumphed over M. Gounod, composer of the music.

Herr Theodor Lachner, the eldest of the well-known musical Lachner family, died, aged 79, on the 22nd May, in Munich. The other brothers, Franz, Ignaz, and Vincenz are still alive. Theodor settled in the Bavarian capital as far back as 1815. For many years he was organist at the parish church of St Peter. He was subsequently appointed Court Organist and Chorus Master at the Theatre Royal. His pianoforte arrangement of Chetard's Macbeth is considered a model.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grist, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

NEW PIANOFORTE PIECE BY MADAME OURY. "CONSOLATION."

Easy of execution, but melodious and effective. Price 4s.; Half-price Cash or Stamps.

"We wonder who has not, in the hour of trouble, more than once derived comfort from the sweet sounds such as David must have used to mollify the troubled spirit of Saul. What better name, then, to give a graceful strain of peaceful melody, such as must convey to the sorrowing heart feelings of rest and sympathy, than 'Consolation'? Such is the title of a charming new pianoforte composition by that indefatigable and prolific writer, Madame Oury; prolific indeed, for the piece bears no lower an Opus number than 185. Its flow of peaceful melody, enhanced by the delicacy and variety of the accompaniment, and harmonised in the masterly style of an experienced writer, well fulfils the object of the title. In every sense of the word is 'Consolation' an admirable piece of music, and it must rank among Madame Oury's best efforts of the kind. As a morceau de salon it is of moderate difficulty, and of sufficient brilliance to display the capacities of a proficient performer. The composition is dedicated to Mrs Graver-Browne, of Morley Hall, and published by Messrs Paterson & Sons, of Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c."

LETTERS FROM RICHARD WAGNER TO A DRESSMAKER.

Hallelujah! the pink dressing-gown has arrived! Hereupon the indefatigable master proceeds immediately with fresh courage to give more orders. But what are all the stores of satin in the world compared to such a demand for them as Wagner's, which is like the barrel of the Danaides? The last supply he ordered will, as he writes, suffice him only "for some little time."

DEAR MISS BERTHA,—I forgot yesterday to order a coverlet, of the same kind of pink satin—lined with white—padded—very soft—not a narrow pattern, so that the coverlet may not become stiff—exactly the same size as the old blue coverlet—for actual use in bed—of which you must still have the pattern.—I should like this, also, very soon.

Of the silk blonde lace-ground, with a pretty design on it, I should also like some 10 or 12 ells.

Execute this order well. With best compliments, yours,
R. W.

Of the light blue ribbon, instead of 1 piece, I should like 2.
Lucerne, 11th October, 1867.

This letter proves there is a gap in the correspondence, since mention is made of a letter of the 10th October, and we have not one of that date. But from the tone of the letter of the 11th, which suggests the notion that the correspondence was continuous, we may conclude that this is not the sole gap, and that, if the master, impelled thereto by the present publication of his correspondence, will not himself supply the missing documents, the world will know of only a portion, an infinitesimally small portion, of the satin used by him. So much is certain: he gave orders of the same sort as those we have chronicled, not only to the lady to whom these letters were addressed, but likewise to many of our large silk-mercers. In the interest of the silk manufacture in France, now in so depressed a condition, we cannot refrain from cherishing a hope that this large customer may by further orders take off some of the accumulated stock, and thus to some degree ease the market.

The psychologist will, perhaps, discover in the letter of the 11th a trait illustrating in an interesting manner Wagner's indescribable passion for finery. Wagner, as he himself informs us, has forgotten to order a pink satin coverlet. He is not, however, contented with merely repairing the omission, but profits by the occasion for ordering some ten or twelve ells of lace-ground. When, too, the letter is concluded, he regrets that such is the case, and, in a postscript, says that, instead of one piece which he has ordered of the "blue ribbon," he should prefer two pieces. For Franz to bring with him:—

14 ells of heavy pink, of which 20 ells more must be despatched immediately.

50 ells white satin	à 4½.
50 ells grey	"	à 3.
50 ells rose	"	à 3½.
(50 ells to be sent on as soon as they are ready.)
16 ells light blue	à 5 florins.
Blond and lace-grounds.

To be made:—

1 pink dressing-gown.
1 blue ditto
1 green ditto (with rose ribbon).
1 dark green, without embroidery, ruching, or sash; simply with white facings.
2 blue coverlets.
2 large pillows (embroidered), to be all trimmed.
1 large embroidered coverlet.

I need make no comments. Two hundred and fifty ells of satin, four satin dressing-gowns, and three coverlets, all at once, speak for themselves. I am beginning to understand Wagner—as man, author, and artist!

DEAR MISS BERTHA,—I will send in about two days 500 florins for the present. Your packages have arrived, only we miss very much roses. Pray send immediately whatever is ready of the garlands ordered. You know I ordered 50 ells more, so that I expect altogether 100 ells of the especially fine roses, of which I at first ordered 3 dozens; I should like altogether 50—50 or 60. We have not yet measured the lace; but, at all events, it would be as well to have some on hand—though not so wide as the last, a trifle narrower; so, we could find use for 20 or 30 ells.

Best thanks for your kind attention. Your obedient, R. WAGNER.
Lucerne, 21st October, 1867.

In the above letter the reader, somewhat fatigued by wandering through countless orders, is again refreshed by the promise of five hundred florins on account. It is not much, but money runs rather "short." What, however, does that matter? Is it not right to strew our path with roses and forget care? The master orders, therefore, a hundred ells of rose-garlands, and fifty or sixty "especially fine roses." Such a supply would suffice, I think, to make a dozen afflicted families forget their sorrows. Of lace, too, Wagner, wisely keeping an eye on the uncertain future, is of opinion that "it would be as well to have some on hand" (from twenty to thirty ells). Good Heavens, how easily might the lace-makers suddenly inherit estates from rich uncles, and then where should we be able to procure our lace!

DEAR MISS BERTHA,—Everything has arrived, and I thank you extremely. I am waiting for your account, and hope soon to prove my grateful satisfaction with what you have done. Only we have not a sufficiency of the pink satin, and could very well take 30 or 40 ells more. God knows how much is required, if we want to do things well. I should feel obliged if you could get it for me soon!

Mme Stocker asks me to give you her best remembrances. Next year I shall very likely come again to Vienna, and shall be pleased to see you. Accept my thanks, you true soul, and with them the cordial greeting of your obedient,
RICHARD WAGNER.

Lucerne, 15th November, 1867.

The above letter contains the despairing exclamation, "only we have not a sufficiency of the pink satin." Every just man will absolve the master from all blame, however. Wagner has done what he could, and if, despite all his orders, which would have been enough to drape the Rhigi in a rose satin covering, the quantity is not enough, the Devil must have had a finger in the pie, and perhaps been adorning the infernal regions with rose-coloured hangings. "God knows," continues the master, "how much is required, if we want to do things well." Truly, this is something which God alone can know; human wisdom is incapable of calculating it!

DEAR MISS BERTHA,—I at present perceive the error, and beg you will send some of the enclosed pattern to Breneli at Lucerne. I think that, as the satin is not particularly heavy, but pleases me by its colour, you had better get twenty ells at once and send them to me; we can find a use for them.

Excuse me as I have not much time. Our old arrangement still holds good.

Yours cordially and obediently,
RICH. WAGNER.

Munich, 18th January, 1868.

The satin sent him by the dressmaker is not "particularly heavy," but its colour pleases him, and, as satin of slight texture is better than none at all, he at once orders twenty ells of it. "We can find a use for them!" he exclaims. There can be certainly no doubt that for satin, which is easily dirtied, there is some use or other in a large household.

"DEAR YOUNG LADY,—I herewith send what I can spare you for the present, so that you may at least see that I think of you. If I can manage it, something more shall follow, only until autumn I myself am somewhat pressed for cash.

Best compliments from your obedient,
Lucerne, 9th May, 1868.

This last letter is the only one in the entire collection written on rose-coloured paper; but, alas! its purport is not by any means roseate. The correspondence concludes as mournfully as it commenced: the master is "pressed for cash!"

After perusing the above letters, I think the reader will consider that the motto: "Wie gleicht er dem Weibe!" which I prefixed to them, is justified. The words are uttered by Hunding, in Die Walküre, after scanning the features of his guest Siegmund. Hunding then remarks: "The deceitful worm gleams from out his eyes." When we read these letters addressed to a milliner; when we see how exclusively and with what deep interest the writer discourses in them of finery; and when we learn what large sums are squandered upon the glossy satin, we should think, save for the signature, that the letters were the letters of a woman. Wagner prefaces the ninth volume of his Collected Writings and *Poems with a poem, addressed by him in January, 1871, "To the German Army before Paris." In it we read :

"Es rafft im Krampf
Zu wildem Kampf
Sich auf des eitlen Wahns Bekenner :
Der Welt doch züchtet Deutschland nur noch Männer."†

The heroic German host would never have achieved their immortal victories had all the men whom Germany "breeds" become as effeminate as he who sang their praise. Our great men have never lost anything in the eyes of the world by the publication of their familiar correspondence. For this they have been indebted not to the delicacy of the persons who published the correspondence, but to their own characters and dispositions.

MUSICIANS WHO HAVE DIED AWAY.‡

By JOSEPH SEILER.

PAISIELLO AND MÉHUL.

As we know, Napoleon had no love for art ; and music, in his eyes, possessed the least value of all the arts. Whatever he may have done for music, was not done for the sake of music itself ; his motives, whenever he appeared as its patron, lay in his ambition and greed for command. As regards the technical part of art-melodies, harmony and rhythm, he understood it very well, and gave numerous astonishing proofs of the fact. But of the genius of music, of the vita nuova in it, he had no notion. To everything which went beyond the mechanical portion, which could be and was calculated, he was indifferent. For the inward worth, properly so called, he had no sensitive mind, no belief. Only in so far as it bowed to his profane ends—only in so far as it lent itself to his apotheosis—did he consider art, or all the arts together, worthy his notice.

In 1802, when First Consul, Napoleon summoned the celebrated Paisiello from Italy, for the purpose of composing in Paris, to French words, a grand tragic opera, a genuine opera seria. Napoleon entertained a very slight opinion of French and also of German music. He misapprehended and slighted Rameau, Gluck, Méhul, and Cherubini. It was for this reason that, to the no small anger of all the Paris composers, Giovanni Paisiello, known in the French capital from having formerly resided there and written some sacred music and comic operas, received a commission to set the grand opera of Proserpina, according to Napoleon's own suggestions. Paisiello—probably with great reluctance—obeyed the dictatorial command, and undertook a task utterly opposed to all his musical proclivities, and the failure of which was easily to be foreseen. As soon as the work was somewhat advanced, Napoleon determined, by a preliminary rehearsal, to see whether Paisiello satisfied his expectations. He ordered, therefore, one evening, a rehearsal of the first act—with only the principal singers and the stringed quartet. Paisiello was under the necessity of allowing his opera, composed by him for a large theatre and a numerous orchestra, to be essayed by a few singers and a thin quartet accompaniment in a drawing-room. Strange demand ! Paisiello must have had a presentiment that his laboured work would prove a failure. After hinting to the ladies in no very polite manner that he trusted they would not shriek, but sing, in this opera, the Consul seated himself opposite the performers with his elbows resting on the arms of his chair. In this position, dumb and motionless, he remained during the entire act. Any one might very well have supposed he had fallen off to sleep. At the conclusion of the act, the all-dreaded being went up to Paisiello, and loudly addressed to that affrighted maestro a host of censorious remarks on faulty prosody, words violently separated from each other and unskillfully repeated, and purposeless ritornellos, interrupting the melody and confusing the singers. All these were defects found, not in Paisiello alone, but in all Italians. Yet Gluck and Méhul—whose great strength and principal merit consisted precisely in an oratorical style, in correct accentuation, in mightily pulsating rhythms, in a wise, and occasionally an anxious, restriction of the lyrical, and purely musical element—were regarded by the dictator with contempt. Strange contradiction ! Paisiello was utterly dismayed. Though he had not expected compliments, he had not expected such bitter blame. The poor fellow could scarcely manage to stammer forth a few unconnected words. He must have thought, and he really had thought, that Napoleon sent for him to set Proserpina on account of his agreeable and everywhere esteemed melodies, of his lovely and softly touching strains, which the Consul had, perhaps, vainly sought for in French masters. He had considered he was bound to show that a composer could write even to French words, delightful, sweet, Hesperian cantilenas, long-winded roulades, and ear-tickling shakes. That, however, from the Italian melothete, who troubled himself little about tragic truth, strict declamation, or profound harmony—that from him any one expected a great, nay, a model musical drama, this was something which neither Paisiello himself, nor the singers, nor, lastly, the public, could ever have presumed. We perceive from this that Napoleon was as little acquainted with and had as little fathomed the nature of Italian Opera, relying exclusively on song, melody, and intoxication of the senses, as the nature of the French musical drama, having for its sole end and aim sublime tragedy and the most thorough truthfulness of musical expression, and that—blinded either by natural prejudice, or ignorance and the want of confidence springing therefrom—he had never understood the lofty creations of Gluck, Méhul, Lesueur, and others, and never recognised their merit.

Meanwhile the will of the future emperor was a stern law, to which no one dared deny obedience. Paisiello—willingly or unwillingly—had to go on working at his ungrateful task, which now weighed on him like some terrible incubus. Whether, after the consular reprimand, he endeavoured to adapt himself more to Napoleon's desires, and, if he did so, in what degree his attempt proved successful, is something we cannot now determine. The score of Proserpina—though engraved in Paris in 1803—has long reposed in the dust of oblivion. The reception accorded it was not favourable. Reichardt, who attended the first performance, which, after long preparations, took place on the 29th March, 1803, gives the following account* :—

"Finally, the first performance of Paisiello's Proserpina really came off to-day. The opera commenced in a very weak manner. The overture failed to produce the slightest impression, and was in no way suited to or calculated for the grand French style and the admirable orchestra. The entire act was very weak. But this only made Paisiello's adherents and the Court party clap their hands all the more till they were sore. It was necessary, however, for them to do so, in order that the hissing and whistling, several times on the point of bursting forth, should not get the upper hand. In the second act, the clappers and bravo-criers were tired, and, in the third, nearly altogether silent. Paisiello's most zealous advocates hung down their ears—the hissers grew bolder and bolder. The former would probably have been knocked up in the very first act, had not nearly the half of it been cut out after the grand rehearsal. Notwithstanding this, the opera lasted nearly four hours. There was a great deal of good dancing, though to very weak music, deficient in character and life.—Paisiello's music, however, was exactly what those who know his fine talent for agreeable pleasing melody, but are not thereby seduced into blind enthusiasm for him, could not help expecting. In many very agreeable and charming passages he was once more quite the pleasing melodist he is in his Italian operas. But in the one case as in the other, all his personages : Pluto and Jupiter, as well as Proserpine, sang the same agreeable melodies.† Nay, Pluto and Proserpine once actually sang a piquant duet, in which both interchanged the same melodies—accompanied, moreover, for both by the same harmony. Besides, the same piece had been already heard in his Nina.

"Except for the first scenes of the second act, in which Ceres and the Nymphs anxiously seek Proserpina—and in which there

* Gesammelte Schriften und Dichtungen. But why "Schriften und Dichtungen ?" "Writings and Poems ?" Are not "poems" "writings ?"

† "Convulsively the believers in a vain delusion rise for the wild struggle ; but it is Germany alone which still breeds men for the world." The reader cannot fail to appreciate the fact that Herr Wagner's habitual modesty informs the above lines.

‡ From the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung.

* Vertr. Briefe, Vol. III., pp. 274 et seq.

† Exactly the same thing had occurred in the works of Piccini, Cimarosa, Galuppi, and was subsequently repeated in those of Paer, Caraffa, and Bellini. Rossini, Donizetti, Mercadante and Verdi, are (partially) bright exceptions who have forsaken the traditional well-worn rut.

is really a grand theatrical effect—anyone must have thought that Paisiello knew nothing of the great reform brought about in French tragic opera by Gluck, for all the rest was the utterly mediocre, flat sort of stuff, without plan or character, to which we have lately been accustomed in Italian vocal composers.

"The melodiously agreeable portion was here the less able to compensate one, as it was very little developed, moving with very little freedom and grace under the constraint of the French words, which had everywhere distressed and hampered the composer, and not being delivered by the singers, male and female, with that charm and grace, through which the slightest trifles frequently become in Italy entrancing and popular pieces. The singers, whose individual nature and voice the composer seemed to have taken very little into account, gave themselves all the pains they could to declaim vigorously and render tragic music which required to be sung agreeably. The most unpardonable thing of all was probably the fact of Paisiello's appearing not to have troubled his head in the least about the dance-music, which is raised in France to the highest perfection.* Not a single dance-number possessed any character, or was treated artistically as it ought to have been treated. Even the frequent solo-parts in the orchestra—designed perhaps to make up for the above short-coming—were not heard to advantage, and proved ineffective."

ADELINA PATTI.†

A little book, addressed to us in the handwriting of a foreigner, has just come to hand. It turns out to be a very interesting biography of the greatest singer of her period—an artist whom thus to describe is at once to name. In his Life of Adelina Patti, Dr Dalmazzo begins by "craving the indulgence of his English readers," and by expressing a hope that "the fact of his being a foreigner, and only recently resident in England, will disarm adverse criticism." There is no opportunity, in this case, for adverse criticism, except, indeed, as regards a few matters of detail. Since Adelina Patti speaks French as perfectly as she speaks Italian, English, and a few other languages, we cannot believe that she said to her husband on any occasion, "Est-ce que je n'est bien chantée?" It is quite possible, however, that for this curious sentence, at once inexact and incomplete, Dr Dalmazzo's printers may be responsible. The printers have far more to answer for when (page 40, last line) they make Dr Dalmazzo say that Mme Patti "having nothing left of the freshness, purity, and metallic strength of her voice, has gained in fluidity and flexibility." "Nothing lost" Dr Dalmazzo had obviously written. We must call the learned Doctor wrong to account for stating that Mme Patti insists upon singing Il Barbiere with one tenor, Lucia di Lammermoor with a second, and Faust with a third; and that, having once chosen her tenor, he must appear whether able or unable to perform. "There are those of them," he writes, "who are prevented by illness, by affections in the throat: then the opera must be delayed, or they must come and sing as they are, which all the directors of theatres, and Mr Gye especially, know perfectly well." The well-meaning biographer is here completely at fault. With how many different tenors has Mme Patti played Lucia, or, since the retirement of Mario, Rosina in the Barber of Seville? Mme Patti is the most accommodating of all artists. She is never indisposed herself; and no one who is familiar with her career in England can imagine her suggesting that a representation in which she was to take part should be postponed on account of the indisposition of this or that tenor.

Dr Dalmazzo has evidently studied the human heart; and, starting from the fact that Adelina Patti is gifted with exquisite sensibility, he has inferred that she must be capricious, and thereupon has set himself to consider in what manner she would probably show caprice. We, also, have studied the human heart, and, knowing what a puzzle it is, have renounced all idea of interpreting it. A far safer guide to knowledge of character is to be obtained by observing human actions, and considering what internal qualities they denote. Now the resolute manner in which Mme Patti fulfils all her engagements, singing seventeen years successively at the same theatre, identifying herself, meanwhile, with some twenty-four different parts of the most varied kind, appearing sometimes in a strong, sometimes in a comparatively weak caste, always, under no matter what trying circumstances, doing her best, and her very best: this is enough to prove to us that, whatever else Mme Patti may be, she is certainly not capricious. Our respected author wished, we imagine, to treat his subject in what seemed to him a philosophical spirit. He may, also, have thought it necessary for artistic purposes to throw in a few unimportant shadows, so as to bring out the bright portions of his pictures in more striking relief.

Adelina Patti, according to Dr Dalmazzo—on this point perfectly well informed—is thirty-three years of age. He is quite right, too, in saying that "she still possesses the fulness and freshness of youth." Moreover, "her forehead is high; her eyebrows are well arched, and almost meet; her mouth is small, showing two small receding dimples; her chin is slightly prominent; and her eyes, which shine in action and resume a particular calm in repose, are large and dark-coloured; her hair is chestnut and flowing. She has great agility of person, and grace in her gestures; her movements of the head are particularly charming; and she is gifted with that smile which poets call divine, and which gives the acts the proper expression, and to all her deportment that indefinable beauty which adorns the pictures of the Raphaelian school."

We were saying that Mme Patti had appeared in some two dozen parts. Dr Dalmazzo reckons no fewer than twenty-seven. He cites twenty-two; but he leaves out of his calculation Ernani, in which, three years ago, Mme Patti impersonated the heroine most admirably, and two unimportant works, one by Prince Poniatowski, the other by Signor Campana. The following is Dr Dalmazzo's list of characters in which Mme Patti has especially distinguished herself: Rosina, Zerlina, Adina, Martha, Annetta, Norina, Amina, Lucia, Linda, Violetta, Gilda, Elvira, Maria, Catarina, Dinorah, Valentina, Leonora, Margherita, Desdemona, Giulietta, Esmeralda, Aida. From these twenty-two, twelve are selected in which, we are told, Mme Patti has been peculiarly happy. But as from this catalogue the names of Gilda and Margherita are omitted, we cannot consider it complete. Our accomplished critic remarks with justice that Mme Patti is equally good in tragedy and in comedy, in French, Italian, and German opera. But what does he mean by "the flying and interrupted music of Beethoven and Mendelssohn"? and in what unknown opera by Mendelssohn has Mme Patti sung? We should like to hear her in Beethoven's Fidelio.—Hubert Silber.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Last night I had the pleasure to hear, for the first time, the chorus which has been selected for our Musical Festival in September next, and I trust you will permit me to say that, whilst I have still the tone of the grand choral gathering at the recent Handel Festival ringing in my ears, I never heard a more satisfactory, a better balanced, or a more powerful and rich-toned choir (numbering about 300 voices) than the one which rehearsed in the Philosophical Hall, under the direction and training of that able and pains-taking chorus master—Mr Broughton. The trebles are exceedingly good, fresh, and brilliant in tone; the altos are equally good; the tenors fine, but scarcely numerous enough; the basses are simply magnificent. The manner in which the choral selections were sung from Mr Austin's Fire King, a work, so far as I can judge, likely to reflect the highest credit on its composer—(a native of Leeds), Bach's superb "Magnificat," and Macfarren's new oratorio, Joseph, was something to be remembered, and—if "coming events cast their shadows before"—indicates a success in the choral department of our Festival of the highest kind. Especially imposing was the steady manner in which Bach's glorious, masculine strains were given—whilst great expression and delicacy were obtained in the impressive final chorus of the first part of Joseph. Trusting that as many thousands as the Town Hall will hold may participate at the Festival in the great musical treat which is in store, I am, &c.,

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Mdlle Ethelka Gerster, whose highly-favourable reception on the night of her début before a London audience, as Amina in the Sonnambula, was recorded in befitting terms, has established her position with the patrons of Her Majesty's Theatre. Lucia—which, being more essentially dramatic than Amina, as well as being serious throughout, taxes her powers as an actress, if not as a singer, in a severer sense—led her a step onward. Here, again, she found ample occasion to display the rare quality of those notes belonging to the upper register of her voice, which she must have cultivated with the utmost assiduity, and her facile employment of which never fails to rouse her hearers. Not to enter into details, we many point to the concluding air in the scene of the madness, “Spargi d'amaro pianto,” and to the original and striking cadence by means of which she reaches a climax that would probably have surprised Donizetti. In level singing, especially where the middle voice has to deal with successive closely-knit “gruppettos,” Mdlle Gerster is less uniformly successful, and to obtain evenness of tone and quality in such passages exacts no less constant and assiduous practice than the other. An artist so well endowed and evidently earnest as Mdlle Gerster, however, is not likely to neglect any necessary study that may enable her to approach nearer and nearer the goal of perfection which it should be, and doubtless is, her ambition to attain. I Puritani, Mdlle Gerster's next essay, was, we think, regarded as a whole, her most successful one. Elvira has a good many florid passages to execute, but also certain cantabile phrases demanding genuine and unforced expression. Among them stand conspicuous the reverie, “Arturo, a già ritorni!” when the suddenly deranged Elvira imagines that Arturo has as suddenly returned (finale to Act I.); to the touchingly melodious “Qui la voce,” when, absorbed in thoughts of her absent lover, she dwells sadly on the past; and one or two others that need not be specified. To these, and especially to the first named, Mdlle Gerster imparts all the essential feeling without a touch of exaggeration; but they hardly make as strong an impression on her audience as the well-known polacca, “Sen vergin vezzosa,” or the cabaletta, “Vien diletto,” with its florid embellishments. How and in what manner these would be executed by the young Hungarian lady might have been guessed in advance by those who have carefully watched her previous performances. The high notes introduced at the end of the polacca, of course, to employ a conventional phrase, “brought down the house” on each occasion, and to these again Mdlle Gerster was indebted for an encore and triple “re-call.” Much the same effect, though perhaps in a less demonstrative measure, was created by “Vien diletto,” already mentioned. Still, we prefer listening to her in snatches of such melody as occur in the great duet with Arturo (Act III.); for example, “Oh parole di amor!” and “Caro, non ho parola,” where she can use the medium tones of her voice in such a way as to let her hearers feel what their quality actually may be. Enough, however, has been said to show that the artistic progress of the new prima donna will be followed with increasing interest.

MARSEILLES.—A one-act comic opera, Le Violon de Stradivarius, music by M. Ginouvés, has been produced at the Théâtre-Michel.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Last week was taken up by repetitions of La Traviata, Le Vispe Comari di Windsor, Faust e Margherita, Lucia di Lammermoor, and Aida, added to one performance of Hamlet, with Mdlle Albani as Ophelia. The second, third, and fourth of these were respectively for the “benefits” of Mdlle Zaré Thalberg, Mdlle Adelina Patti, and Mdlle Albani; and it need not be told that these popular artists were greeted by their many admirers with reiterated applause and showers of bouquets. Verdi's Aida, which cost the Khedive of Egypt so much money, and by which the foremost of modern Italian dramatic composers earned fresh laurels, brought Mr Gye's season to a conclusion. The cast was as before—Mesdames Patti and Scalchi, as Aida and Amneris; Mdlle Cottino, as the Priestess; Signors Graziani, Scolara, Capponi, and Nicolini, as Amonasro, the King, Ramfis, and Radamès. The performance, under the direction of Signor Bevignani, one of the finest we remember since the opera first came out in the summer of 1876, was applauded with more than customary enthusiasm by an audience that filled every part of the theatre. Calls for the principal singers were frequent, and a more brilliant closing representation could hardly have been desired by the spirited manager himself. After the opera the National Anthem was given, Mdlle Adelina Patti taking the solo verse.

In the course of the season just over, Mr Gye has drawn largely on the catalogue of operas at his immediate command; three by Meyerbeer, two by Mozart, two by Rossini, five by Donizetti, two by Bellini, five by Verdi, one each by Flotow, Auber, and Ambroise Thomas, two by Gounod, and two by Wagner—26 in all. He has added to his repertory Santa Chiara, the Vispe Comari di Windsor, and the Vascello Fantasma. Mr Gye, in promising “at least three” out of five operas named in his prospectus, has fulfilled the pledge he gave to subscribers and the public. While the known works were all more or less effectively presented, every care was taken in the preparation of the new ones by his able and zealous conductors, Signors Vianesi and Bevignani. Besides the favourite artists of last season, Mr Gye has introduced the Spanish tenor, Signor Gayarre, the French tenor, M. Capoul, and a promising barytone, Signor Ordinas (also Spanish), into the bargain. The orchestra and chorus have been more than usually excellent; while the scenery (by Messrs Dayes & Caney), and the appointments generally, were such as we are always accustomed to expect at the Royal Italian Opera. To judge from results, moreover, Signor Tagliacoco, the new stage manager, is as active and efficient behind the curtain as he used to be before the lamps, his superintendence in this direction having been of eminent service during the season.

PRESENTATION TO HORTON C. ALLISON.

On Monday, July 23, Mr H. C. Allison received a gratifying testimonial from his pupils at Manchester, in the form of a Cambridge University Hood appropriate to his degree, together with an illuminated address of which the following is the text:—

“Presented to Horton C. Allison, Mus. B., Cantab., on behalf of his Pupils at Oakleigh, in commemoration of his taking his degree as Bachelor of Music at the University of Cambridge, and as a recognition of the pleasant and efficient manner in which he has imparted instruction during the long period he has been engaged here in teaching Harmony, Vocal and Pianoforte Music.”

MY ABSENT LOVE.*

Some tulips I send to my sweetheart;	For they have lain long in my bosom,
If you're willing that lov'd one to be,	And have felt the wild throb of my
I ask you to cherish and keep them,	heart,
As a pledge of affection from me.	With joy as I thought of that meeting,
	After which we are never to part.

And though they have blossom'd and faded,
And would hasten away to their doom,
'Twas my glowing breath that destroy'd them,
And my kisses that scatter'd their bloom.

SIR,—You know the infinite lines beginning:—

"A time there was, ere England's grief began,
When every rood of ground maintained its man," &c.

Well, I should have preferred sustained its man, to avoid the alliteration, maintained—man (two M's, three N's, and three A's), to which you are addicted.

Did not Thackeray say, speaking about the heroes of the wreck of the Birkenhead—"succumbed to the powers above, and went down in good order"? Of course he did. Mr Myers, however, gives "O Fons Bandusiae" as subjoined:—

"O crystal-clear Bandusian spring,
Well worthy thy sweet offering
Of wine with flowers engarlanding.

"A kid to-morrow morn I vow,
Whose budding horns upon his brow
Foretell his lustihood,
His fights and loves; but all in vain,
So soon his sacrifice must stain
The rills of thy cold flood.

"The fiery dogstar's angry heat
Touches not thee; thy cool retreat
The tired plough-oxen know and love,
And all the flocks that round thee rove,

Have found thy water sweet.

Thou, too, with famous springs shalt be Enrolled in new nobility,
For sake of this thy song that sings
The oak-crowned rocks whereat thy springs
Come leaping laughingly."

Here (though Flaccus would have shook his sides) I like the alliteration. "Leaping laughingly" is better than "maintained its man"—although there are three L's, and M comes after L—which shows that you may give a man an inch, and he will take an ell (registered), if he can get it. Nevertheless—

"I can't endure this mental strain," though, as the Rev. John Donne, D.D., poet and erewhile Dean of St Paul's, saith—

"I am no libeller, nor will be any,
But (like a true man) will say there are too many."

Sleep, therefore, in peace, my singular good sir, and believe that I am yours in deep sincerity, Stephen Mount.

LYONS.—Some years since, the Théâtre des Célestins was destroyed by fire. A new and larger theatre has been erected on the same site, and will be opened early in August. The façade of the old theatre was shut up by the surrounding houses; that of the new one occupies an entire side of the Place des Célestins.

"LE VISPE COMARI DI WINDSOR."

(From the "Examiner.")

Such is the somewhat incorrect Italian rendering of The Merry Wives of Windsor, the title of an opera by Nicolai, produced last Saturday at Covent Garden. The libretto, it need hardly be said, is founded on Shakspeare's play, and no severer test could have been applied to the intrinsic humour of that play than the transmogrifying process of operatic adaptation. But Shakspeare has painted with so broad a brush the amorous entanglements of the fat knight; his ignominious escape in the clothes-basket, or as the old woman of Brentford, are so indestructible in their main features, that no amount of miscellaneous airs and duets and ensembles can wholly deface them. Like a story after its migration from East to West from the Vedanta to Grimm's fairy tales, Sir John and his merry tricksters at first look strange on the operatic boards; but when we have once become accustomed to their singing Italian instead of talking plain English, we soon recognise our old friends, and are pleased accordingly. It is also but just to the German dramatist—for the original libretto was written in the German language—to say that upon the whole he has accomplished his difficult task with taste and skill. His adherence to Shakspeare's play in all essentials is especially laudable, his chief aim having been to simplify the plot and reduce the number of the dramatis personæ. Nym, and Pistol, and Bardolph, and mine host of the Garter, have had to submit to this process, and so has the valorous encounter between the Welsh parson and the French doctor. But these characters and incidents, after all, are but fanciful arabesques on Shakspeare's canvas, enlivening the course of the action with their humorous byplay, but without raison d'être in an operatic libretto. The only modification of the plot occurs in the last scene, where Dr Caius and Slender, instead of being wedded each to a "great lubberly boy," espouse each other to their increased mutual discomfiture. Of Nicolai's music not much need be said. The opera is not altogether new in England, having been twice before performed in London, for the last time in 1867, at Her Majesty's Theatre. The composer, although German by birth, betrays few of the peculiarities of the school of that country. His style is a mixture of French gaiety and grace with a distinctly Italian type of melodious formation, German training being apparent only in the more careful structure of the concerted pieces. Music of this kind, if produced by a master of his craft, may be listened to with undisturbed pleasure. Everything is sparkling and bright. There is no long-winded pretentiousness, no absolute triviality to shock our æsthetic feeling, but also no strong emotion of any kind such as is the result of high art-work. Nicolai knows how to write a sentimental love song, vide Fenton's charming "Odi canta l'usignuolo;" he also can depict two angry women bent on revenge—the exquisite duet between Mrs Ford and Mrs Page towards the beginning of the opera is sufficient proof of it; and his command of orchestral effect is evinced beyond a doubt by the overture, exquisitely rendered and rapturously encored on the present occasion. But here his faculty ends. He is wanting in that great test of true dramatic vocation—the power of developing, or, more properly speaking, of musically re-creating a character; a power as difficult to define but as easy to recognise in music as it is in poetry itself. The Page in Figaro, Nevers in the Huguenots, or almost any character in Wagner's later operas, are instinct with individual life; every phrase they declaim, every snatch of melody they sing, belongs to them, and is part of their being. The same cannot be said of Mrs Ford or Mrs Page, who are scarcely distinguished from each other, nor yet of their comprehensive admirer, a character eminently suited for musical delineation. Mozart or Rossini would have made a striking tableau de genre of the fat knight; in Nicolai's version, he indulges in musical tall talk and sings drinking songs, but there are few traces of sustained psychological conception on the composer's part. Another serious drawback of the score is its total want of local colour. Nothing more emphatically un-English could well be imagined than this opera. In a foreign composer, this is of course a pardonable offence; but the idea suggests itself, what a marvellous subject for a gifted English musician the Merry Wives would be—how he might, to borrow Falstaff's phrase, "thunder to the tune of 'Green Sleeves,'" and accompany the fairy dances and nummeries of the last act with music as charming as it would be characteristic of the temporal and local surroundings. But these of course are dreams of Utopia. In the meantime we must be satisfied with the charming bits of romantic horn music and the lively dance rhythms by which Herr Nicolai has illustrated the moonlit night and the fairy revels of Windsor Forest. The opera was a decided success, and will no doubt keep its place in the répertoire for many seasons to come. Nothing but praise is due to the performance.

ST. PETERSBURG.—Charles Bizet's Carmen will be the chief novelty next season.

SALZBURGER MUSIKFEST.

(From a Correspondent.)

Salzburg, July 17.

"A MUSICAL festival in honour of Mozart will be held at Salzburg, his birthplace, towards the end of July. The orchestra will include most of the artists of the Viennese Opera."

Such was the paragraph in the Illustrated News which caught my eye one sultry day in June, while I was inhaling the murky atmosphere of London, longing for an "outing" of some kind. My imagination at once took fire. Do you know the wonderland of which Salzburg is the centre, dear friend? Have you looked down from the castle which towers above the old-fashioned Austrian town, and revelled in the beauty of a scene equalled by few—surely surpassed by none other on this Continent?—a view embracing vast tracts of fertile, richly cultivated country, on the one hand; on the other, an immense pile of jagged, precipitous mountains, along whose sides, bathed in a deep blue transparent haze, the lights and shades are for ever varying. Beneath the mountains villages and villas innumerable, nestling peacefully amidst the bright green meadows of the Salza—but you do know all this, and therefore I need not attempt to describe what beggars description. Well, looking out upon my chimney pots and my smoke, I began to dream of pure mountain air, of music, and of Mozart; and I said, I will go where all these attractions are combined. So I packed my portmanteau, and here I am. I will send you the programme of the Salzburg Musical Festival. You may, perhaps, like to compare it with those of our London concerts. A supplementary placard, posted on all the walls, sets forth how ticket holders will be received at the station, provided with lodgings, lionised, conducted, and directed, from hour to hour, during the whole of their stay. This part of the arrangement reminds one somewhat of Mr. Cook's railway tours; and though I did not care to avail myself of the proffered help, I was not a little edified at encountering in the street a long procession of hot, dusty pilgrims, laden with vast wreaths and garlands, looking like a detachment of the Ancient Order of Foresters. Shorn of their masonic insignia, their minds, to my thinking, had reached an abnormally flat pitch; so I avoided them, and confined my contemplation to the two houses where Mozart lived, and where Haydn (if an inscription on it be correct) died. And I also inquired my way to the pretty cottage where Joachim is wont to spend his holidays, though he is still detained at Berlin just now by the duties of his school of music.

The proceedings of the Festival commenced on the evening of Monday, by a gathering in the "Cur-saal," where musicians met and exchanged salutes, and drank such quantities of beer that the whole might seem to be intended for a feeble charade on the words: "Ale fellow, well met!"—this to the tune of sundry not specially striking polkas and waltzes, performed by a military band—the performances varied by speeches still less striking. My own share of the beer was barely sufficient to keep up my spirits, and I joined but feebly in the vociferous applause bestowed on a pot-pourri, introducing Papageno's air from the Zauberflöte and the minuet from Don Giovanni. The music of Tuesday evening, however, was a different affair altogether. I have never heard a more perfect performance of Cherubini's overture to Anacreon than that achieved by the admirable orchestra so ably conducted by M. Dessoff, formerly conductor at the Opera of Vienna—and thus no stranger to these artists—now, however, established permanently at Carlsruhe. I was very much impressed by the artistic intelligence evinced in M. Dessoff's readings; by the delicacy of gradation from absolute pianissimo—not (observe) a toneless pianissimo—to fortissimo, by the uniform beauty of tone and correctness of intonation; even those frequent sinners, the flutes and horns, being, as I thought, free from all reproach. There was, too, a vigour and ensemble of attack, a crispness of accentuation, "a go" about it all, which was most refreshing. A Passacaglia by J. S. Bach, with orchestral accompaniments by H. Esser, followed; but, well as it was played, I prefer it in its original form.

Whether the heat of the room may have told its tale before the Mendelssohn scherzo came on, I cannot say; certain it is that it sounded just a little tame, and did not quite realise the expectations raised by the admirably spirited rendering of the Anacreon. But in the C minor Symphony, which furnished the whole of the second part of the concert, and could, therefore, be listened to with the concentrated attention it deserves (in London I have known the Choral Symphony and the Mass in D of Beethoven crammed into one concert!)—in the C minor Symphony, the orchestral performers were "all there" again. I think I never heard so fine a performance of the slow movement, scherzo, and finale. The first movement I thought less remarkable. In the Symphony, as in the first overture, the unerring clearness with which the various subjects were given out; the alternate vigour and delicacy of tone; its fulness when most subdued; its invariably excellent quality, were very remarkable, and, no doubt, the conductor, so long associated with this orchestra, may be credited with a large share in the result.

Among ourselves we have had ample opportunity of observing how much a conductor may achieve, and how much he may mar. I must not omit to mention Mozart's concertante, for violin and viola, with orchestral accompaniment, efficiently played by Messrs Grün (viola) and Krancewicz (violin)—an accident having disabled Herr Lauterbach, who was to have taken the violin part. To ears accustomed to Joachim and Straus, comparisons would inevitably suggest themselves; and I thought that, though perfection is not within the reach of other than very exceptional talent, still the music of Mozart should rouse every educated musician to some degree of poetic warmth. The last movement of this work is, as you know, quite captivating in its melodious mirth. I wonder it is not oftener heard.

The singing, as is usual where instrumental performances are made the great feature, was not very remarkable. Mdme Gompertz-Bettelheim has retired for some years from the public exercise of her art, and her voice, formerly admirable, has lost some of its freshness. She has, however, great power and much dramatic feeling. She declaimed Handel's fine air very effectively. Herr Staudigl, a nephew, as I am told, of the basso once so well known in England, has a very powerful and well-trained bass voice of great compass and good quality; but he sang Spohr's song, "Liebe ist die zarte Blüthe," with little warmth of expression or breadth of phrasing.

There was a large and very enthusiastic audience—good listeners, including members of the Imperial family of Austria. The whole orchestra, as well as their talented conductor, had several times to stand up in acknowledgment of the applause so deservedly bestowed upon them. This first evening was a very decided success, and was probably by none more thoroughly enjoyed than by your friend, just now a wanderer.

Wednesday, 18th July.

The second concert of the Salzburg festival opened with Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony"—the performance of which, however, was not of exceptional excellence. Throughout the slow movement the violins used mutes (sordini),* the effect of which, in forte and crescendo passages, was to produce a nasal tone far from agreeable, and destructive of that sustained power so essential to broad phrasing. The wood instruments seemed to have received such strict orders to subdue their tone, that even in passages where they had the lead, they were scarcely heard. The result was not a happy one. Then in the minuet the rhythm was marked and accentuated with a square-toed accuracy, recalling the sober old German waltz before the deux temps rubato which came into fashion. Thus, though the first and last movements were vigorously and well played, the whole performance was not of more than average merit. This symphony constituted the whole first part of the concert. The second part began with Wagner's overture, called by its composer Faust. His worshippers, being in the secret, would know why. To outsiders like myself many other titles might appear equally suitable. I should call it "de omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis," or "Jerome Paturot à la recherche de la meilleure des républiques," or take it to symbolise the German idea before Bismarck, so vague and disjointed did it sound. But I had not "the Book" to guide me. Any how, the members of the orchestra were never for an instant puzzled, thanks possibly to their talented conductor, with whom they shared much well-merited applause. Then presently followed the variations on Haydn's theme, in which Brahms puts forth all the resources of his art with such consummate skill and sustained vigour, with such endless variety of rhythm and wealth of melody. This was again most admirably performed, and left nothing to be desired. Weber's Euryanthe overture, a very fine and most spirited performance, concluded the list of orchestral pieces—a most brilliant wind up. Besides these, was the pianoforte concerto of Schumann, very well played by Brüll, a most capable performer; himself composer, as well as virtuoso.

But in these days, when impossibilities are accomplished as a matter of course by the great stars, no pianist of average, or even more than merely average attainments, can hope to make his mark. He merely goes to swell the tail of one or other comet. Herr Brüll would always take rank as a very good pianist. He will never be gaped at, like Rubinstein, nor abused (let this be his consolation) like Arabella Goddard. Last, not by any means least, let me speak of Mdme Louise Dustmann. This is one of that school of great singers now growing so rare—an artist in every sense of the term—though considerably past her prime; her every note, her every movement (she is said to be a consummate actress) gives evidence of the highest artistic training. Her voice, though evidently but the remnant of what it once was, is still rich, powerful, and sympathetic; her style, broad, unaffected, and thoroughly musical. She sang Gluck's grand air very finely indeed; and in Mozart's well-known duet from Figaro, produced an effect which I have rarely heard equalled. She was capitally seconded by Herr Staudigl. The audience clamoured for an encore, and I was partly consoled for her refusal by the admirable grace with which she made la grande révérence—the court courtesy—to the venerable Arch-Duke who presided at the Festival performance. May we often see her like again !*

This morning was dedicated to an "ovation," which consisted in this: that a gathering of (in every sense) warm Mozart admirers climbed up a steep hill, commanding a lovely view, to a sort of summer-house, where when the spot was not yet disfigured by a very hideous bust of himself, Mozart is said to have written the Zauberflöte—in proof of which an old chair and table are shown to this very day. The ovationers came furnished with huge wreaths. These they hung on pegs round the chair and table, speechified, and sang part-songs, till some one having incautiously pronounced the word Beer! the assembly abruptly dispersed. They remembered that they were thirsty. To-morrow we are to have a quartet and a farce. Till then, good-bye.

Thursday, July 19th.

This morning a very pleasant chamber concert took place in the Aula, or Concert Hall. A quartet in G by Haydn, and another in G minor by Volkmann were played with considerable finish and great accuracy of ensemble, as, indeed, might be expected from leading members of M. Dessoff's orchestra. Of course they would not bear comparison with those performances with which the Monday Popular Concerts have familiarised us. To me I confess the Volkmann quartet was a novelty; and if it is not already familiar to more regular frequenters of Mr Chappell's concerts,† the sooner his attention is called to it, the better. The noble adagio, the sprightly scherzo, the finale, with its charming melody, embroidered, as it were, with pizzicato cello accompaniment—in a word, the whole most genially tuneful composition—would certainly please all lovers of good music. The author, I am told, still lives at Pesth.

The great hit of the concert was Mme Gompertz-Bettelheim's fine declamatory singing of Schubert's beautiful songs, "Der zwerg" and "Auf dem see," which she delivered with such power and pathos (quite free from exaggeration) as to rouse her audience to loud enthusiasm. She responded to their unanimous wish by giving Rubinstein's romance, "Wenn es nur immer so bliebe." Her success was great and well merited. Mme Dustmann had selected songs less generally popular, by Schumann and by Brahms; but she sang them admirably, and, on being re-called, gave Mozart's "Veilchen."

Goldmark's Suite, a work of very considerable merit, was well played by Messrs Grün and Brüll, though the hypercritical might object that the pianist sometimes seemed to forget that he had not the leading part, and that the amount of tone to be got out of a piano is not necessarily proportionate to the strength of attack. M. Krancsewicz led Volkmann's quartet admirably, with fine tone, right good reading, faultless intonation. Everything was most satisfactory, and thus ended a most enjoyable concert. I should add, by the way, that a certain Countess Gatterburg sang some Lieder by Mozart, as countesses generally sing (when their husbands are not called Rossi), and won a succès d'estime, such as countesses generally win, even when they sing a little out of tune.

With the chamber concert the Festival comes to an end, so far as regular music is concerned. There will still be "social gatherings" and friendly beer meetings, in the principal out-of-door cafés; also two performances at the theatre, of a farce, written, I believe, in the Viennese dialect, and therefore intelligible to very few foreigners. All these matters, together with the proposed Liedertafel (Choral Union) performances with which they alternate, are carefully set forth in the book specially prepared for the guidance of visitors. They have, of course, no other than local interest; and the rain, which has set in resolutely and wholly veiled the lovely mountain views, will perhaps cause an early dispersion of the not very numerous musical guests.

It is proposed to repeat the Festival next year. And I can safely advise lovers of good music and of beautiful scenery to attend. W. S. R.

HERB MAURICE STRAKOSCH is still in London.

SIG. MERELLI, the famous Viennese impresario, has been in London.

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET, the celebrated Russian pianist, is paying a short visit to London.

MR EDWARD CHAPPELL, eldest son of Mr William Chappell, F.A.S., was married on the 19th inst. to a daughter of Mr Ward, the eminent Academician.

SIG. SCHIBA has gone to Milan, to pay his annual visit to his near relations, and to make further arrangements about his forthcoming new opera. Buon viaggio!

MISS LYDIA THOMPSON, on her return from America in September next, will give opera-bouffe at the Folly Theatre in a style hitherto unfamiliar to the English public.

MME ADELINA PATTI is taking a brief repose "by the sad sea waves," where she will be visited occasionally by Sir Julius Benedict, composer of the Brides of Venice.

THE interesting series of concerts given by the eminent pianist, Mr W. H. Holmes, at Langham Hall, for the exhibition of his professional pupils (the third of which took place on Thursday afternoon), will be noticed next week.

MR GYE has granted leave of absence to Mdle Zaré Thalberg during the autumn and winter months, but she returns to her duties at the Royal Italian Opera in the spring—for which at this period of posture-making (termed "natural acting") we ought to be thankful.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT, Messrs Walter Macfarren, C. E. Stephens, F. B. Jewson, John Thomas, Arthur Sullivan, and Benson are elected directors of the Philharmonic Society for 1877-8.

"If," Paganini said, "I let a day go by without touching my violin, I immediately am aware of it; if I let two days elapse, it is the public who are aware of it."

At a recent meeting of Paris barristers, M. Bétolaud, bétonnier, in the chair, the question: "Is the translation of a literary work an act of piracy?" was decided in the affirmative.

THE musical collection left by the Viennese musicologist, Herr Ambros, includes the following works: Missa cujusvis Toni, by Jean Okeghem; "Salve, Crux," motet by Hobrecht; sixty-six compositions by Josquin des Prés, comprising the mass: Super Voces musicales, and his six-part motet, "Victimæ paschali;" songs in the fugued style by Loyset Compère; "The Lamentations," by Antoine de Ferrin; "Jerusalem, luge," motet by Jean Richafort; an eight-part "Confitebor" and an eight-part serenade, "Angelus ad Pastores," by Orlando Lasso; eight "Magnificats" by Morales; as well as numerous Lieder and motets by Heinrich Fink, besides a great number of compositions by old Italian masters.

"THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR" AT COVENT GARDEN:—Mdle Thalberg was a most fascinating Mrs Ford, and we never heard her fine voice to greater advantage, than in the somewhat lengthy scena in the first act, or in the duet with Mrs Page, rendered to absolute perfection by her and Mdle Scalchi. Equal praise is due to Mdle Bianchi's Anne Page, quite a little cabinet picture of innocence and half-childish love. Sig. Piazza, the representative of Fenton, is the typical sweet-voiced tenor, and his romanza of the nightingale, already referred to, earned a well-deserved encore. Slender, perhaps the most successful attempt at characterisation in the piece, was well rendered by Sig. Rosario. It is true that he has to do little more than look sentimental and sigh "Sweet Anne Page" at certain intervals. It would be unfair to judge Sig. Capponi's Falstaff from an English point of view. The significance of Shakspeare's Sir John had evidently escaped him; but as a jovial reprobate, of somewhat indistinct type and nationality, he left little to be desired, and he showed too little of the gentlemen and boon companion of princes in his bearing. The parts of Mr Ford, Mr Page, and Dr Caius, were ably filled by Signors Pandolfini, Scolara, and Caracciolo. Dresses and scenery in the first acts were appropriate, and might pass for Elizabethan; but in the masque, the orthodox gauze and tights were painfully in the ascendant.—Examiner, July 21.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

THE "London Conservatory of Music" had a matinée at Langham Hall on Thursday, July 12. Mmes Ravenscroft and Labouchere, Miss Adeline Beecham, and Mr E. M. Deering made their first appearances as vocalists, and Mr George Pearce, as pianist, on the occasion. All acquitted themselves to the satisfaction of the audience. Mr Lansdowne Cottell and Herr Heinrich Leopold conducted.

MDME ANITA QUEROL, a soprano, gave her first concert at Langham Hall on Tuesday evening, the 10th inst. She was assisted by Mdle Enequist, Mdme Marie Belval, Signori Perugini and Adelmann, and Mr Frederick Penna (vocalists); Mr Ganz (piano), M. Nathan (violinello), and Herr Oberthür (harp). The concert-giver was called upon to repeat both her songs, an aria by Verdi and Mr Ganz's "A damsel fair." Mdle Enequist sang some Swedish melodies and "Bel raggio" (encored). Two new songs were given by Mr Frederick Penna, the second of which, "The Victorine," a composition of a very taking character, was encored. Mr Oberthür, being called after his "Clouds and Sunshine," played another piece. Mr Nathan's performance on the violinello gave general satisfaction. Mr Ganz played his "Réverie" and new grand galop, "Allons Vite." Herr Lehmeier and Mr Ganz were accompanists. The hall was well filled.

MR GERARD COVENTRY'S morning concert took place on Wednesday, June 13th, at Langham Hall, Great Portland Street. The vocalists were Mmes Edna Hall, Louise Gage, Mdle Hélène Arnim, and Miss Agnes Larkcom, Messrs Gerard Coventry, Bernard Lane, Edwin Holland, Cecil Tovey, and Sig. Toretti. The instrumentalists were: pianoforte, Miss H. Prytherch; harp, Mr Frederick Chatterton; and violinello, Herr Schuberth. Mr Coventry has a tenor voice of agreeable quality, and sings with taste. After the "Rose Song," from Balfe's Il Talismano, he was re-called. His proficiency as a singer in concerted music was shown in the quintet from Un Ballo in Maschera, "E scherzo o l'è follia." The other vocalists were more or less successful, Mdme Louise Gage after "O mio Fernando," Miss Larkcom after a valse by Balfe, and Mdle Arnim after Mr Cowen's "Almost," being all called back to the platform. Miss H. Prytherch, a young, intelligent and clever pianist, obtained well-merited applause in pieces by Ketten and Schumann, added to Weber's Rondo Brillante, which was her greatest success. The conductors were Signor Zuccardi, Mr Parry Cole, and Herr Lehmeier.

MDME SIDNEY PRATTEN'S guitar recital, on Thursday, June 21st, at the Beethoven Rooms, was highly successful. The vocalists were Mdle Mathilde Enequist, Signor Alfonso Seneca, and the London Glee and Madrigal Union (Miss Jane Wells, Messrs Thomas Baxter, William Coates, Montem Smith, and William Winn); and the instrumentalists: guitar, Mdme Sidney Pratten; flute, Herr Oluf Svensden; and piano, Signor Romano. Mdme Pratten, acknowledged one of the best guitar players of the day, introduced a number of compositions, including "Introduction" (by Mdme Sidney Pratten), "Andante" (Ferdinand Sor), "Prestissimo" (Legnani), and "Village Children at Play" (by Leonard Schulz); "Treue Liebe" (by Mdme Sidney Pratten), "Kelpies' Dance" (by Leonard Schulz), and "Elfin's Revels" (by Mdme Sidney Pratten); a duet for guitar and flute (by Giuliani), with Herr Oluf Svensden; variations on the "Carnaval de Venise" (arranged by Mdme Sidney Pratten); and, with Signor Romano, two duets for guitar and piano, "German March" and "The Princess Louise Valse" (composed for her pupils by Mdme Sidney Pratten). The lovers of the guitar had quite a feast, and, gratified with all they heard, rewarded Mdme Pratten with genuine applause at the conclusion of each of her performances.

MR AUGUSTUS L. TAMPLIN (late of St James's, Westmoreland Street), gave a recital on the Mustel harmonium, at 13, Portland Place, Cavendish Square (by permission of J. Hamilton Craigmie, Esq.), on Saturday, July 21st, performing with remarkable precision and finish Rossini's Overture to Guillaume Tell; Sinfonia in F minor (Tamplin); Wagner's Overture to Die Fliegende Holländer; and, with Mr J. Munro Coward at the pianoforte, Handel's Concerto in B flat. Mr Tamplin was assisted by Mdme Edna Hall, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mdme Mathilde Zimeri, Mdle Holinberg, Miss Coyte Turner, Sig. Monari-Rocca, Sig. Urio, and Mr F. H. Cowen; Sig. Rotoli filling the post of conductor. The artistic singing of "Ti Rapirei" (Tosti), by Mdme Edna Hall; "Miei rampolli," Cenerentola (Rossini), by Sig. Monari-Rocca; "Angels, ever bright and fair," by Mdme Zimeri; "A Lost Chord" (Macfarren), by Miss Coyte Turner, with American organ accompaniment; and last, not least, "I hear thee speak of a better land" (Arthur Cecil), by Miss A. Butterworth, deserves especial mention. The audience, though not large, was appreciative. The Mustel harmonium was kindly lent by Messrs Metzler & Co., of Great Marlborough Street, and the grand piano by Messrs Broadwood & Sons.

MISS EDWARDS' annual matinée musicale d'invitation, at her residence, 100, Ebury Street, Eaton Square, was attended by a select audience. Miss Edwards sustained her twofold claim as pianist and vocalist. Henselt's study, "Si oiseau j'étais," and Tito Mattei's "Quatrième Valse" exhibited her lightness of touch, combined with other qualifications. Mozart's "Voi che sapete" and Frederic Clay's "The Sands o' Dee," her vocal contributions, were each perfectly rendered. Miss Alice Fairman sang, with her accustomed finish, "The Lost Chord" and "Gone, like the snows of winter,"—the latter from the pen of the concert-giver. M. Valdec and Mr F. Penna pleased equally, the former in a new Italian air (accompanied by the composer), the latter in two songs of his own, "Trusting the Compass" and "The Victorine." Herr Oberthür's harp solos, "Clouds and Sunshine" and "Cascade," were both encored and repeated. Herr Oberthür also played, with Miss Edwards, a brilliant duet for harp and pianoforte. A clever young lady amateur pianist, Miss Ethel Sharp, pupil of Miss Edwards, played a piece by Henselt, and a gigue and gavotte by Corelli, with great success. Miss Polhill Turner, also an amateur, pupil of Miss Edwards, sang "Nobil Signor" very pleasingly. M. Albert accompanied the vocal music.

THE concert of Mr Pratt, the young American composer and pianist, took place before a numerous and appreciative audience. The programme, as is usual on such occasions, was of a somewhat miscellaneous kind, the répertoire of the Italian stage being largely drawn upon by the various singers. Amongst the contributions of this class, we single out the refined rendering of the well-worn aria, "Qui la voce," from Bellini's Puritani, by Mdle Rosavella. Mdme Antoinette Sterling gave a highly interesting ballad, and Mr Shakspeare a spirited song of Mr Pratt's composition. Two pieces by Chopin, played on the pianoforte by Mr Pratt, were received with much applause, as were also two of his own pièces de salon, a charmingly simple "Melody," and a somewhat diffuse "Dream," remarkable chiefly for the clever introduction of an American tune. As a composer, Mr Pratt belongs decidedly to the modern German school of music. The influence of Liszt and Wagner is observable in the structure of his music, and actual reminiscence is not always avoided. Of this dependence, the young composer will no doubt free himself in time, and there are in his work hopeful signs of original power. His compositions produced a favourable impression on his audience, and the tenor song, especially if heard more frequently, might become a favourite at our chamber concerts. We have seen some of Mr Pratt's larger compositions, which show him to be a proficient writer for the orchestra. He has also composed an opera to a libretto of his own.—Examiner.

GOD IS EVERYWHERE.*

"Dear Mother," said a little child, "Oh, tell me where is God! His mansion must be beautiful, This mansion of the Lord." They stroll'd along the garden path, 'Mid verdure fresh and bright; The child look'd up with beaming eyes, All fill'd with wondrous light— "God dwells within the flowers," she "The lovely, lovely flow'rs," cried, All warm'd and gladden'd by the sun, And freshen'd by the show'rs.	"God may be in the shining brook, So joyous in its flow; Perhaps that babbling is His voice, That speaks to us so low. I hear a whispering in the trees, A murmur soft and sweet; Perhaps 'tis there He makes His home, Where waving branches meet; But then the sky is beautiful, He surely must be there. Ah! now, at last, I know the truth, That God is everywhere."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

(RETROSPECT.)

The late Otto Nicolai's best opera, Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor, was produced on Saturday night, July 14, at this theatre. In a new Italian version, entitled Le Vispe Comari di Windsor, with an English translation by Mr Joseph Pittman.

Thirteen years ago it was brought out by Mr Mapleson, at Her Majesty's Theatre, under the direction of Signor Ardit, with Mdles Tietjens and Bettelheim, as the "merry wives," Mr Santley and the late M. Gassier as the two husbands, M. Junca as Falstaff, Mdle Vitali as Anne Page, and the late Giuglini as Fenton. The fortunes of this work have been varied. In Germany, where it was first presented (Berlin, 1849), it has always been a favourite, the libretto by Mosenthal, author of Leah (Deborah)—founded, of course, upon Shakspeare's well-known comedy—being almost as much admired as the music. At the Théâtre-Lyrique in Paris, where it was brought out (1866) by M. Carvalho, with a French adaptation (supplied by M. Jules Barbier), although well cast, its success did not come up to expectation. The admirable performances, however, at Her Majesty's Theatre were received with so much favour that it is difficult to understand why the opera did not remain a fixture in the repertory. Its revival at Mr Gye's establishment affords it a new chance, and we shall be surprised if it is not made a feature in the programme of next season. The music is, to say the least, as good as that of Flotow's Marta, and the piece quite as diverting. How Shakspeare has been handled by the librettist our readers have already been informed; and a detailed analysis of the score at this time would be altogether superfluous. Enough that, as has been stated more than once, the music of Otto Nicolai is in the German-French style, with, here and there, faint reflections of Mozart, proclaiming the composer's nationality. Nicolai (one of the greatest conductors of his time, by the way) was an excellent musician, and though, as his Templario, an Italian opera produced at Milan ten years before Die lustigen Weiber, had already proved, by no means overburdened with original ideas, wrote with the ease and fluency of a master, atoning by more or less finished workmanship for more or less poverty of invention. The Merry Wives of Windsor is, at any rate, pleasant to listen to, if only because it is never dull or wearisome, and because the third and concluding act is just as enlivening as the first. The melody, if rarely new or striking, is continuous, the dramatic treatment consistent and striking throughout. The opera, as might have been taken for granted, is most effectively put upon the stage at Covent Garden, and the performance generally is one of more than average excellence. The two "merry wives" could hardly be better represented than by Mdle Zaré Thalberg and Mdmé Scalchi. Mdle Thalberg's Mrs Ford is in many respects her happiest achievement. The development of her voice, fresh and charming when first heard among us—in the spring of 1875, the year of her début, as Zerlina in Don Giovanni—and now rapidly acquiring the fulness and maturity which only years and experience can bring, has, on more than one occasion been the subject of remark. On Saturday night this was declared to conspicuous advantage, the recitative and air of Act I, with the lively sequel, "In questa vita é certamente burla innocente," delivered with no less point than brilliancy, at once establishing the position of the young and promising artist. Mdle Thalberg's acting throughout was full of liveliness and genuine humour. She had a worthy comrade in Mdmé Scalchi, whose Mrs Page, both vocally and dramatically, is all that could be desired. Mdle Bianchi was a pleasing Anne Page; and her lover, Fenton, with his pretty, lachrymose air, "Odi, canta l'usignuol" (encored and repeated) found a thoroughly musical and competent representative in Signor Piazza. The graceful and expressive duet in which Anne Page reproaches Fenton with doubting her affection was well sung by both, and no small attraction was added to it by the consummate playing of Mr Carrodus in the obbligato violin part, its agreeable and characteristic accompaniment. Signor Pandolfini was excellent as Mr Ford—although by no means effacing the memory of our own distinguished baritone, Mr Santley. There is no solo air for Mr Ford; and Signor Pandolfini, like his English predecessor, had the good taste to refrain from interpolating one. Mr Ford, however, has a great deal of music to declaim and sing, and much to do for which a certain histrionic talent is indispensable. In both respects his Italian representative exhibits thorough proficiency. Mr Page, as set forth by Nicolai, is a personage of much less significance than his irascible comrade; but in his impersonation Signor Scolari shows both care and intelligence. To find anything like an acceptable Falstaff now-a-days would be a difficult matter on any stage—most of all, perhaps, on the Italian. We must therefore be content with saying that if Signor Capponi imparts no genuine humour to his delineation of the amorous knight, he at all events possesses a voice capable of giving due effect to a great deal of the music. The subordinate parts of Slender and Dr Caius are sustained by Signors Rosario and Caracciolo. The Mrs Quickly, Sir Hugh Evans, "Mine Host of the Garter," Shallow, Simple, Bardolph, Nym, Pistol, &c., of Shakspeare's play are all omitted from the libretto of Mosenthal, and judiciously so, for, hardly amenable to musical illustration, they would have overcrowded the score to little or no advantage. Nor are they at all wanted for the purposes of the opera as it stands. In speaking of the performance generally, conducted with great ability by Signor Bevignani, we must bestow a word of unqualified praise upon the orchestra, the performance of the overture alone (unanimously encored) being a distinguishing feature. This overture is Nicolai's most effective—pleasing alike in concert-room and theatre. It is modelled after the operatic preludes of Auber; and if it may not compare with them in originality of invention, it exhibits a melodic fluency and spontaneity almost invariably characterising similar efforts by the greatest of French dramatic composers. The audience, to judge by the repeated applause, were evidently charmed with Nicolai's work. It was given again on Monday night, for the benefit of Mdle Zaré Thalberg.—Times.

THE PILGRIM.*

A BALLAD.

The yule logs blaz'd and spark'd high, The blast was loud and keen, While mirth and childish revelry Made gay the hall within. The Pilgrim cast a wistful glance Upon the laughing crew: To hide a tear, across his eyes His wither'd hand he drew. He heav'd a sigh—a look of pain O'er his pale features pass'd; But soon regain'd his wonted calm, And thus he spoke at last:— "My heart was light when love's young dream Its first impression made, But now a weary weight of woe Has caus'd its joy to fade. "Bright beauty's smile no longer lures, Her arts are us'd in vain; Once having truly lov'd and lost, I ne'er can love again. "Ah me! how could I e'er forget My first and only love? Kind time alone could heal the wound, The poison'd dart remove. "My fancy thought thee passing fair, And soon was captive led: Erewhile my hope lay buried at Thy shrine, oh cruel maid! "But still I love thee, faithless one, My heart is still the same;	And death alone can quench its fire, Or kill its living flame. "Alone I tread my homeward path With feeble steps and slow; And youth and joy and love have left Me sorrowing below. "One only ray of hope remains, The last that cheers me on, I soon shall break these earthly chains That keep my spirit down. "My pilgrim's staff and shell I leave Without a pang behind, And no kind heart a sigh will heave When haply they shall find 'Beneath a tree in some lone wood A pilgrim old and grey; His body cold in death's embrace, A heap of lifeless clay." His trembling voice betray'd the grief He vainly sought to hide: In tears at length he found relief The world to him denied. No kind entreaties could induce The aged man to stay; And having suppd and bless'd us all, He took his lonely way. A year has pass'd—beneath the ground The poor old Pilgrim lies; His soulless body now awaits The summons to arise.

Mr JOHN RUSKIN, in his speech at the annual meeting of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, observed that he thought it would be better by pictures and other means to call forth the feelings of kindness towards household pets, and thus towards animals in general, rather than rely too much on fines and other punishments. We think the admirable society will do well to act upon the sound opinion thus expressed, by offering prizes next year for those drawings and paintings (most calculated to develop a love of kindness towards animals) that may be sent in for competition, in addition to the essays.—Choir.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

On Tuesday, July 17th, Halévy's La Juive was given at the Salle Monnigny. Mlle de Gérardon (La Juive) and Mlle Nau, in the duet in Act 4, were twice "called." M. Eyrault (first tenor) seemed at home in the part of Eleazer, but the Cardinal, impersonated by M. Lamarche, left something to be desired. M. Descamps undertook the part of Léopold, and M. Lourde that of Ruggiero.

On Thursday there was "relâche" for a rehearsal of Paul et Virginie, which was produced on Saturday, July 21. The author of this tale, charming to our childhood, by name Jacques-Henri Bernardin de Saint Pierre, was born at Havre in 1737, and was descended from the famous Eustache de Saint Pierre, who saved Calais when Edward III. and his son, the Black Prince, made "ravages" in this part of France. Little could the engineer, and subsequent emigrant to l'île de France, dream that his Paul et Virginie, supposed to be recited to him by a vieillard, and penned by himself in 1788, would ever become an opera. Bernardin was an Intendant du Jardin des Plantes, in Paris, under Louis XVI. Napoleon I. decorated him with the Cross of the Legion of Honour. Joseph, King of Spain, gave him a pension of 6,000 francs.

To say that Paul et Virginie was a success would be true, but to state that it was the greatest success I have ever witnessed at Boulogne would be more to the point. M. Herbert and Mlle Nau were perfect in the principal parts; Mlle Gérardon was the negress slave; M. Lamarche, Domingue (the negro); M. Lourde, Mlles Parent and Lambert, St Croix, Mde de Latour, and Marguerite. The chorus and orchestra were good, and there were two new and effective scenes painted for the occasion. X. T. R.

THE MANCHESTER TOWN HALL ORGAN.

(From the "Manchester Guardian," July 15.)

By invitation of the Mayor and Corporation, a large number of musical amateurs and others assembled last evening in the Town Hall to listen to an "inaugural recital," given by Mr Best, of Liverpool, upon the new organ, the erection of which has just been completed by the builder, M. Cavaille-Coll, of Paris. Mr Best has so long occupied the first position amongst English executive organists that it is scarcely necessary to say his playing was listened to with the greatest curiosity and interest by all, and not the least by those whose familiarity with the organ made them best able to estimate the difficulties which were surmounted. Mr Best is fortunately well acquainted with the characteristics of foreign as well as English organs. He is therefore able at almost a moment's notice to take his place at a strange instrument, and to display his capabilities in a manner which astonishes a less experienced organist. His selection of music was happily adapted to exhibit the separate stops and various combinations of the new organ. It is composed of three claviers or keyboards, each extending five octaves, from C to C, with a pedal-board of two and a half octaves, from C to F. One of the chief characteristics of the instrument, as compared with English work, lies in the immense number of pédales de combinaison which it places under the control of the performer. Of these there are no fewer than twenty-four, and the resources thus offered to the player enable him to produce effects which would be impossible on an instrument less complete in this department. The organ will not bear comparison in point of size with many already existing in this country; but from the experience of last evening we are satisfied that it is amply large and powerful enough for the room in which it is placed, and that in competent hands almost every legitimate effect may be extracted from it. M. Cavaille-Coll is already known as the designer and builder of several organs in England, and has gained especial commendation for the excellence of his workmanship and the artistic balance of the different timbres in his instruments. His reed stops have a broad clear roundness of tone which makes it possible to use them singly without the softening addition of flute stops, as is generally necessary. The harshness and impromptitude of speech so common in this department of ordinary organs is entirely overcome. Amongst the reed stops especially noticeable in the new organ are the trompettes—one on each manual and pedal—the clarionette, hautbois-et-basson, and contre-basson. The flute work is also charmingly mellow, while it is round and full, as this fundamental portion of an organ should be. The gambas are of excellent and distinctive quality; nor should we omit to notice the very beautiful voix célestes, of which admirable use was made more than once by Mr. Best. The performance opened with one of Handel's organ concertos, that in A major, the largetto of which is a charming movement. This was followed by a most effective paraphrase by Mr Best of the preghiera from Rossini's "Maometto Secondo," an admirable medium for the display of such an instrument as he presided at. Bach's glorious "Toccata con Fuga" belongs to the older and perhaps more legitimate school of organ music. All who heard the first movement must have realised how grand were the conceptions of the old Liepsic Cantor, and some may perhaps be induced to enter upon the serious study of these immortal works, which, however, are so difficult that few are ever capable of rendering due justice to their massive conceptions and intricate details. A charming minuetto from a symphony by Sir W. Sterndale Bennett was succeeded by a religious march, the composition of L. Niedermeyer. A concert fugue by Mr Best was next given, "for the first time of performance." The fugue has a quaint trumpet-call subject, and is a favourable specimen of Mr. Best's skill as a composer. From Padre Martini a quaint gavotte was selected, the imitative motives of which were admirably contrasted by the selection of stops. An Allegro con brio by Morandi enabled Mr Best to display the crisp staccato which the lightness of the organ-touch makes it possible to obtain. An andante with variations from a serenade by Beethoven and a grand march by Henry Smart brought this interesting performance to a close. During the evening Mr Best had repeatedly to acknowledge the plaudits of a very critical audience.

DESCRIPTION OF THE ORGAN.

WAIFS.

Mr Handel Gear has gone to Ems.

Mad. Marie Cabel is suffering from a paralytic attack.

Mlle de Reszké has gone to her native town, Warsaw.

Mr Goldberg has left London to pass his vacation in Vienna.

Mlle D'Angeri is engaged for next season at the San Carlo, Naples.

Mr Shakespeare is engaged to sing at the ensuing Festival at Leeds.

The Nestor of Italian Impresarii, Vincenzo Jacovacci, has been stopping in Milan.

The principal Vocal Associations of Germany have been invited to take part in the Rubens Tercentenary at Antwerp.

The Princess Margherita, of Italy, has presented Sig. Salvini with a diamond pin.

Mr William Dorrell has left London to pass his vacation at his seat in Sussex.

Sig. Boito's Mefistofele is to be given next season at the Teatro de Oriente, Madrid.

There will be neither an Italian nor a French company next season, at Cairo.

Félicien David's Perle du Brésil will be revived next season at the Paris Opéra-Comique.

Sig. Masini is engaged for the tenor part in M. Gounod's Cinq-Mars at St Petersburg.

Signor Muzio has been offered the post of conductor at the Academy of Music, New York.

Mdlle Daram has made her début as Marguerite in Gounod's Faust, at the Grand Opera, Paris.

A marriage is announced to take place next month between Mdlle Louise Gage and Mr William Courtney.

The first number of a new fortnightly review, La Cronaca artistica, has been published at Barcelona.

M. Victor Massé is at Brussels making arrangements for the production of his Paul et Virginie at the Monnaie.

Mdlle Ziméri and Mr Welby Wallace were the vocalists last week at M. Riviere's promenade concerts, at the Queen's Theatre.

The firm of Chickering, New York, celebrated the manufacture of its 50,000th piano, by opening a free library for the use of its workmen.

Signor Gomez, composer of Il Guarany and Salvator Rosa, is completing the opera of Salambo, which Enrico Petrella left unfinished.

The monument to the memory of Carl Wilhelm, composer of "Die Wacht am Rhein," will be inaugurated at Crefeld, his native place, on the 2nd September.

Mdlle Heilbronn will re-appear on the 1st October, at the Théâtre-Lyrique, in Le Bravo. She is to play in two new operas by Offenbach and the Marquis D'Ivry (!).

The Chevalier Biletta has just finished a new opera, in three acts, entitled Val di Fiori. M. Biletta's opera, La Rosa di Fiorenza, is to be performed during the autumn season at Lecco.

Mr Brinley Richards has accepted an engagement to give his "Illustrations of National Music" at the chief towns in North and South Wales, during the months of August and September.

King Alfonso intends establishing a permanent French Theatre, at Madrid. The fact may be doubted. Las Cosas de España comprise a vast number of things, but not many permanent.

Raffaello Lambiasi, the Nestor of Italian violinists, died recently at Naples. Born in 1795, he was appointed professor at the Naples Conservatory in 1842, and held the post at the time of his decease.

It appears that the lady who died a short time since, Signora Pacifico, née Cimarosa, a grand niece of the composer, was not the last of the family. Two Cimarosas, Aurelio and Ippolito are still alive.

We understand that Mr W. H. Cummings has succeeded the late Mr Land as Secretary of the Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club. A better selection from the professional members of the club could scarcely have been made, as Mr Cummings is not only well qualified for the post as a skilful artist, but his literary ability and research mark him out as a worthy occupant for the office.—Choir.

Mr W. Pyatt, of Nottingham has arranged with Mr Sims Reeves and Mr Santley for an autumn tour, commencing at Northampton, on September 25th, and ending at the same town on November 12th. Mrs Osgood, Miss Orridge, Mr H. Nicholson, and Mr Sidney Naylor will "assist."

The French Minister of Fine Arts has given the bronze for Rameau's statue, to be executed by M. Guillaume, director of the Ecole des Beaux Arts. The statue will be on view at the Paris Exhibition of 1878, and permanently erected at Dijon in September, the month of Rameau's birth and death.

Signor Emilio Ueiglio, conductor next season at the Théâtre-Italien, Paris, exercised the same functions at the Teatro Apollo, Rome, in 1875, when Aida was produced. He is also the composer of Le Educande di Sorrento, an opera which has been performed in Naples alone more than a hundred nights.

We have now before us the actual figures compiled from Mackeson's Guide to the Churches of London, to which we briefly referred last week, and we find that out of the 838 churches, of which full details are given in the Guide, there is choral service at 228, and partly choral service at 245; giving a total of 473, or considerably more than half, where psalms are chanted. The number of churches with a choral celebration of the Holy Communion has risen from 41 in 1869 to 114 in the present year. There are now surpliced choirs at 340 churches, as against 144 in 1869, a remarkable increase. The chorists are paid at 144 churches, while there are voluntary choirs at 400, no information, we presume, being given as to the existence or non-existence of choirs in other cases. The use of the Gregorian tones show a decrease on the previous year.—Choir.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 879 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grist, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

NEW PIANOFORTE PIECE BY MADAME OURY. "CONSOLATION."

Easy of execution, but melodious and effective. Price 4s.; Half-price Cash or Stamps.

"We wonder who has not, in the hour of trouble, more than once derived comfort from the sweet sounds such as David must have used to mollify the troubled spirit of Saul. What better name, then, to give a graceful strain of peaceful melody, such as must convey to the sorrowing heart feelings of rest and sympathy, than 'Consolation'? Such is the title of a charming new piano-forte composition by that indefatigable and prolific writer, Madame Oury; prolific indeed, for the piece bears no lower an Opus number than 185. Its flow of peaceful melody, enhanced by the delicacy and variety of the accompaniment, and harmonised in the masterly style of an experienced writer, well fulfils the object of the title. In every sense of the word is 'Consolation' an admirable piece of music, and it must rank among Madame Oury's best efforts of the kind. As a morceau de salon it is of moderate difficulty, and of sufficient brilliancy to display the capacities of a proficient performer. The composition is dedicated to Mrs Graver-Browne, of Morley Hall, and published by Messrs Paterson & Sons, of Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The final week of the season, one night excepted, was devoted to repetitions of operas which have already been noticed. In the Trovatore, on Monday week, Sig. Tamberlik made his last appearance, and again convinced every amateur of the value of finely balanced phrasing and legitimate declamation. Here we have a veteran from whom any existing tenor might take a lesson with advantage. Sig. Tamberlik, whose cordial reception was a just recognition of his merits, found worthy associates in the clever and versatile Mdme Marie Roze (Leonora), Mdme Trebelli (the Azucena par excellence), and Sig. Del Puente (Di Luna).

An alteration in the cast of Rigoletto imparted special interest to the performance of Verdi's best opera, which had already been given twice. Gilda was the fourth part essayed by Mr Mapleson's new Hungarian prima donna, Mdle Gerster; and though it does not offer so many opportunities for ad captandum display as either of its precursors, she maintained the ground she had won, and this by other means. Her conception of the part is natural, and she carries it out consistently to the end. There is no attempt at hyper-dramatic expression, and for this she merits praise, inasmuch as it would be inconsistent with the gentle individuality of the character. Nevertheless, in the first meeting with her lover, the supposed student, and in the great duet of the second act, where Gilda is restored to the arms of her despairing father, she is impassioned enough, a little more repose and a little less redundant gesture being all that is required to disarm criticism. In these situations we found most to admire, and in these, too, Mdle Gerster's vocalisation was most unreservedly to be praised. We expressed but recently a wish to hear more of her level singing, so as to enable us better to judge of the quality of her medium tones. A good opportunity for this was offered by her part in the duet with Rigoletto, "Ah! veglia O donna," the flowing melody of which, in response to its first delivery by the bass voice, was enunciated with equal purity and charm. That the staccato passages for soprano, in the variation of the second verse, were all that could be desired, few who have heard Mdle Gerster will be surprised to hear. Further occasion was afforded for cantabile singing in the andantino of the succeeding duet between Gilda and her lover, where the phrase "Ah de' miei vergini," &c., was uttered with real tenderness. We own to have been somewhat disappointed with Gilda's soliloquy, "Caro nome," cleverly as it was executed on the whole, and that we found the cadenzas, especially the concluding one, with staccato traits unknown to Verdi, out of keeping with so exquisitely simple a melody. At the same time we are bound to record that this not only obtained more applause than anything else during the evening, but was called for again and repeated. The duet between Gilda and the Jester, already referred to, was also the signal for a renewed demonstration, and more than one call before the lamps. Signor Del Puente, by his admirable impersonation of Rigoletto, has advanced considerably in the estimation of connoisseurs. Mdme Trebelli, with a new costume, by the way, not only handsome but characteristic and becoming, was, as always, the pearl of Maddalenas. Signor Talbo is somewhat overweighted in the important character of the Duke, being young, inexperienced, and as yet unable to turn to the best advantage a voice that, when he has obtained complete command of it, may serve him to excellent purpose. At present he is too apt to force it, and thus to deteriorate its quality, besides imperilling that most essential of requirements, correct intonation. Nevertheless, persevering study may do much, and we have good hopes of this young English singer.

There was also a modification in the cast of the Huguenots, Mdme Christine Nilsson taking the place of Mdle Sala, in the part of Valentine. Mdme Nilsson is now in the prime of her career, and it is hard to think that so great an artist should be always confined to the limited range of characters in which for some years the English public have been accustomed to see her. When, three years since, at Drury Lane, Mdme Nilsson first appeared as the heroine of Meyerbeer's admitted masterpiece, his most dramatic and poetic creation, the brilliant success she achieved fully justified the ambition of her choice. A second performance, in the following year, was no less happy; and why she abandoned the character in 1876 it is difficult to understand. If it was to study it more deeply in order the more completely to present her ideal conception, she may be congratulated on the result of her self-abnegation. Mdme Nilsson's Valentine, both in a vocal and a dramatic sense, is a performance of the highest merit. The two great duets, with Marcel, in the Pré aux Clercs, and Raoul, after the "Benediction of the Poignards," are enough to show this—enough, indeed, to convince the intelligent public that Mdme Nilsson's venture into this new path has revealed to us another lyric tragedian. Avoiding details, we may mention that the duet with Raoul, which is necessarily, and as a matter of dramatic exigency, the culminating point, was also the triumph of the evening. A more forcible and striking exhibition of impassioned energy, combined with tenderness, and all the gradations of feeling indispensable to the sustained effect of this finely-imagined scene, has rarely been witnessed. The impression made upon the crowded audience was in proportion to the excellence of the display; and the applause, which had been suppressed during the progress of the duet, broke forth at the end without restraint. No manifestation of approval could have been more unanimous, sympathetic, and genuine. At the fall of the curtain Mdme Nilsson and Signor Fancelli (Raoul) were compelled to appear four times in succession. The other characters, with one exception, were as before—Mdle Valleria (Marguerite), Mdme Trebelli (Urbain), Signor Rota (St Bris), Signor Del Puente (Nevers), &c. The exception was Signor Foli, whom every amateur was glad to welcome once more in his old part of Marcel.

The opera on Saturday was Il Flauto Magico—better late than never. That it was an excellent choice for the closing night might be gathered from the thronged appearance of the house. There had been little time for getting up an opera to present which fitly demands a more than ordinary amount of preparation; and certain discrepancies in scenery and other accessories may, therefore, on this account, be overlooked. Still one could not but feel surprised at seeing a purely English landscape (Act II., Scene 1) in the near vicinity of the temple of the Egyptian Isis. Perhaps, however, the main point of attraction on this occasion was Mdle Gerster, to hear whom in the two airs of Astrifiamante, "Queen of Night," there existed a natural curiosity. Nor was curiosity doomed to disappointment. The part, as we all know, was written for an exceptional voice; and that the voice of Mdle Gerster is exceptional in its higher register need not be said. In the first air, which comprises a plaintive largo in the minor key and a brilliant allegro in the major, she was most successful with the allegro, where a mere inkling of what she has subsequently to execute is observed. In the second, by far the most trying and difficult, she was eminently successful throughout. Here she has high notes, staccato, and to spare, every one of which was given with marvellous ease and distinctness. Mdle Gerster adopts the version of the once famous Anna Zerr, who, to make the most salient passages still more difficult, used, at its repetition, to take the notes at the end of each division of the phrase an octave higher than Mozart wrote them, even for his "exceptional voice." Mdle Gerster does the same with the greatest ease, and the result was a hurricane of plaudits and an encore which she could not gracefully decline. Nevertheless, she ought not to alter Mozart's climax with the shake and high note she interpolates in the last two bars of the vocal part. It is "les majesté"; we have had, moreover, enough of high notes without that. The other characters were assigned to Madame Marie Roze (Pamina), Mdle Valleria (Papagena), Signors Carrion, Del Puente, and Rinaldini (Tamino, Papageno, and Monostatos), and Signor Foli—now, perhaps, the best Sarastro on the stage. We have heard, on the whole, much better performances of Il Flauto Magico; but the audience seemed to be pleased throughout; the orchestra, under Sir Michael Costa, was all that could be wished; and the chorus of priests, accompanying Sarastro's prayer to Isis and Osiris, "Possenti Numi"—where the trombones are so solemnly employed, in an under tone, not the less rich on that account—was remarkably well given. After the opera, the National Anthem was performed by chorus and orchestra. Then followed "calls" for the principals (Mdle Gerster came on four times), Sir Michael Costa, and lastly for the manager. Among the audience was his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, with a large party.

Mr Mapleson, considering the difficulties which lay in his path, and the short time allowed him for preparation, has done wonders in bringing out, more or less creditably, no fewer than 19 operas in the course of a brief season of 63 nights. He has been much indebted to his stage manager, Mr Edward Stirling, and naturally to his conductor. What for a time threw a gloom upon the season was the severe illness, and consequent absence during ten out of thirteen weeks, of that distinguished artist, Mdle Tietjens, with whom for so many years all his undertakings have been associated, and whose final performance in Lucrezia Borgia none who were present can have forgotten.

MDME MARIE CABEL is slowly recovering from the effects of her paralytic stroke, but her voice is hopelessly lost.

THE NEW PRIMA DONNA.

(From "Mayfair.")

The season of 1877 has been an unlucky one for Mr Mapleson, in more than one respect. Hardly had the difficulty of finding a house been overcome, when, as Edgar Poe has it, "disaster on disaster followed fast, and followed faster." The illness of Mdlle Tietjens excluded such works as Fidelio, and Cherubini's Medée from the repertoire—not to mention a number of Italian operas, which kept their places on the stage, chiefly owing to the magnificent acting and singing of that great artist. Moreover, the débutants of the early part of the season proved more or less incompetent, while Mdlle Salla, the most prominent exception to this rule, succumbed to the eccentricities of our temperature. In other cases again, Mr Mapleson showed unaccountable neglect of the talent at his disposal. Towards the middle of the season rumours suddenly gained consistency of the rise of a new star on the horizon—of a star, it was confidently predicted, sufficiently brilliant to retrieve the fortunes of the campaign. On the 23rd of the same month the first appearance of Mdlle Ethelka Gerster took place in Bellini's Sonnambula, and immediately a marked divergence of opinion with regard to her merits became observable amongst amateurs and in the press. Some critics placed her on the very top of the Mount of Fame. She was the rival, and more than the rival, of Nilsson, Albani, Patti—and, as even this were not enough, the great shades of Sontag, Grisi, and Jenny Lind in her prime, were conjured up to find sufficiently complimentary parallelisms for the new favourite. Enthusiasts of this class naturally were dissatisfied with the more moderate views taken by other authorities.

One point, as far as we are aware, has been overlooked by both parties; the fact, namely, that Mdlle Gerster, whatever she may be at present, will be something very different on attaining the full development of her power—and of her faults we feel bound to add. Want of stage experience may be observed in almost every gesture and movement. She has, for instance, in a marked manner, the peculiar shake or nod of the head, after the achievement of a high note, so characteristic of the novice, also the measured wave of the hand during a difficult passage, which betrays rhythmical uncertainty. A tendency towards over-acting her parts is another besetting sin of the same category. In the mad scenes in Lucia and I Puritani—operatic heroines the reader is aware, easily get rid of their senses—this tendency, especially as regards facial expression, is carried to an absolutely painful degree, a circumstance all the more to be deplored as Mdlle Gerster can, when she chooses, act charmingly, vide the natural grace of her bearing in the scene with her father in Rigoletto, and in the love duet following it. Altogether the perfect ease with which she moves on the stage, and her always expressive, and sometimes truly dramatic action, promise well for her future success. As yet, however, we fear she is unable to truly realise a character in all its bearings. But even for this deficiency there are attenuating circumstances. Few modern operas contain anything like a sustained dramatic conception; and even where this is the case, the prevailing attention paid by the public to vocal achievements naturally leads the artist's ambition in the same direction. We are, indeed, too apt to absolutely identify a part with a single tune or aria pertaining to it. We hardly ask how did a singer impersonate Elvira or Gilda, but how did she sing "Qui la voce" or "Caro nome"? and more especially certain high notes occurring in these pieces. Of these high notes a long tale might be told. We could name a tenor who for years has subsisted on a certain "ut de poitrine," and who, in consequence, had little inducement to cultivate the lower and more natural registers of his voice. He is now past his prime, but he still retains the high note—at once his glory and his bane. Similar apprehensions arise with regard to the new prima donna when we notice the immoderate raptures elicited both in and out of print by her "E in alt." Her middle notes are sonorous and full of charm; but she is evidently too much intent on enlarging the upward compass of her voice to rely much on their natural beauty—forgetful, apparently, of the fact that an elaborate vocal cadenza with the inevitable shake at the end of a simple tune, may "bring down the house," but cannot satisfy, in the long run, the requirements of a more refined taste. Speaking of Mdlle Gerster's bravura style, we may add that here also she evinces natural gifts and artistic acquirements of no mean degree, but, as yet, falls far short of absolute finish. Her scale passages are enounced with great volubility, but she finds it difficult to sing them in perfect time, her rhythmical phrasing being altogether somewhat defective.

Here our remarks must end. Their chief purpose has been to protect Mdlle Gerster from her indiscriminating friends; and we have thought it our duty, while acknowledging her good qualities, to point out such defects as are, in our opinion, most detrimental to her future prospects. Many of these defects are not peculiar to her alone; they are the natural outgrowth of a perverse system. But we should feel sorry to see sacrificed to this system gifts which, if not of the very highest order, at any rate deserve, and will richly repay, the most careful cultivation.

A Voice from the Past.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—About twenty years ago I scribbled both the words and music of a song called "Your God is there," which was published by Messrs Leader and Cook (and is now the property of Messrs Metzler & Co.)

In your impression of July 28th I find a "copyright" poem called "God is everywhere," signed "M. J. Barnett." Now it is possible that "M. J. Barnett" and myself were inspired with the self-same idea, but, like the author in the comedy of The Critic, I happened to hit upon it first. Should any of your subscribers feel curious enough to compare the two they may do so, for I subjoin my own song:—

YOUR GOD IS THERE.

"Before you stands a mountain,
Whose summit is in air,
Now mark it with devotion,
For behold! your God is there."

"Oh, dwelleth there our Father?
Is that His home above?
I mark it with devotion,
And I gaze on it with love!"

"Behold the sparkling ocean,
Rolling vast and wide:
Beneath its briny waters
The Almighty doth abide."

"Oh, dwells my heavenly Father
Beneath the liquid wave?
How blest must be the mariner
Who finds in it a grave!"

"Now mark you yon volcano,
From which dark vapours rise:

Amidst its blazing fires doth dwell
The God who never dies."

"Didst thou not say our Father's home
Was on yon mountain dread?
Didst thou not say th' Almighty
Upon the ocean bed? [dwelt

"And now amidst the fires that burst
From yon volcano's height,
Thou sayst our Holy Father sits
Upon His throne of light."

"Upon the mount thy Father dwells,
'Neath ocean's depth profound,

Amid the fierce volcano's fires—
There, there thy God is found.

"Gaze where thou wilt, my gentle child,
On earth, on sea, in air,
In each His Spirit thou wilt find—
THY GOD IS EVERYWHERE!"

Yours obediently,

John Barnett.

[We should like to see more of this old, much-loved, and venerated flat.—D. B.]

HAMBURG (from a Correspondent).—The event of importance in the musical circle here is to be the second centenary jubilee of the town theatre. On the 2nd of January, 1878, it will be 200 years since the first opera in Germany was performed. The theatre was begun in 1676 and finished in 1677. First adopted for plays and dramas, it was afterwards devoted to opera. The first opera given was Adam and Eve, libretto by Richter, music by Franz Sheil. This was followed by The Devil is Loose, which some believe to have been its precursor: to one of the two, at any rate, the distinction of being the first German opera ever played at this theatre is due. The coming festival on the 2nd January will be one of peculiar attraction, and if the score exists, to compare the past with the present, The Devil is Loose with Der Ring des Nibelungen.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The annual distribution of prizes at this Academy took place under the direction of the principal, Dr. Macfarren, and attracted the customary large attendance of interested spectators. As usual, the platform and orchestral seats of the new concert-hall were occupied by the students, whose numbers spoke well for the esteem in which the instruction imparted is held. Till recently, the results of that instruction were exhibited at the prize meetings by the performance of a lengthy selection of music. Now, however, the programme is short, and included, on the occasion of which we speak, no more than three works: Goss's Anthem, "O, Praise the Lord;" Bach's Toccata in C major, played by Mr G. F. Smith (organ); and Mendelssohn's Motet for female voices, "Surrexit pastor bonus;" solos, by Misses Brand, Aylward, Butterworth, and Orridge. So many opportunities are now given for estimating the gifts and acquirements of the Royal Academy students that it is unnecessary to regard Saturday's doings as a test. Enough that a satisfactory impression was made upon an audience more competent than usual to form a correct opinion. At the close of the musical proceedings, Mme Sainton-Dolby—herself one of the most distinguished among the artists produced by the Academy—was escorted to the platform for the pleasant purpose of distributing the year's prizes. This task, it is needless to say, she discharged in a manner which must have added no little to the gratification of the recipients, many of whom, moreover, were loudly applauded. The chief rewards were bestowed as follows:—

Lucas Silver Medal.—For the composition of the first movement of a string quartet: Richard Harvey Löhr. Parepa-Rosa Gold Medal.—For the singing of pieces selected by the committee: James Sauvage. Sterndale Bennett Prize (purse of 10 guineas).—For the playing of a composition by Professor Sir William Sterndale Bennett, selected by the committee: Nancy Evans. The Llewellyn Thomas Gold Medal.—For declamatory English singing: Ellen Orridge. The Christine Nilsson Prizes (purses of 20 and of 10 guineas).—For the first and second best singing, respectively, of pieces selected by the committee: Mary Davies, Marian Williams. Certificates of Advanced Merit.—The highest honour attainable at this examination, awarded only to students who have previously received the certificate next named: Mary Davies (Singing), Margaret Bucknall (Pianoforte). Certificates of Merit.—Awarded only to students who have previously received silver medals: Singing, Marian Williams; Pianoforte, Nancy Evans, Ethel Gould, Kate Steel; Violin, Ada Brand; Clarinet, Frances Thomas. Silver Medals.—To those who have already received bronze medals: Singing, Amy Aylward, Kate Brand, Annie Butterworth, Ellen Orridge, Hannah Turner; Pianoforte, Fanny Boxell, Jane Burrough, Fanny Ellis, Minnie Elwell, Alice Heathcote, Kate Lyons, Jessie Percival, and Isabel Thurgood; Violin, Julia de Nolte. Harmony.—Certificate of merit: Eaton Fanning. High Commendation.—H. Walsley Little (Silver Medallist, 1876). Silver Medals.—Oliveria Prescott, George Hooper. Male Department. Certificates of Merit.—Pianoforte, Edward Morton and Tobias Matthay; Organ, Henry R. Rose. Silver Medals.—Singing, Gordon Gooch and James Sauvage; Pianoforte, Charlton T. Speer, Alfred Luton, and Arnold Kennedy. Potter Exhibitioner.—Kate Steel. Westmoreland Scholar.—Marian Williams. Sterndale Bennett Scholar.—Tom Silver. Parepa-Rosa Scholar.—Clara Samuel. Sir John Goss Scholar.—Ernest Ford. Lady Goldsmid Scholar.—Ethel Gould. Sir Francis Goldsmid Scholar.—Clara Cooper. Professors' Scholars.—Violin, Julia de Nolte; Double Bass, Alfred Harper. Balfie Scholar.—William Sewell.

At the close of the distribution Mme Sainton addressed the students in the following terms:—

"Young ladies and gentlemen, my successors at the Royal Academy of Music, no one regrets more than myself that Mme Christine Nilsson is unable to be with us to-day. The rewards her generosity has offered for competition would have been largely increased in value had the successful candidates received them from her own hands. But not even Mme Nilsson, with all her keen artistic sympathies, could have bestowed those rewards with more earnest wishes for the future success of the winners than are mine to-day. I owe to Professor Macfarren the heartiest thanks for inviting me to perform the pleasant office I have just discharged. It recalls to my mind the happy time when I was a pupil here like yourselves—a time so happy that I have never forgotten it. Indeed, the day will ever live in my memory when it was announced that I had gained a prize. That day has long passed—how long can be seen on one of the boards in the hall; but the recollection of my joy no lapse of time can efface. To those who to-day have not received honours I can only say, 'Be not discouraged, but persevere.' A philosopher has declared that 'everything comes to him who can wait.' Let me add that 'everything comes, and more quickly, to him who can work.' This is my counsel to you, and I leave it as the best possible motto for the academic year, upon which, after a welcome holiday, you will all enter."

That remarks so appropriate were loudly cheered—none the less loudly because they were unexpected—everyone will take for granted. The National Anthem brought the afternoon's most satisfactory proceedings to an end. D. T.

NEGLECTED COMPOSERS.—No. II

Nos. 2 AND 3.—STORACE AND SHIELD.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—In my last letter, some little time ago, I spoke of two great but comparatively little known Italian composers. In the present case I beg to speak of two of our native composers who are almost equally unappreciated—Stephen Storace (who has been warmly praised in a spirit of just and generous discrimination by Dr Hullah, Mr Salaman, and, I think, by the late Dr Rimbault) was born in London in 1763. His father was an Italian, and Stephen seems to have blended much of the elegance of the Italian school with the more vigorous and healthy style of the English. He is best known as the composer of some beautiful operas, among the best of which are The Pirates, The Haunted Tower, No Song no Supper, The Iron Chest, The Siege of Belgrade, and Mahmoud. In all of these are to be found many beautiful songs, duets, &c., not a few of which still retain their popularity. The last of his operas was Mahmoud, but poor Storace was in his grave a few days before it was produced, dying of a sudden attack of erysipelas, in 1796, at the early age of thirty-three. Among his best pieces may be reckoned the songs—"Down by the river," "The sapling oak," "Toll, toll the knell," "From aloft the sailor looks around," and "There the silver'd waters roam; the duet, "Sweet little Barbara;" the trios, "Lanterns magica," and "We who wand'ring Arabs;" and the quartett, "Five times by the taper's light." For sweetness, purity and variety, Storace stands deservedly high; and, indeed, despite his youth, he may be looked upon as one of the best English composers of his day, and it is a matter of regret that his works are not better known. His elder contemporary, William Shield, was born at Smallwell, in the county of Durham, in 1749. Naturally musical in his tastes, he early acquired a fair knowledge of the violin, and having furthermore studied theory and harmony to some extent, he removed to London, where his talents soon brought him into notice. He composed many operas, single songs, &c., also a work upon harmony, and a "Canto" of glees, duets, &c. Of his operas I may name, Rosina, Hartford Bridge, Lock and Key, Nelley Abbey, and Robin Hood. His fame, however, rests chiefly upon his songs, the merits of which are so great that even now, after the lapse of well-nigh a century, many of them are popular all over the country. It is only necessary to mention "The Thorn," "Old Towler," "Tall her I'll love her," and "The Wolf," in proof of this statement. I may also add, "Ere around the huge oak," "On by the spur of valour goaded," "Whilst with village maids," and "The death of Tom Moody," as excellent songs, although scarcely so well known as the others; and it would be at once an easy and a pleasant task to note down many more, the perusal of which would be a rich treat to all who can properly appreciate the charms of a style of melody at once vigorous and refined, and at the same time by no means commonplace. This admirable composer died at London, in January, 1829. If the few remarks I have made should have the effect of causing any of my young musical friends to study the works of either or both of the gifted composers of whom I have written, my labour will not have been in vain.

D. BAPTIE.

[We think we might tell Mr Baptie something about Storace with which he is evidently unacquainted. A greater musical pilferer of other men's goods never existed.—D. B.]

SALZBURG (from an occasional Correspondent).—The profit of the festival of last week, it is calculated, will amount to between 3,000 and 4,000 florins. The music performed is said to have been of little or no interest. Only one great work of Mozart's was given—the Symphony in C, "Jupiter;" and it seems that most of the time was spent in eating, drinking, speechifying, and "hoch," added to excursions in the mountains—the last not at all unpleasant for Englishmen in such hot weather, and after the London season.

SIMS REEVES AT ALBERT HALL.

(From the "Musical Times.")

Whatever may be said of the acoustical properties of the Royal Albert Hall, no other concert room is to be found in or out of the metropolis where demonstrations of such magnitude as those organised for the reception of our distinguished foreign visitors can be so successfully given. We have often as a duty recorded the magnificent effect of this building when brilliantly lighted and filled in every part by a fashionable and excited audience to welcome some person high in position and influence; and have now as a pleasure to notice a gathering, as remarkable both for numbers and enthusiasm, to welcome one equally high in the world of art. Mr. Sims Reeves, whose concert on the 4th ult. attracted nearly ten thousand persons, is a vocalist whose intuitive musical perception has guided him so truthfully through a long career, that he has not only eloquently expounded but added a charm of his own to the tenor music of the many works in which he has been engaged. One of the most popular vocalists, he has never sought popularity at the expense of the composition he was interpreting; and, although so sympathetic a singer of the people's ballads as to win the suffrages of the multitude to an extent almost unprecedented, on no occasion has he endeavoured to gain the faintest mark of applause which was not thoroughly deserved. That the public can appreciate such qualities and will testify to this appreciation has been amply shown by the attendance at the concert under notice, at which, in addition to Mr. Reeves' rendering of Handel's "Deeper and deeper still" and "Waft her, angels," and Dibdin's ballad, "Tom Bowling," several vocal pieces were given by Madame Christine Nilsson, Mesdames Trebelli and Antoinette Sterling, Misses Helen D'Alton and Anna Williams, Messrs. Lloyd and Santley, and Signor Foli. The exceptionally fine singing of the bénéficiaire, and the readiness with which he gave the well-known song, "My pretty Jane," in response to an encore for "Tom Bowling," afforded a convincing proof to his auditors that they may confidently rely upon securing his best services whenever and wherever he can do full justice to himself and the art.

M. EDOUARD REMÉNYI.

(From the "Examiner.")

Mr Mapleson's benefit concert, as usual, took place at the Crystal Palace, and, as usual, consisted of an unlimited supply of miscellaneous music, drawn mainly from Italian sources, and performed in approved fashion by the leading members of Her Majesty's Theatre. There was, however, one striking exception to the ordinary routine. The audience, or at least its younger components, became here for the first time acquainted with an artist whose undeniable power must have been a surprise to many. M. Edouard Reményi, the Hungarian violinist, has, it is true, a widespread—one may say a European—reputation, but it resembles in its character that of some of our non-exhibiting painters. Most English amateurs have heard the name of Reményi, and know that he ranks amongst the first of living violinists, but few can vouch for this general impression by their personal experience. The artist himself is largely responsible for this state of things. For nearly sixteen years he has not been in England, and even his present visit to this country was not originally made with a view to public performance. It was only the almost sensational effect M. Reményi produced in private circles that caused him to accept Mr Mapleson's engagement on Saturday last. On this occasion his success was brilliant. But the transept of the Crystal Palace is not the right place to display qualities of tone, nor a Fantasia on themes from the Huguenots, chosen by M. Reményi in accordance with the general character of the concert, the right composition to throw light on the higher, intellectual side of his style. It is a brilliant piece full of varied effects, and in the romance from the first act much sentiment may be introduced, but the whole conception is not of a kind in which a first-rate artist would show at his best. Such an artist M. Reményi is, and as such he will be acknowledged beyond a doubt when, as is his intention, he returns to England early this autumn, and is heard under more favourable circumstances. Our readers will be glad to know a few personal details of a virtuoso evidently destined to take an important position in English musical life. These we can supply from authentic sources.

M. Reményi is about forty years of age, and was born at Miskolc, in Hungary. His master on the violin at the Vienna Conservatoire, where he studied music, was Joseph Böhm, the same who instructed another Hungarian violinist—Joseph Joachim. His artistic career, which he began very early, was interrupted by the Hungarian rising in 1848, in which Reményi, then quite a boy, took an active part. After the defeat of the insurgents he had to fly his country, and resolved to go to England. But on his way to this country he made the acquaintance of his celebrated countryman Franz Liszt, who at once recognised his genius, and became his friend and artistic adviser. In 1854 the young artist came to London and was appointed solo violinist to the Queen. In 1860 he obtained his amnesty and returned to Hungary, where some time afterwards he received from the Emperor of Austria a similar distinction to that granted him in England. In the meantime he had made himself famous by numerous concerts in Paris and other European capitals. After his return home, he seems for a time to have retired from public life, living chiefly on an estate he owned in Hungary; but two years ago, he resumed his artistic career in Paris, where he was received with open arms, and has been living since. Towards the end of the present season he came to London, too late to appear much in public, but not too late to prepare for himself an enthusiastic welcome on his return next month, when he is engaged to play at the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts.

As an artist M. Reményi combines perfect mastery over the technical difficulties of his instrument with a strongly pronounced poetic individuality. His whole soul is in his playing, and his impulse carries him away with it as he warms to his task, the impression produced on the audience being, consequently, always on an ascending scale. He never tires, and one never tires of him. Nothing more impressive could well be imagined than hearing and seeing M. Reményi perform one of the stormier pieces of Chopin, transferred by him from the pianoforte to the violin, or a short fantasia of his own composition, aptly called the "Heroic." But tenderer accents are not wanting. The nocturnes of Chopin or of our own Field are given with the tenderest dreaminess, interrupted at intervals only by more impassioned strains. His rendering, also, of Schubert's well-known Barcarolle is a masterpiece of sustained legato playing. Another important feature of M. Reményi's style is the national element. He strongly maintains against Liszt the genuineness of Hungarian music, and has shown himself thoroughly imbued with the spirit of that music by writing several "Hungarian melodies," which have been mistaken for popular tunes, and actually adopted as such by other composers. The same half-eastern spirit is observable in the strong rhythmical colouring of M. Reményi's execution, seldom or never attained in its original raciness by artists of Teutonic origin. Such are the most striking features of the violinist's style, but it must not be thought that these qualities debar him from the serious and congenial interpretation of classic masterpieces. On the contrary his répertoire is rich in that direction.

We must not conclude this notice without a short reference to M. Reményi's pupil and faithful companion, M. Nandor Plotényi, like him, of Hungarian origin. We have hitherto made M. Plotényi's acquaintance only as accompanist, but in that capacity he has fully proved himself to be an accomplished musician, with an astounding memory and a sympathetic touch.

"God Save the King."

(From "Dwight's Journal of Music.")

I see that the Rev. S. F. Smith, author of the Hymn: "My country, 'tis of thee," says of the tune: "It is, as most of you know, the English 'God save the King.' Perhaps the tune belongs to England, perhaps to Germany, perhaps to some other nation."

It may perhaps be of interest to Mr. Smith to know, that there is no perhaps in the case.

The tune was composed by Harry Carey, author of Chrononhotonthologos and of the song: "Sally in our Alley." Its date is about 1740, and it came into universal favour in England at the time of the Pretender's attempt in 1745 to recover the English crown.—It was, by the way, the victory over Charles Stuart, which Handel commemorated in Judas Maccabæus. A TRAGEDY.

Written on the Spur of the Moment.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

A gully.

BARON GOLFF, wounded.

BARON GOLFF.—Ho!

QUASHEIM.

QUASHEIM.—Who's done this deed?

BARON GOLFF (draws out poisoned arrow)—Not I!

QUASHEIM.—Golff!

BARON GOLFF (aside).—'Twas he!(falls).

QUASHEIM.—I had my reasons.

"I swore to slay thee, and I did,
But thou shalt be avenged."[Exit QUASHEIM. Golff motif in orchestra, while curtain slowly descends.

SCENE II.

A morass.

GHOST OF BARON GOLFF.

GHOST.—I'll follow him through life with dead intent (church bell). I sniff the matin bell (vanishes).

QUASHEIM, with DARK LIEUTENANT and RETAINERS.

QUASHEIM.—Will none of you use means to lay this ghost?

DARK LIEUTENANT (aside).—Disturbed fanatic!CHORUS OF RETAINERS (unison)—

"You have his property!"

DARK LIEUTENANT.—His chateaux and preserves. (Goods' motif.)QUASHEIM (musings).—They're haunted! Woods and preserves eke.

DARK LIEUTENANT.—Ha!

(Dark Lieutenant motif.)CHORUS OF RETAINERS (unison, fortissimo).—Ha!QUASHEIM.—Then let me fall upon this sword (attempts to draw sword). St Botolph!—scabbard's empty!

GHOST appears, brandishing sword vaguely—

GHOST.—This murder will come out (vanishes).CHORUS (unison).—The ghost has vanished and the sword!

QUASHEIM.—I'll seek my dagger.

*Dagger seen.*DAGGER.—Hough! (drops gout of blood).

QUASHEIM.—What ho! the dagger speaks! Is this my dagger?

[Dagger vanishes.]

QUASHEIM.—Gone, gone! dagger and sword! My pistol then. (Report.)(Sword, Dagger, Pistol, Scabbard, and Golff motives combined.)

QUASHEIM.—I know that sound, and echoes verberate.

OTHER RETAINERS.

CHORUS (unison).—The ghost has shot himself. Felo de se.QUASHEIM.—I have avenged him and the secret kept. Alas! poor ghost! (Ghost motif).

BARON GOLFF.

GOLFF.—I am no ghost. The dagger was not dipt!

QUASHEIM (forgetting himself).—Who, then, has tricked me? I bought and gave the poison—(Drug motif.)

DARK LIEUTENANT.—'Twas I. Thou stand'st confessed.

QUASHEIM.—I did intend, but did not perpetrate.

DARK LIEUTENANT.—Thou liest (pulls arrow from vest). Behold the arrow that thou gav'st! (Arrow motif.)

QUASHEIM.—Restore the weapon!

DARK LIEUTENANT.—Take it. (Sticks him—Quasheim falls).CHORUS (unison).—Ha! ha! (Curtain.)

SCENE III.

A wood—thunder and lightning.

BARON GOLFF.

BARON GOLFF.—I am not dead. I could a tale unfold (coughs)—

DARK LIEUTENANT.

DARK LIEUTENANT.—Unfold it, then, and rid thee of that cold.

BARON GOLFF.—Quasheim! Quasheim! What, had I done to thee? (coughs).

DARK LIEUTENANT.—Cough not, my Golffy; tell it unto me.

BARON GOLFF.—I cannot, dare not—

DARK LIEUTENANT.—D—n it! Swear not. (Oath motif.)

QUASHEIM.

QUASHEIM.—Thou slew'st mine uncle!

BARON GOLFF.—'Twas but in jest.

QUASHEIM.—Such jests become thee not.

BARON GOLFF.—It was my plan. I knew none other. (Curtain.)(To be discontinued.)

SALZBURG FESTIVAL.

(From a Letter of the 20th July.)

Our pleasant Festival was brought to its artistic close to-day by a Musical Matinée. In the evening there were some additional farewell entertainments. After a lapse of some months our little Temple of the Muses once more flung its doors open to the public, who flocked to it in crowds. The attraction was something entirely original. Members of the Vienna Artists' Association, of the Salzburg Liedertafel, and other dilettanti, had united to represent "the grand Past Opera of the Present and Future Opera of the Future," entitled Friedrich der Hezbare, and written by Franz Mögele. The success of this original specimen of "German Tone-Art" was most triumphant. The charming music, as well as the superb way in which the piece was performed by the Brothers Udel, Herren Petter, Dux, and Mdle Tisca, met with warm appreciation. The merry jokes with which the parody is strewn excited continuous laughter. Everyone left the Theatre highly contented with the entertainment offered him, and directed his steps to the large saloon of the Curhaus, where the farewell banquet was to be held. The saloon already presented a most animated scene, and late-comers had great difficulty in obtaining a seat; many, indeed, were obliged to stand, for everything with the slightest resemblance to a chair was seized upon in a moment. The departing artists were hereby enabled to see that Salzburg knows how to value and honour her guests. Despite the fearful overcrowding, a most cordial tone of good humour prevailed without exception, as though those present constituted only one large family. The evening's programme comprised artistic performances and friendly toasts. In the latter, the Salzburgians did honour to their guests, and the guests to their hospitable hosts. The next day the visitors dispersed in groups, and went off to the Pongau.

WELSH CONCERT AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—I shall feel obliged if you will permit me to state that Mr Stephen Evans, chairman of the committee of the Welsh concert at the Crystal Palace, has authorised me to hand over ten pounds to Mr Owen Morgan ("Morien"), in consideration of his valuable services on the Press, in connection with the Tynnewydd accident; and the balance, £50 Os. 4d., towards the Mansion House fund for the miners. Very truly yours,

St Mary Abbots Terrace, Kensington,
August 1st.

FRANKFORT-ON-THAINE.—Concert at the Palmgarten on July 23rd, under the direction of Capellmeister Z. Staany. Programme: Overture, Rübezahl (C. Oberthür); duet from Linda di Chamounix; fantasia on Beethoven's Fidelio (Doppler); overture, Zaide (Mozart); aria from Stradella (Flotow); songs, arranged for orchestra (Staany); pot-pourri on Gounod's Roméo et Juliette.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 4, 1877.

A DR BLEACH asks us about Mendelssohn's London proclivities. Mendelssohn, when in London, was only associated intimately with the smallest conceivable fry of musicians. He was egged in by them, and nobody else could see him. He knew Sterndale Bennett intimately, a little of Macfarren, and a great deal of the late Dr Gauntlett; but his favourite critic was the late H. F. Chorley; which may explain why, of the great majority of English musicians, though they adored him, he knew little or nothing. Nor did he take any pains to know them. They tried all they could to get a peep at him; but he was smothered in a cloud of "Philharmonic" commonplace. What he might have done for English musicians had he condescended to mix with them (which—the Horsleys and Attwood excepted—he never did), who can say?

AN UNPUBLISHED LETTER OF MOZART'S.

ON the 20th September, 1799, L. Nohl informs us in the Allgemeine Augsburger Zeitung, Constance Mozart wrote to the firm of Breitkopf and Härtel, in Leipzig, who had just made arrangements for the first edition of her husband's collected works:

"I will forward you at the earliest opportunity all the letters which I still have. Negligently, that is, unstudied, but well written, they are without doubt the best standard whereby to judge his mode of thinking, his peculiarities, and his culture. One highly characteristic feature in them is the rare love they all breathe for me—is it not true that those he wrote in the last years of his life are quite as tender as those he must have written in the early years of our married state? I especially beg that a formal mention be made, at least once, of this, to his honour. There are magnificent passages in the letters, which, perhaps, deserve a place in the" (Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung.)

Unlike the voluminous correspondence with his father, which is preserved in the Mozarteum at Salzburg, the original letters of Mozart to his wife are scattered to the four quarters of the globe, and we seldom find aught but an old copy of one here and there. The original of the following—not included in L. Nohl's edition of Mozart's Letters—forms part of a private collection in the South of Germany. It bears out what his wife says, and is, moreover, interesting, on account of the writer's high spirits, because he was then working on the Requiem, and the shadow of death was already hovering over his head; as we know, he did not see the end of this year: 1791. The letter is addressed: "A Madame Madame Constance de Mozart à Baden, Care of the Syndic." The lady was drinking the waters at Baden, near Vienna. Thus does Mozart write to her:—

"Ma très-chère Epouse! This moment received your letter, which has afforded me extraordinary delight.—I am yearning now for a second, to learn how the waters agree with you.—I regret not being yesterday at your agreeable musical performance, not for the music, however, but because I should have been so happy at being near you.—To day I gave" (illegible) "a surprise—I first went to the Rochbergische—and the wife sent a daughter up to tell him that a good old acquaintance from Rome was below—and had been to no ends of houses without being able to find him!—He sent word that I was to wait a little. Meanwhile, the poor man put on, as though for Sunday, his best coat, and dressed his hair splendidly—you may imagine what a laugh we had at his expense.—I must, you know, always have a fool—if it is not" (illegible), "it is at any rate Snai."—Where did I sleep?—At home, of course. I slept very well, only the mice honestly kept me company; I had a regular discussion with them.—I was up again before five. Apropos, I would advise you not to go to church to-morrow—the country fellows are too rough; it is true you have a rough customer, but the country fellows do not care for him, per dant respectum, because they see at once he is a hunk. Snai!

* "A Madame Madame Constance de Mozart à Baden, bey Herr Syndikus abzugeben."

THE DECADENCE OF MUSICAL JOURNALISM.

(From the "Musical Times.")

Not musical journalism only, but journalism as a whole seems to be passing through a very unsatisfactory phase just now. It is the one of our institutions which stands most in danger of becoming "Americanised," and to this position it has come by a rapid process. A few years ago, when a young lady from the States threw down the Times in our presence with a gesture of contempt, and exclaimed, "Guess your Old Country papers are not worth reading; they tell us nothing personal," we were able to point out that the freedom of English journalism from needless personalities was one of its proudest boasts. Since then, unhappily, such a change has taken place that many of our newspapers might challenge comparison with the most "spicy" among those issued by New York. We owe this chiefly to what are called the "Journals of Society," whose success, having been made by gossip, is dependent upon gossip for continued existence, and whose fate it is to be driven further and further in the direction of scandal, that the growing appetite they have created may be appeased. But while the unpleasant phenomenon thus presented is perhaps the natural result of a state of society, social and political, which has no high principle to assert, no campaign to carry on against wrong, and no noble end to absorb its energies and engross its thoughts, the extension of the mischief into the region of music affords cause for surprise. Nevertheless that extension is a fact of which lately we have had ample evidence. In some cases columns which should be devoted to real criticism, to the advance of true art-principles, the encouragement of those who conscientiously labour, and the putting down of those who would mislead or are unworthy—such columns, we say, are given up to the most petty and paltry details affecting individuals. Gossip like this, however eagerly it may be read, is not worth the paper upon which it is written in point of artistic value; while, in so far as it goes out of the legitimate range of journalism into that of personal, domestic, or social life, it is an offence and a cause of mischief. But while the collection and dissemination of gossip affecting artists and others is, to say the least, an unworthy business, much worse is that form of present-day musical journalism which violates its own rules, and strikes, for the mere love of scandal, at the principles by which the "fourth estate" has attained its rank and honours. One "journal of society" is now gaining an unenviable notoriety in this respect, à propos to a singer recently brought before the London public. It appears that the critic of a morning paper was not greatly struck by the merits of the new comer, and intimated as much in his observations upon the performance. It appears also that the "Society" writer entertained a different opinion. He was greatly struck, and, being so, had a fair right to challenge the opinion of his fellow-critic to prove its unsoundness, if he could, and demonstrate the correctness of his own. Conflict like this, when carried on in harmony with the rules not only of professional but social life, can do no wrong at all; rather must it work for good, and we trust the day will never come when critics will shrink from crossing blades in fair and honourable fight anent a worthy cause. But the journalist of whose conduct we complain "went behind," to use a now familiar Americanism, the article that drew forth his wrath. Ignoring the elementary rule of the craft which regards a journalistic expression of opinion as made by the paper wherein it appears and not by the actual writer, he assumed the offending article to be the work of a certain man, and then, naming him, treated that man as an enemy. It would have been bad enough had he done this while limiting his retort to observations fairly arising from the merits of the case, because we cannot too strongly insist upon the need for treating the anonymity of the Press as a fact, even in quarters where it must necessarily be a fiction. Above all should journalists themselves recognise and act upon this necessity, if only as an acknowledgment of the rules, for good or evil, regulating their profession. It appears, however, that neither the laws governing the journalist nor the gentleman have an authority over the writer to whom we refer. For what did he do? Acquiring a knowledge of the morning critic's private relationships, or at all events making use of information previously gained, he charged him with subordinating public duty to the interests of a friend, and backed up the charge with particulars that followed the victim home to his very hearthstone. If any of our readers hope to be told here the names of the people concerned, and the nature of the details affecting them, they will be disappointed. We cannot ourselves commit the offence we charge upon others, and it must suffice if we have made the nature of the transaction clear enough to secure its condemnation. An act more criminal in its way cannot be imagined, its criminality, let us add, lying wholly outside the truth or falsehood of the allegations made. We ourselves do not believe a word of those allegations; but, admitting their perfect correctness, the position of the offender is not changed one bit from the point of view at which we are concerned to regard him.

* As we know, Mozart was very fond of these meaningless jocular expressions.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

MDME CHRISTINE NILSSON is to receive 7,000 francs (£280) a night, at the Imperial Operas in St Petersburg and Moscow. She is to perform twice a week. Her engagement is for three months. In addition to this, two performances are to be given in her name as "benefits," for which she is to be paid 28,000 francs. Before leaving Vienna last spring Mdme Nilsson signed a new agreement with Signor Merelli, and will sing in German opera in the German language during the months of February and March, at the expiration of her Russian engagement.—(From a correspondent at St Petersburg.)

THERE are no signs at present of any progress in the works connected with the proposed new Operahouse on the Thames embankment. Has Mr Mapleson been selling old lamps for new, after the example of Aladdin?

MDME CHRISTINE NILSSON, fresh from her triumph in the Huguenots, has gone to spend a summer fortnight on the banks of the Rhine, in the close vicinity of the Drachenfels. Happy Valentine! Only Heaven forefend that she should drown herself, like Ophelia, or be caught hold of, swimming, by one of the Rhine-daughters of Wagner's magical Rheingold—unless, peradventure, it be Mila Flosshilde, in which case we would rescue her, and be carried into the depths by that nymph. Theophilus Querc.

It is believed that Mr Mapleson intends giving promenade concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre, with Mr Weist Hill as conductor. Mr Mapleson could not have appointed a more highly competent and zealous musician than Mr Hill in this very responsible post.

THE MESSRS GATTI commence their promenade concerts at Covent Garden on the 11th inst., with "l'Ulustrissimo" Arditi as conductor. Why does not Sig. Arditi give us Méhul's charming little overture to Les deux Aveugles de Tolédo?

M. ALBERT DE LASALLÉ has published, in Le Monde Illustré, the following list of the twenty-four musicians, together with the names of the principal works they got up, who have preceded M. Lamoureux as conductors at the Grand Opera, Paris. The first date is that of the foundation of the Grand Opera: 1659, Cambert (was at the head of fourteen musicians, and conducted Pomone, his own work); 1672, Lallouette (Cadmus, Thésée, Athys, and other operas by Lulli); 1677, Colasse (Bellerophon, Le Triomphe de l'Amour, and Phaëton, by Lulli); 1687, Marais (L'Europe Galante and Hésione, by Campra); 1703, Jean Rebel (Alcyone, by Marais); 1710, Lacoste (Callirhoé, by Destouches); 1714, Mouret (Sémiramis, by Destouches, Jephthé, by Montéclair); 1733, Rebel and Francœur (Hippolyte et Aricie, Castor et Pollux, Dardanus, and other operas by Rameau); 1744, Niel (Les Fêtes de Polymnie, Le Temple de la Gloire, and other operas by Rameau); 1749, Chéron (Zoroastre, by Rameau); 1750, Lagarde (Ismène, by Rebel and Francoeur); 1751, Dauvergne (La Serva Padrona, and the entire repertory of the Italian Buffo Company as well as Le Devin du Village, by J. J. Rousseau); 1755, Aubert (Ente et Lavinie, by Dauvergne); 1759, Montan-Berton (Aline, Reine de Gokonde, by Monsigny); 1767, Louis Francoeur (Iphigénie en Aulide, and Orphée, by Gluck); 1776, Rey (Alceste and Armide, by Gluck; Roland, by Piccini; La Caravane, by Grétry; Tartare, by Salieri; all the repertory of the Revolution; Les Bardes, by Lesueur; Don Juan, by Mozart; La Vestale, by Spontini; one hundred and eighty-five operas, ballads, and cantatas, got up and conducted by Jean-Baptiste Rey, during the thirty-four years he occupied the post of chef d'orchestre); 1810, Persuis (Les Abencerrages, by Cherubini); 1815, R. Kreutzer (Stratonice, by Méhul); 1824, Habeneck and Valentino (Moïse, by Rossini; La Muette, by Auber; Le Comte Ory and Guillaume Tell, by Rossini); 1831, Habeneck alone (Robert le Diable, by Meyerbeer; La Juive, by Halévy; Les Huguenots, by Meyerbeer; La Favorite, by Donizetti; Giselle, by Adam; Charles VI., by Halévy); 1847, Girard (Jérusalem, by Verdi; Le Prophète, by Meyerbeer; Herculanum, by Felicien David); 1860, Dietach (La Mule de Pedro, by Victor Massé); 1863, Hainl (L'Africaine, by Meyerbeer); 1873, Deldevez (Jeanne d'Arc, by Mermet—the first new opera produced in the house built by M. Garnier). Of all these conductors, Jean-Baptiste Rey remained at his post the longest. Associated with Francoeur in 1776, he was the sole conductor from 1781 to 1810.

NEW YORKSHIRE ORGAN.

(From a Correspondent.)

A new organ, built by Mr Isaac Abbott, of Leeds (formerly with Messrs Hill & Co., London), for the Wesleyan Chapel, Chapel-town, was opened on the 21st ult. by Dr. Hirst, organist of Brunswick Chapel, Leeds. The committee acted wisely in securing the services of so able an organist as Mr George Hirst, whose playing was highly appreciated by a congregation which entirely filled the chapel. We were pleased to see the Leeds and Bradford organists assembled in strong force, induced to go three miles out of our town for the occasion. Mr Abbott deserves great credit for the excellent organ he has just completed; it will, however, be still more successful when the "spare slides" are occupied. The organ is badly placed, in a recess, which retains a large proportion of the sound, and neutralises many effects which the instrument would produce in a better situation. The softer stops and combinations are of charming quality. We must not omit to mention that the vocal music was nicely performed, though the choir might have been strengthened with advantage. We append the programme:—

PART I.—Organ, Kirchliche Fest—overture (Otto Nicolai); Anthem, "Praise the Lord" (Sir George Elvey); Organ, Sonata, No. 1 (Mendelssohn); Anthem, "As pants the hart," soprano solo—Miss Willans (Spohr's Crucifixion); Organ, Notturmo (Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream); Quartet, "God is a Spirit" (Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria); Anthem, "Come unto Him" (Gounod); Organ, "The horse and his rider" (Handel).

PART II.—Organ, Concerto in B flat (Handel); Air, "He shall feed His flock"—Miss Willans (Handel); Anthem, "O taste and see" (Sir John Goss); Organ, Grand Prelude and Fugue in E flat (J. S. Bach); Anthem, "Rejoice in the Lord" (Sir George Elvey); Organ, Larghetto, from the Clarinet Quintet (Mozart); Chorus, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates" (Handel).

Between the two parts the Rev. W. F. Slater, B.A., delivered an address.

DESCRIPTION OF THE ORGAN.

GREAT ORGAN, CC to A, 58 Notes.—Bourdon, 16 feet, wood and metal, 58 pipes; open diapason, large, 8 feet, metal, 58; open diapason, small, 8 feet, metal, 58; stopped diapason, 8 feet, wood and metal, 58; principal, 4 feet, metal, 58; harmonic flute, 4 feet, metal, 58; twelfth, 3 feet, metal, 58; Fifteenth, 2 feet, metal, 58; full mixture, 3 ranks, metal, 174; trumpet, 8 feet, metal, 58. Total, 696 pipes.

SWELL ORGAN, CC to A, 58 Notes.—Lieblich bourdon, 16 feet, wood and metal, 58 pipes; open diapason, 8 feet, metal, 58; pierced gamba, 8 feet, metal, 58; lieblich gedact, 8 feet, wood and metal, dulciana grooved, 8 feet, metal, 46; voix céleste, 8 feet, metal, 46; octave, 4 feet, metal, 58; lieblich flute, 4 feet, metal, 58; fifteenth, 2 feet, metal, 58; sharp mixture, 3 ranks, metal 174; horn, 8 feet, metal, 58; oboe, 8 feet, metal, 58; clarion, 4 feet, metal, 58. Total, 846 pipes.

CHOIR ORGAN, CC to A, 58 Notes.—Dulciana, 8 feet, metal, 58 pipes; dolce, 8 feet, wood and metal, 58; gedact, 8 feet, metal, 58; flauto traverso, 4 feet, metal, 58; gedact flute, 4 feet, wood and metal, 58; clarinet, 8 feet, metal, 58. Total, 348 pipes.

PEDAL ORGAN, CCC to F, 30 Notes.—Open diapason, 16 feet, wood, 30 pipes; bourdon, 16 feet, wood, 30; flute bass, 8 feet, wood, 30; violoncello, 8 feet, metal, 30; trombone, 16 feet, metal, 30. Total, 150 pipes.

COUPLERS.—Swell to great; swell to choir; swell to pedals; great to pedals; choir to pedals. Three composition pedals to swell organ. Three composition pedals to great organ.

SUMMARY OF STOPS.—Great organ, 10 stops, 696 pipes; swell organ, 13 stops, 846 pipes; choir organ, 6 stops, 348 pipes; pedal organ, 5 stops, 150 pipes; couplers, 5 stops. Totals, 30 stops; 2040 pipes.

The organ is blown by one of Joy's patent improved hydraulic engines.

BLINDNESS AND MUSIC.

Music seems the natural solace of the blind, and, so far as the pleasure of hearing music is concerned, the blind are at least on an equality with those who see. That, however, does not apply to highly-educated musicians, who follow with interest the progress of the art and look with eagerness for new works. The blind musician cannot make acquaintance with a new composition unless he has some one to play it to him. Of a full score, even with practical assistance, he could gain no complete knowledge. In the case, then, of a musician who loves to observe tendencies and developments, or who is simply desirous from ordinary curiosity to keep himself well informed as to what new music is being brought out, it may be doubtful whether it is not a greater misfortune to be blind than to be deaf. Nothing in the history of music is sadder than the account given by Beethoven's biographers of the first performance of the Ninth Symphony. Beethoven stood by the side of the conductor, but neither his own sublime music nor the enthusiastic applause which it called forth. Then, being told that he ought to bow, he turned for a moment towards the audience, who all at once became painfully impressed by the fact, now brought strikingly before them, that the creator of the work they had found so beautiful knew it only from having imagined it, and that as real music, audible and appreciable to the bodily ear, it had no existence for him. There is this compensation, however, for the deaf composer: that he can read and write music as though he had not lost the faculty of hearing. No sound can reach him; but he hears with his eyes. His mind's ear may be constantly exercised, whereas blind musicians, whatever pleasure they may derive from listening to music, cannot of themselves obtain from the engraved music-paper a single idea.

It must be remembered, however, that the number of musicians of the highest cultivation who in later life became totally deaf cannot be very numerous; while to persons born deaf music must always remain something inconceivable. The position of Beethoven deaf may have been less intolerable than that of Handel blind. But the generality of deaf men cannot read music, whereas the generality of blind men can find great enjoyment in listening to musical performances. It is remarkable, too, how many of the blind possess musical faculties; so much so that, besides being what we have already called it, the "natural solace of the blind," music would also seem to afford them the fittest occupation and the surest means of gaining a livelihood. Basket-making and such humble industrial pursuits as blind people are often employed in yield but little profit. Thus it is impossible to make an ordinary blind asylum self-supporting through the labour of its inmates; and the great majority of blind people who have no means of their own are maintained either through the parish rates or by private charity. It occurred, however, to Mr J. F. Campbell—who, if he did not originate the idea, was at least the first to introduce it and apply it in England—that blind children, if possessed of those musical aptitudes which belong to so many of them, might easily be enabled not only to keep themselves, but to gain very respectable incomes either as public performers, as teachers of music, or, in case of the higher positions being missed, as pianoforte tuners. Mr Campbell has himself been blind since early childhood, which has not prevented him from making a thorough study of music, so that besides being an admirable pianist—as those who heard him at a recent Crystal Palace concert must be aware—he has also a full knowledge of the theory of his art. Having cultivated music systematically under the best professors at Leipsic and elsewhere, and possessing a remarkable talent for organisation, Mr Campbell is, of course, the director of that music school for the blind which he has succeeded in establishing on the heights of Upper Norwood. A performance given here a few days ago, in which a certain number of the pupils took part, would alone have sufficed to show that the institution must be producing good results. The invitations to this very interesting concert had been issued by the Duke of Westminster, one of the patrons of the academy; and among the most distinguished of the visitors were the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne. The concert, in a purely artistic point of view, was excellent. The programme included all kinds of music, vocal and instrumental, by composers of all periods, from Bach to Gounod. Thus solo singers, a choir, and several pianists were heard; and the execution, always satisfactory, was sometimes admirable. The students of the piano are remarkably well taught by Mr Hartvigson, who, besides giving practical instruction in the ordinary manner, analyzes the most celebrated pianoforte works for the benefit of his pupils, and makes them acquainted not only with the compositions but also with the lives and aims of the great masters. Most of them will only be able to gain their living as pianoforte tuners, some few may find employment as teachers, but all are taught as carefully and as thoroughly as though they were in training for a composer's career; and all will at least learn to play the piano with more than ordinary intelligence and skill. Thus, apart from the question of gain, the students at this musical training school for the blind are provided with an indestructible means of increasing their own happiness and the happiness of those around them. Although the school has been established only a few years, it has already turned out a certain number of pupils who are prospering as pianoforte tuners, and who, beginning at £1 and £1 5s. a week, found themselves a year after they had left the school earning from £2 to £2 10s. The school charge for tuition of all kinds and board is £50 a year; so that, to take a purely economical view of the matter, the establishment does some good by turning, at a comparatively small cost, those who would otherwise be useless and burdensome members of society into valuable workers. The blind have, indeed, far more need of education than those whom the blind call "sighted persons." A man with his eyes about him may pick up a good deal of useful information; but for the untaught blind there can be no hope, and persons of this class who are without private means must be supported by charity or starve.

* Stops marked thus * are prepared for but not yet put in.

The indigent blind are, by the way, specially cared for by an institution which aims at relieving their wants, spiritual as well as temporal, and at enabling them to support themselves. The Indigent Blind Visiting Society provides its dependants with readers, teachers, and guides, also with instruction in arts and trades suitable to the blind, with the exception of music, which, for any useful purpose to be attained, must be taught thoroughly and to those only who have special aptitudes for it. One fortunate idea conceived and duly carried out by the committee of the Indigent Blind Visiting Society is that of taking a certain number of poor blind children periodically from London into the country. Fresh air, the scent of flowers, the singing of birds—the numberless odours and sounds peculiar to the country—must be enjoyed by the blind even more vividly than by those who see. Most of the blind attending the classes, says the last annual report of this excellent society, "were enabled by the kindness of various friends to have a day in the country. Two hundred and sixty were invited on two days by Mr and Mrs W. Armitage, of Southgate, forty-eight were received by Mr Powys Keck, of Kingston; while the remainder went on two excursions—one to Hampstead, the other to Epping Forest, for the last of which excursions they were mainly indebted to the Rev. William Cuff."

The children of the Music School for the Blind have no need to be taken into the country; for there is no part of England more beautiful or more healthy than that in which their school is situated. One might fancy they were aware of this fact from their evident enjoyment in walking about the gardens; and the able director who walks, talks, and writes his letters (by the aid of a type writing machine) as though he had the full use of his eyes, is convinced from his own sensations that they can appreciate the charm of the landscape. In any case the grounds, even to the smallest flower-beds, were laid out under the director's orders; and he declares that he should be much annoyed if he found (for example) that geraniums had been placed where he had ordered that roses should be planted. Mr Campbell, it may be added, is familiar with the contents of the principal picture-galleries in Europe, and standing in presence of a work of art feels its influence as any man of imagination standing on the scene of famous exploits will realise to himself the circumstances under which the exploits were performed. As regards literature, one would expect a blind man to excel in abstract speculation or in lyric poetry rather than in the description of external objects; but Mr Campbell, who possesses much literary talent, considers descriptive writing his particular forte. He has a very poor opinion of our great public buildings, and declares that if he had to begin life again he would adopt the profession, not of a musician, but of an architect. His school of blind musicians will certainly prosper; and it is probably the best blind school that exists, even for those who possess no great musical talent. A certain amount of musical capacity is, of course, an indispensable qualification for admission to the establishment at Upper Norwood. But, once admitted for a permanence, the pupil is by no means instructed in music alone. The children take delight in arithmetic and—what is more surprising—in geography. Geography, however, is here taught by means of globes with raised surfaces; and the sense of touch is called into activity as the child passes rapidly from one country to another, pausing only to say for what products the land he is visiting with his fingers are remarkable. One pretty golden-haired little girl, with a blue sash tied across her eyes—(her mother had begged that they might in this becoming fashion be always kept concealed)—flew across the globe from point to point, in bird-like style, without once hesitating or making a mistake. Geography seemed to be studied in a reasonable and connected manner, as travellers study it in sketching out the plan of a journey. The child who ought to have had blue eyes went in the most business-like fashion from London to Calcutta via Dover, Calais, and so on, by the overland route; and from Paris to New York via Havre, with an alternate route by way of London and Liverpool. In the arithmetical examinations very complicated questions were quickly answered. Each child was addressed separately; but when there was any delay in replying, those who were ready with a solution held up a hand in token thereof. Any, even the slightest, mistake was at once signalled in the same manner. It could be seen that the children concentrated all their attention on the questions placed before them. It was evident, too, that they were taught in such a manner as to keep them constantly interested in their work. Children, under ordinary circumstances, are not taught. They have lessons given to them which they are told to learn. This method, so simple for the so-called teacher, would not be applicable in the case of blind children. Of course books with embossed characters are used; but the teaching is chiefly oral, and every subject is abundantly explained. This was particularly noticeable in the music classes. Many imagine that the blind learn music "by ear." So the uneducated blind may. But the blind who study music at Upper Norwood learn, like other students, to play from notes which, by a very ingenious and very simple system are dictated to them. When, however, they have once learned a piece, they play it by heart; and in point of memory many of them might challenge Rubinstein himself. The characters in relief from which the blind may read such books as have been reproduced in this style are well known. Various contrivances have been introduced for enabling them to write; and of these the most suitable and the most perfect by far is the "type-writer" already spoken of.

A complete course of training for modern pianoforte playing ought certainly to include gymnastics. That form of "higher development," however, which consists in lifting the hands high above the key-board—sometimes even above the pianist's own head—and bringing them down with a crash on the keys, is not suitable to blind performers, who cultivate a much quieter style of execution; and the gymnasium in the gardens of the Music School for the Blind has been established with a view to the general health of the pupils. It is curious, and at first somewhat alarming, to see these blind athletes swinging, vaulting, climbing poles, and coming down head first, balancing themselves on high bars, and so on. But the exercise strengthens them, and gives them confidence, and no accidents take place. Sometimes a blind gymnast going down a pole meets another blind gymnast going up. No harm comes of such an encounter, but only a little amusement and a discussion as to which shall give way.

The School of Music for the Blind is open once a week to visitors. It is well worth seeing, and, better still, worth supporting.—Pall Mall Gazette.

COLOGNE (from a Correspondent).—The veteran tenor, Herr Sontheim, is singing with great success, at the Flora Theatre, as Manrico (Trovatore), Eleazar (Juive), and as the Postillion of Longjumeau. His voice is reported "fresh and powerful." A merry wag says that Herr Sontheim for thirty years past has put his voice, every night, in vinegar and mustard before going to bed, to keep it in such good preservation to the age of sixty-nine. Or have the Germans lost their ears?

(From "Punch.")

A Few Days in a Country-House.Going a Fishing. Being some Notes of a short stay in the old-fashioned Country-house belonging to my friend Boodels of Boodels.

"Haven't seen you for an age! Name your day, and come down. Place looking lovely."

This was from Boodels of Boodels. He is quite right. I have not seen him for an age; or, at all events, for a considerable time. It is, in fact, some years since I was invited to his place, to assist in dragging the pond. That ceremony was deferred sine die, and we did not drag that pond, brave boys, and "we did not catch that Whale"—or, rather, that Eel. There has always been a big Eel—a tremendously big Eel—in Boodels' pond. It's a traditional Eel: it is to Boodels' pond what the Sea Serpent is to the ocean. The Eel in Boodels' pond has been seen more than once: in fact, it must have been seen to have been appreciated; but it is difficult to arrive at the fortunate person who has seen him. The Head Gardener hasn't, but "he knows he's there." But why should a Head Gardener see an eel more than anybody else? He has nothing to do, professionally, with the fish-pond. Boodels' Head Gardener wears moustachios, and has a military air. He evidently delights in planting all his vegetables and fruit in lines. He passes along the lines, reviewing, as it were, his troops. When the right moment arrives, he will say, "Up, Strawberries, and at 'em!" The Under Gardener, who is, somehow, officially connected with the ducks, is reported to have seen the Eel. This individual, however, is of a taciturn disposition, and if he has seen the Eel, he won't tell. When asked about the Eel, he smiles, wags his head (a sign of pleasure with him when addressed, and, probably, a habit acquired from having a good deal to do with the animals on the establishment), and mutters something about there being a big "Eel" somewhere, (he is unintelligible beyond this), and walks on. My private impression, after awhile, founded upon observation, is that if this Under Gardener has seen the Eel, he has eaten him. Hence his silence, and hence the smile. Hence, also, the mysterious legends still current at Boodels', and in the neighbourhood, about the marvellous Eel. The Butler, in idle moments (of which, I fancy, he has several at command), has set lines for this Eel.

[Happy Thought.—The Butler and the Eel, a fine subject for a poem.]

No result. The Eel, if there, stayed where he was, and the Butler retired.

Everybody having nothing better to do at Boodels' wanders down to the pond, hears from some one (generally from Boodels himself, who finds this subject likely to interest his visitors—visitors being always interested where there is a probability of their getting something by it, and that something eatable), about the Eel, and immediately says, meditatively, as if it were quite a new and original idea, "I should like to catch that Eel."

"Why," the visitor diffidently adds, turning to his host, "why don't you set lines?"

Boodels smiles at this. It is what every visitor has said to him from the first day he took the house with the fish-pond. He only replies, in a guarded manner, that, from what he has heard (as the Police say, "from information received,") he believes that any one fond of the sport can have capital fishing in the pond.

[Happy Thought.—To say to Boodels, "There may be 'capital fishing,' but is there 'capital catching'?"

"That depends on the fisherman," replies Boodels, drily
I don't think so. It seems to me to depend upon the fish.]

There was a Poet stopping at Boodels' who made this suggestion about setting lines. I seconded the motion, for several reasons, First—Because it was something to do. Secondly—Because I had often heard of "lines," and wanted to find out what they were. Thirdly—Because I wished to find out if the Poet, who tried to appear so sporting, knew any more about it than I did. Judging from his blank look, when Boodels, pointing to something on the ground that appeared to me like a very large and very dirty-white tee-to-tum wound round with thick cord, said, "Here's the trimmer and the lines," I am convinced that the Poet had not the smallest idea what he had been talking about.

The Poet said "Oh!" and looked at the trimmer, then at me.

I had only found out a few minutes before that he was a Poet. I should have thought from his general appearance that he was clerk in something—not "in orders"—but something official. The only outward sign of genius about him is his nose. He has a low forehead (I don't believe in foreheads), and a very large nose. What he loses in forehead he makes up in nose. Most poets are strong in the nose. Boodels, who is always enthusiastic about his friends, specially if not recently made, tells me that Hamlin Mumley is a very clever man, simply "the cleverest man," he (Boodels) "had ever met." This sounds as if Boodels' circle of acquaintances were limited. A consoling thought is "present company always excepted." "He has," adds Boodels, vaguely, "something coming out very soon; and he's had some wonderful reviews in the papers." "What papers?" I ask, as I don't remember to have seen the name of Hamlin Mumley anywhere.

"Oh," replied Boodels, evidently not expecting to be cross-examined on the subject, "I don't know. You can read 'em for yourself." And so the subject drops.

I eye Mumley distrustfully. At present "the cleverest man that Boodels ever knew" is throwing bits of stick into the pond, and frightening the ducks. Our attention is now centered on the trimmer. It looks to me such an awkward, antiquated piece of machinery that I cannot understand any eel, associated as he is with slipperiness, wriggling, and low cunning generally, could be caught by such a very apparent trap as this trimmer. It occurs to me that, as a boy, I used to learn "easy lessons" out of a trimmer. These were, if I remember rightly, Trimmer's Guide to the Alphabet.—(By the way, I wonder at what distance from the Alphabet one would require a Guide?)—and so, perhaps, a trimmer, piscatorially, is a sort of Little Angler's First Step to Fishing. The second title might be Line upon Line.

There is another friend (new to me) of Boodels staying here—a fresh-coloured, round-faced, light-moustached, small stout man, always ready to smile. His expression seems to be saying beseechingly, "Do, please, make me smile! I'm only waiting to be asked to smile!" I set him down at once as a Gentleman Farmer. I propose talking to him about crops. I will lay myself out to get some information about corn, hay, pigs, poultry, and turnips. I begin by a few remarks on the weather being bad for the country. He smiles, and fancies that it is worse in some parts than others.

"It is bad for crops," I suggest, throwing much sympathy with his supposed losses into my tone.

"Is it?" he replies; then adds, inquiringly, "Do you know this part of the country well?"

"No," I say; but I had thought he did. No, he doesn't: in fact, it's his first visit. The conversation flags. Getting Boodels alone, I ask him,

"Who's that?"

"Oh!" replies Boodels, "I thought you knew. That's Pogmore the Composer."

"What does he compose?" I ask.

"Why music, of course," retorts Boodels, rather testily. He never likes to be pressed too closely as to his friends' accomplishments. He accepts a clever friend as a genius, en gros, and disdains details as a disloyalty.

"He's one of the cleverest men I ever met," says Boodels, still speaking of the Composer. "He's got something coming out." He says this as if Pogmore was going to exemplify, personally, a Darwinian theory. He explains, however, "an Oratorio, I think—Sims Reeves, Santley; in fact," adds Boodels, rather vaguely, and, a little tired of the subject, "everybody's going to sing in it."

It occurs to me that the Oratorio must be a work of gigantic proportions. We all walk down the garden to the fish-pond. As a matter of fact, the walks in Boodels' garden are limited. You either go to the fish-pond, or you don't. The walks are:—Towards the fish-pond, which means loitering in a beautiful flower-garden; to the fish-pond, round the fish-pond, which includes chance interviews with curious looking creatures and big rats; half-round the fish-pond, and back the same way, nervously; and when you don't go to the fish-pond, you go to the kitchen-garden.

As a rule, every one on arriving for the first time at Boodels', looks out of the drawing-room window, and immediately exclaims, "Oh! let's walk as far as the fish-pond!"

There has never been an exception to the rule, except in the instance of a grumbling old Gentleman, who, on his arrival in the middle of summer, begged that all the windows and doors might be shut; growled out that the place lay very low; that the beauty of the flowers, specially the roses, was only a clear sign of the dampness of the atmosphere; and on being asked if he would like to walk as far as the fish-pond, replied surlily,

No; he didn't want to catch his death of cold, for the sake of looking at a duck-puddle!

Boodels never forgave this old man. "In fact," said Boodels, justly irritated, "if it hadn't been for his age, I'd have ordered a fly, and had him taken back to London at once."

As we walk to the fish-pond, Boodels and Mumley first, then Pogmore and myself, I start Pogmore on the subject of music, instead of crops. He informs me that he is composing an Oratorio on the subject of The Ark. "A grand subject?" he suggests, inquiringly, as if he had some lurking doubt about it himself.

"Very," I reply. "Only——"

"Only what?" he asks.

"Only," I say, "aren't the animals a difficulty?"

"Ah!" he exclaims, with the air of being evidently relieved by this being my only objection, "but I see my way to that. All I want is a good libretto. That's what I'm sticking for now—a good libretto. I wish you'd try your hand."

I feel highly complimented, but, with innate modesty, I suggest that he should ask Hamlin Mumley. "He," I point out, "is a Poet." I don't infer from this that I'm not. "And," I add, "he would write you a magnificent libretto." Implying that mine would be a more magnificent one. Pogmore has asked him. Mumley has replied, that good poetry is quite thrown away on music: that the librettist gets no fame—only abuse; and that no one ever yet heard the words of any song, or ever cared to ask who wrote them.

"I rather agree with him," says Pogmore.

So do I. But then why ask me to write the libretto?

"See what you can do for me, will you?" says Pogmore, carelessly. You might strike out something.

He says this much as he would have suggested that I might catch the Eel, if I only lived long enough, and fished regularly. I promise, however,—to think of it.

Tom Milburd,—younger brother of our old friend the Jester,—has run down to Boodels for a few days. Boodels says he likes to have him there because he's "invaluable in a country-house—he makes everything so lively"—which is not much of a compliment to us; as if we made everything so dull, and he had to be invited to counteract our depressing influence.

Tom Milburd, coming down the walk from the house, hears Pogmore say, apropos of the Oratorio, that there's so much "character in it." Milburd Junr. is a very loud man, and his laugh is overpoweringly noisy. He has got a trick of bursting into his loudest laugh, generally about nothing, or about something that only he himself sees the fun of, close by your ear. He keeps his laughs, as it were, in shells, and suddenly explodes them. He comes down between us, and exclaims, in a stentorian voice, "Oh, I know what he's talking about. His old Oratorio." Here he roars: no one can get a word in, and he continues, still roaring, "Capital subject—ha! ha! ha! Noah and all his little men—ha! ha! ha!—with long coats, and sticks, and flat hats. Which are the wives, and which are the sons? Eh? Whichever you like, my little dear; you pays your money and you—ha! ha! ha!" And here he is off again, as if this venerable quotation were one of the raciest things he had heard for years. We look serious. Pogmore is annoyed. But Milburd doesn't care. He takes Pogmore by one arm and me by the other, shaking us both as if to get a laugh out of us by sheer force—he is very muscular—and begins again, just as loudly as ever.

"Then the music!—ha! ha! ha! The March Past of the Animals into the Ark! and the songs!—ha! ha! ha! I say, though, how do you get over their being all duetts?" Here Milburd goes into convulsions of laughter, but he won't leave go of our arms, which he shakes and squeezes during his laughter. And this is the man whom Boodels says "is invaluable in a country-house, and keeps everything lively!" Why, he'll drive me wild with his voice alone. As to Pogmore, he'll be mad before he reaches the fish-pond. Milburd shouts out, still bursting with laughter, "They must be duetts, because they went in in couples. Ha! ha! ha! ha!"

"Nonsense!" says Pogmore, irately. "The music will be descriptive."

"Of course," exclaims Milburd. "I see it. Bassoon for the Elephant."—here he makes noises which he thinks represent the instruments in question, and, thank heaven, releases our arms, in order to pretend to be playing first double bass, and then the ophicleide,—"ophicleide for Lion; the Black-beetles will be a difficulty. The Donkey's easy enough."

"Yes, you can play that," cuts in Pogmore, quickly.

I feel this retort was weak on Pogmore's part.

"No objection to learn, if you'll teach me," returns Milburd. Then he suddenly seizes my arm again, and squeezes it roughly, as if to point his repartee, which he repeats three times, and roars and shakes with laughter.

At this point I should like to come to Pogmore's aid, and put Milburd down, only I haven't got the right thing to say. Milburd never knows where to stop, except at Boodels', where he certainly knows how to stop.

This is the first half hour after my arrival (we are expecting dinner), and we are all down by the fish-pond. The fish-pond has a quieting effect, momentarily, on Milburd. He is silent. Then the influence of the place overcomes Hamlin Mumley, the Poet; and, turning to Boodels, he says, solemnly,

"There must be a great many fish here. Why don't you set some lines?"

Happy Thought.—(Suggested politely to both the clever men.) If Mr Mumley will compose the lines, Pogmore will set them. Both eminent men much pleased. So is Boodels. He considered this compliment, he tells me afterwards, very neat, and "so epigrammatic." Milburd (who is evidently jealous, and who never turned a smile when he heard it, though I feel sure he'll go and use it afterwards as his own) says, "Oh, very epigrammatic! What's 'epigrammatic' mean? ha! ha! ha! eh?"

This offends Boodels, as it implies that he (Boodels) has used a long word without knowing its meaning. We walk silently towards the house. Boodels begins to doubt whether Milburd is as funny as he had once thought he was, and whether he hasn't become rather coarse.

"How about the trimmer?" calls out Pogmore from the pond, and he is seconded by the Poet.

Boodels turns. Personally he doesn't care about fishing, considering it dirty work, and, from long experience, he does not (I am convinced) believe in his own pond, or in the Eel. But these doubts he keeps to himself.

"If you like to go and dig for worms," he replies—(this to Pogmore and the Poet!—fancy the two cleverest men Boodels had ever met being sent to dig for worms!—so thoughtless of Boodels. If you do have a Poet and Composer staying with you, they ought to be treated properly, and not sent to dig for worms. I am quite hurt by it: and I'm sure they must feel it, though they say nothing)—"you can get some very fine ones near the Fig-stye, and then you can set the lines yourselves. But," he adds, looking at his watch, "you won't have much time now, as the gong for dinner will sound in five minutes. See about it to-morrow."

So nothing is settled about the catching the Eel in the pond. But we've got at least a week before us at Boodels'.

GRAZ (AUSTRIA).—Mars and Apollo never agreeing well together, war, with its horrors, is detrimental to art. In such times people's spirits are depressed, the necessities of life become dearer, business declines, and, although perhaps not so much observed in outward appearances, curtailment of expenses is inevitable—at all events, in respect of theatres and concerts. The attendance at our theatre furnishes ample proof of this, for if bent on a few hours' solitary retirement, one could hardly accomplish it better than by spending an evening there. Not long ago a renowned opera singer from Berlin received for her half share at the first night the sum of four florins, although matters improved on subsequent performances, so that the receipts were at least respectable. Concerts on the whole fare better, but these are generally given by societies, whose subscribers alone secure a fair attendance. The "Graz Musical Union of Chamber Music" gave an interesting concert, at which a new piano quintet by Richard Heuberger met with a flattering reception. At the same concert the first scene from Wagner's Götterdämmerung was performed. Some tableaux vivants have been held in the theatre (for a charitable purpose) by certain aristocratic ladies. Among them was Loreley, which gave the greatest satisfaction. The Baroness Caroline von Ludwigstorff represented the golden-haired nymph of the Rhine. The musical illustration to this tableau was Charles Oberthür's Loreley, for harp and orchestra. A local paper remarks:

"The melodies from C. Oberthür's legend, Loreley, made a charming effect. The harp as played by Herr Scerlé brought before us the murmurings of the waves, a real example of effective tone-painting."

There has also been an interesting performance of Schumann's Manfred at the theatre, Gustave Starke taking the part of Manfred. The music was under the direction of Capellmeister Horak.

WAIFS.

Herr Richard Wagner has gone to Weimar from Ems, and is busy writing his new opera, Parcival. Some who have been privileged to hear extracts from Parcival say it is to be "colossal"—the conventional admiration-word used by Wagner's proselytes—better, in fact, than anything the master has hitherto given to the world.—(From a Correspondent.)

Mr David Keppel is engaged as first flute for Mr Mapleson's tour.

Mr F. B. Jewson has left town, to pay his annual visit to Ramsgate.

Signor Badia and Mdles Badia have left London for Aix-les-Bains.

Miss Minnie Hauk has been singing with great success at Baden-Baden.

Mr and Mrs Wallworth have gone to Great Malvern for their vacation.

On leaving London, M. Faure paid a visit to Royat, whence he proceeded to rejoin his family at Etretat.

M. Capoul will "create" the part of Paolo in M. Ambroise Thomas's Françoise de Rimini, at the Paris Opera.

We understand that "Rita," has just completed an operetta, entitled The Missing Heir, music by Carli Zoeller.

There were sixty-nine candidates for fifteen or twenty professorships at the Benedetto Marcello Lyceum of Music, in Venice.

Signor Bevigiani has taken Eden Villa, East Worthing, to pass a month there with his family, previous to his departure for Moscow.

A grand festival of classical music is to be held at Bruges next year. The town has subscribed 10,000 francs, and the province 6,000.

The third volume of Alexander Wheelock Thayer's admirable and exhaustive Life of Louis van Beethoven will shortly be published at Berlin.

M. Ambroise Thomas has been appointed by the French Government a member of the Superior Committee of International Exhibitions.

Herr Edouard Reményi, the famous Hungarian violinist, has left England for the Continent. He will return, however, some three weeks hence.

Franco Faccio has gone to Udine to conduct L'Africaine. He will shortly visit Trieste, to superintend the getting up of Mefistofele, Les Huguenots, and Robert le Diable.

Mr George F. Gear, the promising young pianist (son of our reputed professor of the vocal art, Mr Handel Gear), has undertaken the post of accompanist in the tour of Mr and Mrs German Reed.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—Mr Frederic Archer has not resigned his post as organist at the Alexandra Palace, and the report circulated to the effect that the appointment will very shortly be vacant is utterly untrue.

We much regret to hear that in the great fire in Castle Place, Belfast, on Sunday last, the music establishment of Messrs Cramer & Co. was entirely destroyed. We have reason to believe, however, that the property is largely insured.

The Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, has acquired the right of representing Le Roi l'a dit, by M. Delibes, a right formerly belonging to the ill-fated Komische Oper. M. Delibes is expected in October, to superintend the rehearsals of his Sylvia.

From the sun the earliest, loveliest beam
Flew down in the dawn,
And floated like love-thought in a dream,
'Mid the mists of the morn.
That beam was dissolved to a soulful glow
In the watery sky,
While its light, diffused by the breeze's flow,
Paled to die.
Just now, so fair, and frail, and weird,
On the sea you lay;
Like beauty disembodied, I feared
You'd fade away.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. NEW PIANOFORTE PIECE BY MADAME OURY.

"CONSOLATION."

Easy of execution, but melodious and effective. Price 4s.; Half-price Cash or Stamps.

"We wonder who has not, in the hour of trouble, more than once derived comfort from the sweet sounds such as David must have used to mollify the troubled spirit of Saul. What better name, then, to give a graceful strain of peaceful melody, such as must convey to the sorrowing heart feelings of rest and sympathy, than 'Consolation'? Such is the title of a charming new piano-forte composition by that indefatigable and prolific writer, Madame Oury; prolific indeed, for the piece bears no lower an Opus number than 185. Its flow of peaceful melody, enhanced by the delicacy and variety of the accompaniment, and harmonised in the masterly style of an experienced writer, well fulfils the object of the title. In every sense of the word is 'Consolation' an admirable piece of music, and it must rank among Madame Oury's best efforts of the kind. As a morceau de salon it is of moderate difficulty, and of sufficient brilliance to display the capacities of a proficient performer. The composition is dedicated to Mrs. Graver-Browne, of Morley Hall, and published by Messrs. Paterson & Sons, of Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c."

MUSICIANS WHO HAVE DIED AWAY.*

By JOSEPH SEILER.

Though the verdict pronounced by Reichardt, who was by no means free from vanity and egotism, and who had, moreover, himself written for the Grand Opera, Paris, may appear severe, it was not too severe. The composer of the Scherzo d'Amore and La Molinara, lightly and gracefully disporting with flowers of tone, was not the man, especially at his advanced age, † to paint truthfully and movingly, after Gluck, the horrors of the world below. A better composer than Paisiello would have succumbed to the task. But the sensitive Italian was fully conscious of a failure, which he had long foreseen. He only awaited an opportunity of retiring permanently from the scene of his defeat. He found it soon enough. When the populace of Paris, intoxicated with vanity and gloire, uttered for the first time, on the 18th March, 1804, in many-thousand-voiced chorus their enthusiastic "Vive l'Empereur," Paisiello—loaded by the Emperor with a large store of honours and money, but not regretted or missed by the people—hastened back to Naples, where, after writing some few more pieces of church music, long since forgotten, he departed this life in 1816, at a very great age.

Napoleon—who had no mind to be put to the blush himself, or to allow his favourite to be exposed to the censure of impertinent critics—made known, immediately after the first performance of Proserpina, that he was highly pleased with the work, and that in Paisiello France as well as Italy should admire and respect one of the greatest composers. As a matter of course, the papers lost no time in publishing this strange puff. Everyone smiled—to himself—but no one ventured to contradict the absurd assertion. Proserpina was, for appearance sake, performed two or three times again, and then its name, as well as that of its composer, was for ever forgotten in Paris.

A diametrically contrary turn was taken by a similar transaction, which occurred a few years earlier between Napoleon and Méhul.

Etienne Henri Méhul was, during the concluding years of the Consulate, frequently admitted to the small and select evening parties which Napoleon Bonaparte was then fond of giving, and which were mostly attended by artists, scholars, and diplomatists. When at these gatherings—where at that time everyone was still allowed to express his opinion freely—the conversation turned upon music, the First Consul never failed to advance his favourite assertion that the Italians were the only operatic composers; by them alone could comic opera be treated with certain effect, and by them alone had it up to that period been so treated. This became at last more than the young and fiery-tempered Méhul could bear. He offered to compose a French comic opera, strictly after the manner of the Italians, and have it played at the Feydeau in the same manner and style. Napoleon took him at his word, and Méhul found himself under the necessity of at once looking out for a suitable libretto. His friend Marsollier quickly supplied him with one in one act, L'Irato, wherein the long received and stereotype masks of the Italian opera buffa once more represented the well-known situations in the old way. There was the ever roaring, storming uncle, Pandolphe, with an affected sweet-spoken Monsieur Lysandre, as a butt; there was the ridiculous Signor Dottore, with a niece in love, and a coquettish waiting-woman; there was Scapin, the Signor Capitano, and the ever tipsy Bramarbas; and finally, there was a chorus of loutish servants, with whom the old blusterer Pandolphe indulged in his peculiarities to his heart's content.

Let the reader fancy all this operatic apparatus, borrowed from the comic singing-pieces of the Italians, carried out with continuous and never-resting movement; constantly spiced with comic scenes, and constantly renewed with fresh complications and intrigues of the maddest description. The action was, moreover, such that the entire work offered the most thorough parody, the most ruthless caricature of Italian opera buffa. The clever composer, on his side, showed in every number, in every bar, and in every chord, that he not only knew how to seize on and carry out the elegant forms of Italian operetta, but that he was perfectly equal to his librettist in bantering humour and biting irony. In a then highly popular rondo of a celebrated Italian maestro the words "morire d'affanno" were wedded to the sweetest flourishes, which always threw the public into ecstasies. To the similar French words: "afin de mourir de douleur," introduced into his operetta in a burlesque and exaggerated manner, Méhul made his artists sing and sigh, twitter and shout much sweeter jingle, much more extravagant vocal trickery, much more dazzling series of shakes, so that the audience did not know whether they ought to admire or laugh. A similar strain of banter, sometimes, indeed, too palpable, runs, like a red thread, through the whole of the capricious little piece, from the long-winded overture to the final chorus. The composer, at first concealing himself under the pseudonym of "Fiorelli," subjected the judgment of the Parisians to a very ticklish ordeal. The performers—in caricature operatic costume, by the bye—entered so fully into the intentions both of the poet and of the composer, that the success of L'Irato was complete and brilliant. After the first performance, Napoleon complimented the composer on having so well attained his object. That he meant seriously what he said was something which, as subsequent events showed, Méhul ought not to have supposed. In his operetta, Méhul introduced without disguise the principal personages of the Italian singing-pieces, with their traditional complications, effects, and rhodomontade, as well as all the sweet cabalettas, rondinos, and ritornellos, which entranced Naples and Venice. But, if we look at the matter carefully, both author and composer pushed their roguish satire too far where a Napoleon was concerned. Méhul especially, by sentimental and occasionally almost tragic touches, had pointed too sharply the comic contrast, and thus turned into the most glaring caricature passages like the refrain: "mourir de douleur"—every stanza of which was, in addition, followed by an instrumental portion, thoroughly Italian in style, almost commonplace and farcical. In short—if such a comparison is here allowable—Méhul's opera bore the same relation to the jingle-jangle vocal hurdy-gurdy-like pieces of the Italians, as the tragico-comic history of the noble Knight of La Mancha bears to the romantic tales of Amadis de Grèce or Florismarte d'Hyrcanie. If, however, crushing satire was the object of Méhul's composition—as it undoubtedly was—Gluck's pupil ought to have accepted the First Consul's smile of satisfaction only at its real worth: banter and biting irony. Napoleon could not allow anyone to ridicule his Italian favourites with impunity. Still less could the First Consul pardon the audacity with which Méhul begged permission to dedicate to that high dignitary a magnificently engraved score of his composition, which had been overwhelmed with unexampled success. Napoleon accepted the dedication, but never again invited to his evening parties the composer, who rejoiced too much in his victory. Even in later years the Emperor still cherished his antipathy for Méhul, and the feeling had probably some share in the fact that some of Méhul's later operas met with a very dubious reception. The public were compelled to be cold towards Méhul, when the Emperor was so. It is fortunate that the composer had already produced his celebrated "Ouverture de Chasse," and that he afterwards wrote Joseph en Egypte. Thus, Méhul does not quite belong to the "Musicians who have died away"—not quite!

AUGUST.*

The wheat we'll now be binding,
The bearded barley too,
This bonny month of August,
We're quite enough to do.
While lasts the fine bright weather,
The reaper should not roam,
But take his well-earned pleasure,
At the merry harvest home.

* Copyright.

The fertile months of summer,
Are pleasant one and all,
But the very best is August,
When the corn begins to fall.
For it tells of peace and plenty,
And of good cheer yet to come,
So we'll haste to fill our garners,
For the merry harvest home.

THAYER'S LIFE OF BEETHOVEN.*

In the next chapter, Thayer begins to explain the long series of errors which have been constructed with such care around the two brothers of Beethoven. The author gives us in this chapter, as the result of his powers of investigation, the very probable supposition that Beethoven studied quartet music with the composer Emanuel Aloys Förster, at that time so deservedly celebrated. The next chapter brings us to the year 1801. Besides the most interesting information concerning the origin and arrangement of the Prometheus music, in which we find also great exactitude with respect to time and place; besides the letters of the composer given in other works, but here gaining additional interest on account of their correct chronological order; in addition to these matters of interest, we have also here laid before us a hitherto unknown letter, addressed to Messrs Breitkopf and Härtel in Leipzig. The following chapter contains biographical explanations of the letters of 1801. Here the author pours forth from his "horn of plenty" such a glorious mass of fresh facts, that we are almost overpowered. The fourth chapter gives an account of the year of suffering, 1802. The following chapters of this truly deserving work throw fresh light upon the author's skill in the art of solving problems, and are one continuous stream of entirely new matter. The fresh letters which the author here brings before our notice are all very interesting to admirers of Beethoven, illustrating as they do, more fully, the nobility of his character and affording us new and brilliant glimpses of the outward life of the great master. But all this is only what we might reasonably have expected when such a man as Thayer set his hand to the work; for whatever he undertakes is accomplished with a thoroughness which must satisfy even the most critical reader. The nine parts of his appendix also contain very important additions. To these belong the communications from Czerny and Louis Drouet concerning Beethoven's life, which form the natural introduction to "Beethoven's character and person."

So far as the description of Beethoven's outer life is concerned, our author succeeds in laying before the reader the most surprising discoveries, and in maintaining them with great plausibility. In conclusion let me add that, though this book, like every other human production, is marked by some defects, it is a most superior work; and the trivial shortcomings are swallowed up by the wonderful excellences it possesses. And I can only hope that the much esteemed author will quickly give us his continuation of the biography of this immortal composer.

The National Zeitung, of Oct. 24, 1871, writes:—From among recent musical literary productions we single out A. W. Thayer's Ludwig v. Beethoven's Life, translated into German from the original manuscript. When five years ago the first volume of this work lay before us, we hailed it as one of the most valuable productions of the Beethoven literature.

After many attempts had been made, and as many failures, an American at length took it into his head to make the life of the great master an object of the closest and most minute personal investigation. With the energy, tenacity, and practical forethought natural to his race, he devoted himself to an undertaking which offered him, as the sole reward for overcoming difficulties and obstacles almost insurmountable, the simple satisfaction of feeling that he had to the best of his ability assisted in the spread of truth. The first matter for him to settle was the limit to which his material allowed him to go. He has only to deal with facts; and therefore all professional and scientific leanings, as also all æsthetic critical discussions, must be laid aside. The reader must not, then, expect to find in this work the subject completely exhausted in all respects. What is offered to us is simply a narration, made after the most careful investigation, of the great master's life, and an account of his productions arranged in chronological order. Putting all other matters aside, the author confines himself to a narrative of bare facts given in a plain practical style. As he himself declares, he has only accomplished the difficult and laborious preparatory work; he has but laid the foundation upon which some future historian of Beethoven may erect a fair and stately structure. We owe, then, to Mr Thayer the warmest and deepest thanks for the earnestness, zeal, love, unshrinking perseverance and patience with which he has prosecuted a task which will never perhaps receive its full meed of appreciation.

The sources of information respecting Beethoven as a man and a composer, which are available to the general public, are but few and scanty. The most valuable part of his correspondence consists of a few letters addressed to the friends of his youth (which however are scattered over a very long period of time), and also some letters to his publishers. Besides these we possess a number of notes and scraps of letters to all sorts of persons, of the most varied contents, which, for biographical purposes, are of no great value. Beethoven was not at all communicative, and on very rare occasions was he disposed to speak about himself. We possess, further, solitary expressions of his views and opinions in albums and sketch books, scattered about here and there as chance would have it. In the communications of Wegeler and Ries, who were both friends of the composer, we have a vein of information of the greatest value; for these biographers relate what came under their own personal notice. The biography of Schindler is a much more uncertain source: and any other information we can glean lies scattered over the widest field of literature. All this material Thayer has brought together with most praiseworthy conscientiousness, and has reduced to the most perfect order. He has also carefully sifted it and enriched it by the most assiduous and unwearied inquiries from the contemporaries of the composer.

The second volume of Thayer's work comprises the decade from 1796 to 1806. The arrangement of the matter contained in this work has an almost lawyer-like appearance of exactitude and regularity; and he who expects to have his emotions pleasingly excited, or his idle moments agreeably amused in reading this book, will find himself utterly disappointed. The author starts with the supposition that the reader possesses a clear comprehension of the importance of the subject; he engages him in the most laborious and minute investigations; spares him the examination not even of the minutest object, if it has the appearance of being able in any degree to assist in unfolding the truth. We have not only the final results set before us, but also the external and internal proofs of everything advanced; the author making us throughout the partners of his toil. If in spite of all his painstaking he has only been able to glean a few meagre notices, as the biographical gain of many a year of the composer's life, this is fully explained by the scantiness of all the sources of information available to us. One especial service rendered by the work of Thayer is the severe criticism with which he has handled all the legends concerning Beethoven. The inclination so common to most biographers to deify their heroes is quite wanting in him. Although, however, he treats his subject with such moderation, it loses nothing by this treatment, but rather the very simplicity of the description adds beauty and grandeur to the theme.

PORTRAIT BROYÉ.

Cette épreuve unique ? Hélas ! elle n'existe plus ! A la mort de son père, M. Pierre Gavarni avait offert ce petit cadre, ce précieux daguerréotype à M. Charles Yriarte qui l'avait appendu, comme un joyau, dans sa jolie maison de Saint-Cloud, entre ses tableaux aimés. L'invasion vint. Lorsque M. Yriarte rentra dans sa maison, il la trouva dévastée. Que lui importaient d'ailleurs certains meubles ? Il songeait surtout à ses œuvres d'art, et, avant tout, à ce portrait au daguerréotype d'Honoré de Balzac. Il le demandait, il le cherchait. Tout à coup, au coin d'une cheminée, il ramassa des débris de verre, de verre mis en poussière. C'était l'unique portrait de Balzac qu'avait broyé le talon d'un soldat allemand.—(To Sutherland Edwards, Esq.)

THE TELEPHONE.

Few of the recent applications of science have attracted so much popular curiosity, and few, perhaps, have been the subject of such extravagant and erroneous statements, as the telephone. It has been said that the sound of a speaker's voice has been recognised after travelling through 500 miles of wire; that an orchestra can play to a dozen audiences a hundred miles apart, and so on. These are, indeed, only American reports, and perhaps it would be uncharitable to say that that accounts for their character. Yet the invention is indeed a most startling one—too remarkable, indeed, to be discredited by any amount of exaggeration.

That musical sounds should be transmitted by telegraph is, in fact, less remarkable than it at first appears. To see this we have only to consider the conditions of the problem. Sound is, of course, only the result of air vibrations. If it is possible to produce at any place an exactly similar series of vibrations to that occurring at any other place, the same sounds will be heard at both spots. The vibrations must obviously be precisely similar—of the same rapidity, to give the tone or pitch; of the same amplitude, to give the intensity or volume of sound; and, more difficult to explain, they must also be such as to give the quality, which Helmholtz has shown to depend on the "harmonics" accompanying the primary tone. The first two conditions several telephones fulfil; the third is as yet unattained, and is perhaps unattainable.

It is not difficult to see that the vibrations of a tuning-fork, making and breaking an electrical circuit, will produce pulsations in the current which can, by their action on a magnet, alternately magnetise and demagnetise at each interruption and formation of the circuit, produce exactly similar vibrations in another tuning-fork, no matter how long the circuit and how distant the forks. This idea suggested itself to Phillip Reuss in 1861, and resulted in the construction of the first telephone. In this the sending instrument consisted chiefly of a membrane stretched over a box in such a way that the membrane was put in vibration by the voice of any one speaking into the box. On the membrane was a piece of platinum, which, as it moved to and fro, formed and broke the electrical connexion in a properly arranged line of wire. By this line the electrical pulsations were transmitted to a coil of wire surrounding an iron bar, this having on the bar the curious effect of causing it slightly to expand and contract at each pulsation. These slight alterations in length, rapidly succeeding each other, produced a musical note, which corresponded in the number of vibrations with that sounded in the box, and was, therefore, identical with it. But though the note is the same, it is not of the same quality. The instrument cannot reproduce that; it merely, as has been said, sings with its own voice, which has been compared to a penny trumpet. The idea once started, inventors were not wanting to take it up and develop it. In America, Mr. E. Gray and Mr. Graham Bell have been most successful, and, in this country, Mr. Cromwell Varley. It has already been announced in the Times that the telephone of the last named gentleman is shortly to make its appearance at the Queen's Theatre, and on the 12th inst., a private trial was made of the instrument before submitting it to the public. To describe the instrument minutely would be impossible without the aid of drawings, and without entering into technicalities uninteresting and indeed unintelligible to any but practical electricians. Still, perhaps some account of its general action may be worth giving, inasmuch as it is certainly the first by which musical sounds have been conveyed by telegraph in this country.

Like all telegraphic apparatus, this telephone consists of two instruments, a sender and a receiver. On Thursday both these were at the Queen's Theatre, so that both could be examined, and the wire was laid across to the Canterbury Hall and back, a distance in all of some three miles. In the public performances, of course, the sending instrument will be at one place and the receiver at the other. Let us consider the receiver first, for it is in it that the greatest novelty of the instrument consists. The only thing visible to the audience is a large drum-head, or tambourine, inside which is stretched what appears to be a sheet of tissue paper. Nor is there very much more. Mr. Varley discovered the curious fact that if a pulsating electric current of "high tension" be sent into a "condenser," an arrangement of thin plates alternately of conducting and non-conducting materials, the plates will vibrate, and if large enough and of construction, they will produce a musical note. The note thus formed is greatly magnified by the drumhead, and can be made to sound quite as loud as the ordinary note, say as a hautboy, which, indeed, it much resembles. It is understood that this condenser has some special features of construction, but to all appearances it differs little from the ordinary condensers of tinfoil and paraffined paper which are used in electrical operations. No satisfactory explanation of this curious phenomenon has yet been given, but of its existence there can be no doubt.

The sending instrument is much more complicated. A number of tuning-forks, sufficient to enable a simple tune to be played by their means, are employed. Each of these has, mounted near its end, a small electro-magnet, worked by a battery, by which it is kept in constant vibration, precisely; to take a familiar instance, as the striker of an electric bell is kept going when the button is pressed down. The vibrations of the fork are then caused to make and break a second separate electric circuit passing through an "induction coil," by which the "low tension" electricity of the battery is transformed into the "high tension" electricity required to produce the vibrations of the condenser. All these forks are then kept vibrating simultaneously, producing, of course, a rather discordant hum; but the current from none of them passes into the condenser until, by the depression of a key, the circuit is completed between one of the forks and the condenser, when the note belonging to that fork is instantly sounded. A number of keys, one for each fork, are mounted on a key-board, and they are manipulated just like piano-forte keys. The instrument at the Queen's has a compass of an octave and a half, from C below the staff to G above it, and there are consequently 12 forks with their attendant apparatus.

Of the music produced it is impossible to speak in very high terms. Some of the notes were good enough, but others were quite false, and the impression it gave was that the instrument was not properly adjusted and tuned. It was stated that its action is somewhat uncertain, and that it depends partly on atmospheric conditions. This is doubtless to be attributed to the use of high tension electricity, which, as is well known, is difficult to manage over long distances. It did not appear quite evident why a single coil placed near the condenser would have not acted equally well; but there are doubtless considerations of adjustment and the like which cannot be appreciated on a mere cursory inspection.

The whole apparatus has been put up in considerable haste and under considerable difficulties. The Post Office refused to lend a wire, and so it became necessary to erect a private one. This, involving as it did the getting the permission from the proprietors of houses in the route, was a troublesome undertaking; but it was successfully accomplished by the Gutta-Percha and Telegraph Works Company, of Cannon-street, who undertook the work. The span of a quarter of a mile across the Thames is an unusually long one, and seemed to present the greatest obstacle, but this was eventually crossed, and the line completed.

Should the present instrument prove all that is expected, we are promised a speaking telephone; and it must be confessed that such an instrument would be of far greater utility, as well as of greater interest, than a telephonic organ such as that of Mr. Varley. The weak point of the American speaking telephone of Bell is the extreme lowness of its sounds. This is certainly not the case with Mr. Varley's apparatus. We shall look with interest for a combination of the two, for some apparatus in which the vibrations received by Bell's stretched membrane shall be given out by Varley's condenser. Such an arrangement, if the instruments can be cheaply worked and easily kept in order, would soon replace all the "A B C" instruments used for short distances on our private wires, even if it did not come into use for all our telegraphic communications. The instrument at present shown cannot transmit the sound of the voice, nor can it take up and reproduce the music played by an orchestra or even a single musical instrument. All it can do is to produce in its own voice whatever tune is played on it. That it should do so at a distance of several miles is strange enough, but more than this is expected from the perfect telephone, and more than this will certainly be accomplished before very long.—Times.

EXOTIC SCENERY.

Mr Thomas Rogers, scenic artist, writes to The Times (Aug. 6) from 63, St George's Road, S.E. :—

"I noticed in a recent issue of The Times a report of the opera, Il Flauto Magico, at Her Majesty's Theatre, wherein you state you could not but feel surprised at seeing 'a purely English landscape, Act II., Scene I, in the near vicinity of the temple of the Egyptian Isis.' I beg you will, in justice to myself, through the medium of your columns, allow me to explain that the view in question was in no way connected with me, or permitted by me to be added to the scenery painted. The Egyptian portion is but a trifle of what was intended for the opera of Semiramide, when Mlle Tietjens sufficiently recovered to reappear. Unfortunately, she has not been able to do so; therefore the scenery has been appropriated, 'as much as could be used,' for Il Flauto Magico."

So, then, the "Egyptian portion," such as it appeared, in this opera "mounted with great magnificence," was really intended for Semiramide, in which everything should be Assyrian? We look to Mr Ruskin for an explanation.

VIENNA (from an occasional Correspondent).—The Grand Opera closed its doors on the 1st of July with Hans Heiling (Marschner), and will only re-open on the 15th of August. Then I shall be happy to send you always the musical feuilletons of Professor Hanslick, if they interest you. (Of course they do.—D. P.) Yesterday the Conservatory finished its last musical exhibition. It will re-open on the 21st of September. The "concours" lasted from the 20th of June until the 7th of July, under the direction of Professor and Director Helmesberger. The number of pupils are at present 716—in all branches. At the "concours" 115 were admitted, from among whom the following received first prizes by unanimous consent :—for Singing—Frl. Stahl (a splendid contralto), pupil of Mad. Marchesi and Frl. Klunzinger : for Piano-forte—thirteen received first prizes, the best three being Herr Robert Fischhof, Herr Bruno Schöneberger, and Frl. Caroline Geissler, pupils of Professor Door ; for Violin the only first prize was awarded to Arnold Rosenblum, a little genius, twelve years of age, who already creates a sensation ; he is a pupil of Professor Heigler's. Mad. Rosa Caillag, an old favourite in England, who has been a short time professor at the Conservatory, has already some excellent pupils. L. L.

THE LATE MR TOWNSHEND SMITH.

(From the "Hereford Times.")

Mr Townshend Smith, organist of Hereford Cathedral, died suddenly on Friday evening (Aug. 3). Deceased had been to Gloucester during the day, making arrangements in connection with the approaching Festival of the Three Choirs, and was to have conducted a practice of the Choral Society on that evening, but, feeling fatigued, the meeting was postponed. Shortly afterwards the city was thrown into gloom by the announcement of his death. Mr Smith has been organist of Hereford Cathedral for upwards of a quarter of a century, and was well known in the musical world. It was only last year that the stewards presented him with a handsome testimonial in recognition of his valuable services in the management of the Three Choirs Festival. The deceased gentleman was brother to Mr Montem Smith, the well-known cathedral tenor.

MR CARL ROSA IN DUBLIN.

The history of English Opera is a peculiarly chequered one. It has been said "English Opera has no history, no unbroken line of traditions, and has no regular sequence of operatic works by native composers." It were long to investigate the value of this dictum, but there can be no doubt that of recent years—that is to say within the last quarter of a century—the vicissitudes of national opera have been many and curious, and the general result does not point to brilliant success. Looking back to the days of Arnold and Bunn, Macready, Pyne and Harrison, E. T. Smith and the National Opera Company, not to mention the numerous small travelling companies which under one name or another, have looked for public favour, we encounter failure almost at every step ; nor is there much of a satisfactory character to contemplate until we meet the name of Mr Carl Rosa, who, with his rarely gifted wife, the lamented M^{me} Parepa-Rosa, succeeded in popularising English Opera in America—gaining fame and profit beyond anything which other impressarii were able to achieve. The success which Mr Rosa accomplished beyond the Atlantic was due to his wonderful pluck, energy, perseverance, and remarkable talent as a conductor and a man of business. In Great Britain and Ireland he has inaugurated a system which we have no doubt, will have as agreeable results. Possessed of an ample fortune, he stands in a very different position from those less fortunate speculators who could not afford to deal in the same generous and enterprising manner with the public. At the London Lyceum he has achieved brilliant successes, and in the provinces his name is a "tower of strength." Great expectations are naturally rife with regard to his present company, and so far as last evening's performance at the Gaiety is concerned, those expectations have been adequately fulfilled. Rarely have we seen a more complete performance of Il Trovatore. A large and enthusiastic audience filled the theatre. M^{me} Blanche Cole, whose reception was particularly flattering, proved how well she deserved the plaudits of her Dublin lieges, with whom she has been for some years a prime favourite. Miss Josephine Yorke's Azucena was a highly commendable performance. Mr Snazelle, whom we have already heard in Dublin, did well in the part of Ferrando. Mr Packard, whose voice has gained strength, while it retains its sweetness, sang "Ah si ben mio" delightfully, and received a spontaneous encore. In the "Di quella pira," with his "Ut de poitrine," he brought down the house. Mr Ludwig was very warmly received, and gave his music in capital style. "Il Balen" was sung with artistic feeling, and encored. The small part of Inez was capitally filled by Miss L. Graham. For a long time we have not heard better chorus singing. Mr Rosa's, in short, is a troupe d'ensemble, in every detail well regulated. This evening The Lily of Killarney will be given. —Irish Times.

PARIS.—An interesting event to the theatrical and musical world occurred on Saturday in the distribution of prizes to successful pupils at the Conservatoire. M. Brunet, Minister of Public Instruction, opened the proceedings with an appropriate speech, at the end of which he expressed pleasure at being able to proclaim, in the school at which Gounod gained his first laurels, that the President of the Republic had promoted the composer of Faust and Cinq-Mars to the grade of Commander of the Legion of Honour. The distribution of prizes was followed by a concert and dramatic recitations, in which laureates and prize-winners took part.

REPLY.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—May I crave a few lines of reply à propos of my last letter. Mr Dishley Peters has appended to it an emendation which I should be grieved to believe true. Speaking of Storace he says that I evidently am not aware that "A greater musical pilferer of other men's goods never existed." That I certainly was not aware of; nay, even now (begging Mr Peters' kind forbearance), I am not convinced of it; nor do any of the gentlemen whose opinions I have alluded to seem to say so. Take the latest of them—the only one I have at hand to refer to—Mr C. K. Salaman. He says (vide Musical Times for April last): "The style of Storace's melodies differs materially from that of Purcell, Arne, and Shield." Again: "Storace, avoiding plagiarism, wisely availed himself, as all great musicians have done, of the accumulated experience of his predecessors and contemporaries, famous in his own and in other countries." True, Mr Salaman also admits, "On perusing the two latest operas of Storace one cannot fail to notice that the composer was not insensible to the captivating, all-powerful influence of Mozart;" but he immediately adds, "yet retaining his own individuality of style and expression." With the exception of the italics, which are mine, I believe I have fairly quoted Mr Salaman, a gentleman whose opinions are entitled to considerable weight, and which I take pleasure in endorsing. If this be the head and front of Storace's offending, I fear my friend Mr Peters will agree with me that nearly all the great composers, from Handel and Mozart downwards, must be voted plagiarists as well as he; but if otherwise, will Mr Peters kindly say which of Storace's pieces he considers to be stolen, and from whom?" Awaiting his reply, believe me, yours truly,
D. BAPTIE.

P.S.—By the way, I see, in my notice of Shield, you have made me say that he published a "Canto" of glees, duets, &c. The word should be "Cento."

ANCIENT MUSIC.

The valuable library of the late Dr E. F. Rimbault, well-known in the musical world, has just been sold by Messrs Sotheby, Wilkinson, and Hodge. It contained several very curious works, especially in the collection of ancient music, and these were eagerly contested for and fetched high prices. Among them were—Arbeau Orchesographie, £6 6s.; Bathe's Skill of Song, £3 12s.; Bevin's Arte of Musicke, £5 5s.; Butler's Principles of Musick, £3 2s. 6d.; Clifford's Anthems, £2 7s.; Mersenne Harmonica, £4 4s.; Alison's Psalmes, £3 14s.; Banquet of Music, £5 15s.; Beaujoyeux Ballet Comique, £14 10s.; Byrd's Parthenia, £9; Chambonnières Pièces de Clavessin, £3 15s.; Choice Ayres, £4 4s.; Dancing Master, £3 8s.; D'Anglebert, Pièces de Clavessin, £2 16s.; Day's Morning and Evening Prayer, £5 2s. 6d.; Day's Psalmes, £3 5s.; Delicieux Musics, £2 11s.; Division Violin, £5 2s. 6d.; Farmer's Plain Song, £10 10s.; Finger's Sonates XII., £5 15s.; Gamble's Ayres, £3 16s.; Greeting's Pleasant Companion, £4 10s.; Hilton's Catch, £4 6s.; Holborne's Pavans, £8 10s.; Ireland's Psalm Tunes, Cantus and Bassus only, £2 3s.; Lawes's Ayres, £5 7s. 6d.; Leighton's Teares, £5; Le Jeune Psalmes, £5 2s. 6d.; Luther's Geystliche Lieder, £7 15s.; Marot Psalmes, £5 15s.; Morley's First Booke of Consort Lessons, the treble viol part only, £13 13s.; Nederlandtsche Geneek-Clanck, £3 5s.; Ornithoparcus his Micrologus, £4 12s.; Hole's Parthenia inviolata, £7 7s.; Playford's Musick's Delight, £7 10s.; Playford's Catch that Catch Can, £3 5s.; Psalmes for Scotland, £7 7s.; Purcell's Te Deum, £3 3s.; Ravenscroft's Psalmes, £3 2s. 6d.; Reggio's Songs, £3 18s.; Rossetor's Consort Lessons, £5 7s. 6d.; Simonetti, Ghirlanda Sacra, £3 14s.; Songs and Ayres, £5 10s.; Theatre of Music, £3 10s.; Treasury of Musick, £3 13s.; Vinculum Societatis, £2; Wanless's Anthems, £3 10s.; Whythorne's Songs, £3 2s. 6d.; Motets in Manuscript, £21; Mulliner's Collections of Motets, Hymns, Autograph MS., £82; Manuscript Services, £14 14s.; Manuscript Songs, £13 13s.; Virginal Music, £25 11s.; Playford's Introduction, £10 10s.; Vinotilla de Musica, £9 9s., &c. The entire library, including a pair of virginals made by Adam Liversidge in 1666, which sold for £26, produced £1,977 13s. 6d.

THE NEW NATIONAL OPERA.

ABOUT a fortnight since the subjoined paragraph appeared in a morning paper:—

"THE NEW NATIONAL OPERA HOUSE.—It will be remembered that the works were suddenly suspended a few months ago, and have since that period been at a stand, after an expenditure of about £60,000 on the building so far as it has at present proceeded. We understand, however, that the works will be actively resumed in the course of next week, and that, in accordance with an undertaking entered into by Mr Mapleson and the proprietors with the Metropolitan Board of Works, the building will be covered in and internally finished by Lady-day next. We are further informed that Mr Webster, who has hitherto held the contract, has withdrawn from it, and will take his seat as a member of the committee of proprietors, and that an eminent firm of builders have entered into an undertaking to complete the building."

After ten days had elapsed—employed, doubtless, by Mr Mapleson in endeavouring to find out from what quarter the paragraph, the major part of which he must have known very well to have been untrue, emanated—he very advisedly addressed the following letter to the Times:—

"THE NEW NATIONAL OPERA HOUSE.

(To the Editor of the "Times.")

"SIR,—About a week or ten days ago a paragraph appeared in the Times setting forth that the works in connexion with the National Opera House would be 'actively resumed in the course of next week,' and that 'in accordance with an undertaking entered into by Mr Mapleson and the proprietors,' the building would be 'covered in and internally finished by Lady-day next.' This news astonished and saddened me; for it is without basis. I read on, and was as much mortified as I was surprised to find it stated that 'an eminent firm of builders have entered into an undertaking to complete the building.' My one objection to these assertions is that they are not true. I do not complain of their being inaccurate, I only regret that they are so. And now that the termination of my Opera season places me at liberty to attend to other matters than those which have engaged the whole of my attention for the last few months, I trust I may be allowed to make known through your columns the exact position in which the affairs of the National Opera House stand.

"A sum of about £80,000 has been spent on the building, and, apart from this outlay, I have paid a large premium for the land and the ground-rent up to the present time. The land-tax, moreover, has been redeemed and paid for. The engineering and mechanical difficulties which were considered insurmountable have been overcome and foundations have been secured on 40ft of concrete. An additional £40,000 is required to enable us to put on the roof, which practically would finish the building, as all that might afterwards be needed could easily be raised at a very low figure on mortgage. The whole of the debenture-holders are willing to stand on one side to permit a first mortgage to be thus obtained; and they will, if necessary, forego all claim to interest, so anxious are they to see the National Opera House finished. There is no charge whatever on the building as it now stands. It is fully available, then, as security; and £40,000 lent on the existing construction, which has cost £80,000, would enable us to get the roof on. Then a much larger sum might be procured; certainly, quite enough to pay off the £40,000 and complete the Opera House both internally and externally. The theatre once finished and furnished, it is a mistake to suppose that the cost of mounting the first few operas would be very ruinous. I speak with some authority on this head, for a large number of operas have been newly mounted this season at Her Majesty's Theatre—every one, as a matter of course, that has been played—they have all been mounted with great magnificence, and the whole expense of mounting has been paid for out of the profits. In these circumstances, is it impossible in a rich, art-loving city like London to obtain a sum of £40,000 on security which has cost £80,000.

"I have hitherto said nothing about the unusual attractions which an Opera House of the finest architectural proportions, standing on a site which cannot be matched in Europe, would present. But, other things being equal, it is obvious that an Opera House standing by itself on a river esplanade of great beauty, accessible on all sides, visible from all points, would possess some advantages over theatres built upon two, if not three, sides, and situated in such crowded, such unhealthy neighbourhoods, that to ventilate them is simply to let in bad air. At this moment not one of our theatres adds to the architectural beauty of London, for, in the first place, not one of them can be seen. They form part of the street in which they are situated, and as a rule can only be approached by the public on one side, or at most on two. It would be something to have in London one theatre which could be admired as a piece of architecture. It should be remembered, too, that if the National Opera House is diverted from the purpose for which it was intended there will be no other chance of the West-end possessing an Opera House worthy of the name; for the ground I succeeded in securing on the Victoria Embankment, besides being the best possible site, was, in fact, the only one. As far as I personally am concerned it cannot be said that the completion of the National Opera House is a matter of the very highest moment. The lease of Her Majesty's Theatre has still twelve or thirteen years to run, which will be quite long enough for me. But at the end of that time the West-end will be without an Opera House. Her Majesty's Theatre will be wanted for other purposes than those to which it is applied, and the National Opera House must within a very short time be either finished as an Opera House or turned into something else. This poor result of much earnest endeavour would not only be vexatious to me—it would be a misfortune to London. Such a misfortune, moreover, may easily and even profitably be avoided.

"To give some idea of what would be the real value of the National Opera House when finished, and to encourage any one who may wish to take it off my hands to finish it, I am ready to engage to pay rent for it at the rate of from £12,000 to £14,000 a year. Sorry as I should be to see the undertaking pass from beneath my control, the terms I have just proposed would be advantageous as compared with those under which I held a theatre not nearly so large, not nearly so commodious, as the National Opera House will be. I paid at Drury Lane £250 a week, with the right of adding as much as I pleased to the stock, scenery, and costumes belonging to the theatre, but with no right to take anything out. Thus, my tenancy being only a temporary one, it could not suit me to mount grand operas in the style in which I should mount them at a theatre placed permanently under my direction. I had hoped to be something more than lessee of the National Opera House. But as an Opera manager of some experience, I say confidently I would rather be tenant at that theatre on the terms mentioned than proprietor or paid director at any other. If, then, no one will help me and my associates to complete the building, will any one complete it for himself on the understanding that very good interest for his money will be secured to him in the shape of rent. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"Her Majesty's Theatre."

"J. H. MAPLESON.

We can sympathise with Mr Mapleson, and hope earnestly that the £40,000 may be forthcoming. Nevertheless, the lease of Her Majesty's Theatre has, we understand, more than "twelve or thirteen years to run;" and though it may be "wanted for other purposes," it cannot be got "for other purposes," seeing that, according to the terms of the lease, it must only be used as an Opera House.

Mynyddog.

WHO now will believe that no man is a prophet in his own country? Here but lately among us was "Mynyddog;" and now he is gone! Is he remembered? Is he regretted? None present at the Llandyssul Eisteddfod can surely have forgotten the preliminary bardic address, delivered, in Welsh, by Ioan Cynllo, himself a bard of bearded eminence, referring in touching language to the loss sustained by the death of the Poet of Montgomery—after which, if we may believe the Carmarthen Journal, the entire company rose and remained for some minutes, erect, in solemn silence, as a suitable token of respect? None!—we may depend upon it. Mynyddog has departed; but, in the absence of Brinley Richards, John Thomas, Edith Wynne, Annie Edmonds (apostate!), and our beloved Lewis Thomas ("Pencerdd Gwffyn"), there were others present anxious and able to render justice to his memory. Listen to T. E. Lloyd, M.P., as reported by our once esteemed contemporary:—

"Nor can I refer in adequate terms to the loss which all Wales has sustained in the late demise of the genial, witty, talented, and bardworking Mr Richard Davies, better known as 'Mynyddog.' He was a man who did more than any other, so far as I know, to promote the success of Eisteddfodau, but he has now departed from us for ever, leaving us only his memory to dwell on. He had great talents, not the least of which was his rare wit and humour; he possessed great kindness of heart, and was the life and soul of our national gatherings. I first met him two years ago, at the Lampeted Eisteddfod, and was from the first charmed with his vivacity and cleverness. He conducted the Tregaron Eisteddfod last year, and appeared to be in perfect health. Last winter, however, he visited America, and attended various Eisteddfodau amongst the Welsh settlements, delighting his countrymen with his humour, and giving them a taste of that enjoyment we have so frequently experienced here. He took cold in America, returned home in ill health, and died a few weeks ago at his farm near Cemmase, Montgomeryshire, deeply regretted by his countrymen. As an Eisteddfod conductor he had no equal; and such was his influence with the people, that any disturbance was quickly put down by his ready tact and wit. He was an excellent poet, and composed comic and other songs which I have heard him sing with such effect as to produce roars of laughter. I feel as if I had lost a friend in the death of Mynyddog, and I am sure his loss will be long felt at our national gatherings. I could not take the chair at this Eisteddfod without uttering a few words of praise in memory of poor Mynyddog. I am pleased to find that a memorial is to be erected to him; I have subscribed to it myself, and I hope as many lovers of Wales and Welsh talent as possibly can will do the same. The desirability of such a memorial is too patent to require any utterances of mine to recommend it."

You are right, Mr T. E. Lloyd, and we join you hand and heart. Yet another M.P., Mr David Davies, who spoke in Welsh (rare faculty for all but Aborigines!) paid eloquent tribute to Mynyddog, as thus (again we call to our aid the Carmarthen Journal):—

"Our late friend Mynyddog was to have taken a most prominent part in this day's proceedings. I have no doubt the committee have done their best to fill his place, but must of necessity fail to some extent, as he was a man for the purpose. I am happy to know that steps are being taken to keep his name alive in our country. I trust that the memorial will be worthy of his name in every sense. I am sure we shall all be very pleased to contribute something to it in order to show our estimation of his talents and to keep his name familiar for generations to come."

Hear! Hear! But why, Oh Pencerdd Gwffyn, didst thou absent thyself? From thine inspired pen we should have had fitting homage to one whom thou lovedst (thou hast declared as much), in prose or poetry—for both become thee. From the genial, enthusiastic "Talhaiarn," with whom we made acquaintance at Rhuddlan, when his Messiah gallery gave way (1850), to the last Welsh bard we ever met, we cannot recall one who has failed to exercise upon us a certain fascination, causing sympathy to spring up, suddenly, like mushrooms of a night, and leaving the impression that there was still something in the world worth thinking about. As "high mountains" to Lord Byron, so have always been enthusiasts to us—"a feeling;" and if there are enthusiasts under the moon, Welsh bards may claim to belong to that fraternity. Therefore, Pencerdd Gwffyn, unless we receive from thee an appropriate monody on Mynyddog, thy sins will not be forgiven thee, but weigh heavily till such time as thou art shriven.

Gishley Peters.

Clenchus.

DR HANS VON BÜLOW—Mr Arthur Sullivan having declined to renew his engagement on the same terms as in 1875-6—has accepted the post of conductor at the evening series of Glasgow Subscription Concerts. It is to be hoped that the irascible Doctor may get on more smoothly at Glasgow than he did at New York and Boston, and that he won't be "hinterviewed" by Mr —, the cute (and amiable) critic of the — (and, by the way, our very dilatory "Own Correspondent").

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DR GRIPE.—On the contrary. The article on the New Philharmonic Society referred to, which appeared in the Daily Telegraph (May 15), spoke of the young violinist as follows:—

"The new comer was Mdlle Pommereuil, a youthful, graceful, and accomplished Belgian lady, who on this occasion made her first appearance in London as a violinist with marked success. The Concerto in G minor of Max Bruch was selected by Mdlle Pommereuil, and exhibited remarkable taste and considerable powers of execution. The young débutante is a disciple of the broad school of violin playing observed by Vieuxtemps, and there is little doubt that such evident talent will result in a distinguished career in the profession so successfully adopted. Mdlle Pommereuil was recalled unanimously after her performance, and received the hearty congratulations of all who were present."

In speaking of the sisters Milanollo, Dr Gripe is evidently running his head against the sisters Ferni, who had no more to do with the sisters Milanollo than the sisters Milanello had to do with the sisters Neruda.

IGNACE GIBSONE.—Every scrap of music, good, bad, or indifferent, from the pen of a master should be accessible, because having a value for the genuine amateur—the amateur, that is, who not only reads or listens, but reflects. At the same time, it does not follow that every scrap should be publicly performed. In this matter discretion is needful, the point for decision being whether any actual good is likely to result, apart from the gratification of curiosity. Mr Gibsone is entirely wrong about Nicolai and Nicolai. The harpichord sonatas of Nicolai, the Italian, were composed long before Nicolai, the German, was thought of. Mr Gibsone should perfume his kerchief with "Otto" of Roses. The opera called La Rosa Bianca e la Rosa Rossa was composed by Simon Mayr, who also wrote the Medea in which Pasta—poor Cherubini!—took delight, and also Parodi, who was a parody (no pun) of Pasta. But "Otto" is "Otto." Mr Gibsone should "meditate" a book or two onward. Nicolo Leonard had nothing in common with either "Nicolai" mentioned.

MR EDWARD OXENFORD.—We entirely agree with the contents of Mr Oxenford's letter; but, as it has already appeared in other papers, we can see no advantage in inserting it.

ALEXANDRA PALACE CONTEST.—Too late for this week.

MARRIAGE.

On the 7th August, at St Saviour's, Maida Hill, by the Rev. F. S. May, M.A., of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, HENRY WILLIAM WIENER, to EMILY KATHLEEN, daughter of the late Desmond Ryan, B.A.

DEATHS.

On the 3rd August, at The Close, Hereford, very suddenly, of heart disease, GEORGE TOWNSHEND SMITH, Organist of Hereford Cathedral, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. Friends will please accept this intimation.

On the 7th August, suddenly, at Saltburn-on-Sea, GRACE, the beloved wife of G. A. Osborne, Ulster Terrace, Regent's Park.

On the 7th August, at St George's Hospital, through an accident while driving, MRS GEORGE MARCH, well-known to the musical world as "Virginia Gabriel."

VIRGINIA GABRIEL.

Mrs George March ("Virginia Gabriel") met with an accident on Sunday last, August 5, which proved fatal. Mr and Mrs March had been driving in Hyde Park, and when returning home, through Grosvenor Street, the horse took fright. Mrs March was thrown from the carriage, and received injuries of so serious a nature, that it was found advisable to convey her forthwith to St George's Hospital, where she died about 2.30 on Tuesday morning. Mrs March was not only an excellent musician, as her various compositions show, but an amiable and thoroughly accomplished lady, an ornament to society, and respected by all who had the good fortune to enjoy the advantage of her personal acquaintance.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

FREDERIC VON FLOTOW, composer of Stradella, Martha, L'Ombre, &c., has sold his estate in Reichenau, and retired to his villa in Mecklenburgh. He has finished a new romantic opera, Die Musikanten (The Musicians), libretto by Richard Genée. The story, taken from one of Mozart's early adventures, is said to be highly amusing, and the music is well spoken of. The opera, already translated into Italian, will be performed for the first time at Turin, next October.

We regret to say that the health of Mdlle Tietjens is anything but reassuring, and that the necessity of another operation for droopy is apprehended. Her appearance at the Festivals at Gloucester and Leeds, a month or so hence, is, under the circumstances, out of the question; and if she ever sings again in public there will be cause to rejoice. We should only be too pleased to find these sad prognostications unfulfilled.

MDME ADELINA PATTI has, says Galignani, paid M. Escudier, manager of the Italian Theatre at Paris, 100,000 francs as forfeit for her breach of engagement. She has also telegraphed to M. Strakosch, of New York, to say that she accepted his proposals for the United States, namely, 10,000 francs for each performance and a benefit; fifty-one performances guaranteed, or more than half a million of francs.

THE Covent Garden Promenade Concerts commence to-night. The fine band of last season has been re-engaged, with Mr Alfred Burnett as leader, and Mr Howard Reynolds as principal cornet à pistons. The vocalists are Mdles De Maessen, Rajmondi, and Celeste, Signori Gianini and Medica, with Mdlle Pommereuil as violinist, Mdlle Debillmont as pianist, and M. Marlois as accompanist. Mdme Rose Hersee will appear August 25th; M. Henri Ketten (pianist), September 8th; Mdlle Moisset, September 15th; and M. Maurel, September 22nd. This evening an orchestral arrangement of themes from Gounod's latest opera, Cinq-Mars, will be performed, and a new polka, "The Drummer Boys," composed by Signor Arditì, accompanied by all the drummer boys of the Coldstream Guards. When it is added that the musical direction of the concerts is in the hands of the able and popular conductor, Signor Arditì, it will be seen that every endeavour has been made to secure success.

INFORMATION has been received by the Department of Science and Art, through Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that it is intended to hold an Art Congress at Antwerp, on the 19th of this month, on the occasion of the tercentenary of the birth of Rubens. Further details with respect to the proposed celebration may be obtained on application to M. Leopold de Wael, Burgomaster of Antwerp.

MR CARL ROSA left London for Dublin on Sunday night. The opera selected for the first performance of his company (on Monday, the 6th inst.) was Il Trovatore. Mr Rosa is having M. Ambroise Thomas's semi-serious opera, Mignon, translated into English, for the sake of exhibiting Miss Gaylord in the character of the heroine. He gives no London performances this year.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

THE third concert given by Mr W. H. Holmes and his professional pupils (including some of his class at the Royal Academy of Music, by permission of the Principal, Professor Macfarren, Mus. Doc.), assisted by eminent artists, took place on Thursday morning, July 26th, at Langham Hall. We subjoin the programme:—

Part I.—Motive, from W. H. Holmes's opera, The Elf of the Lake—pianoforte, Mr W. H. Holmes (W. H. Holmes); Chromatic Fantasia—pianoforte, Mr Laton (Bach); Gigue, in G minor—pianoforte, Miss Lindsay (Handel); Air with Variations—pianoforte, Miss Pamphilon (Haydn); Fantasia, in C minor—pianoforte, Miss Robie Dunn (Mozart); Duet—pianoforte, Miss Fleming, violin, Mr Palmer (Dussek); Storm Rondo—pianoforte, Miss Edith Collins (Steibelt); Fugue—pianoforte, Mr Harvey Löhr (Beethoven); Duo, in D—pianoforte, Miss Maud Baglehole, violoncello, Herr Lütgen (Mendelssohn).

Part II.—Air with Variations—pianoforte (Frank Davenport), Carnevall—harp, Miss Mary Chatterton, pupil of Mr F. Chatterton, on the harp (F. Chatterton); Solo, violoncello, on Themes by Schubert—Herr Lütgen, accompanied by Mme Lütgen (Servais and Lütgen); Song, "The Desert"—Mr Frank Holmes, kindly accompanied by the composer (L. Emanuel); Trio—pianoforte, Miss Grace Gye, violin, Mr Palmer, violoncello, Herr Lütgen (Brahms); Fugue—pianoforte, Miss Florence Sanders (Rubinstein); Trio—pianoforte, Miss Isabel Thurgood, violin, Mr Palmer, violoncello, Herr Lütgen (Max Bruch); New Transcription Bravura, by W. H. Holmes (expressly for this concert, MS. of the "Dance of Herodias's Daughter," from St John the Baptist (G. A. Macfarren); Selection from Pauer's new Gradius ad Parnassum: "Study on the Shake" (Hummel); "Study on Thirds and Sixths" (C. Mayer); "Study on the Arpeggio" (Chopin)—pianoforte, Mr W. H. Holmes.

The selection of the works from Bach to Mendelssohn was of course made with the object of showing the rise and progress of the schools of composition and pianoforte playing. The pianoforte was a splendid instrument from the manufactory of Messrs John Broadwood & Sons. No concerts of their kind can be more varied and interesting than these. Mr Holmes is a great professor, and has done more than any other for the legitimate study of the instrument on which he is himself so justly renowned an executant.

PROVINCIAL.

RAMSGATE.—The splendid hall built at the foot of the Granville Hotel, on the Marina, St Lawrence-on-Sea, Ramsgate, was opened on Monday with a miscellaneous concert under the direction of Herr Schubert. The concert began with a Grand Duo Concertante, by Golttermann, played by Herr Hause (pianoforte) and Herr Schubert (violin-cello); the next piece being a vocal quartet, "England," sung by Miss Davies, Miss Dones, Mr Stedman, and Mr Thurley Beale; Mr Thurley Beale then followed with the "Moss Trooper" (encored); Miss Davies with "In a distant land," Taubert (encored), and "Robin Adair;" Mr Stedman with Reichardt's "Love's Request," and "The anchor's weighed;" Miss Dones with "Three Fishers" (Hullah), and "When the tide comes in" (Barnby); the duet, "I would that my love" (Mendelssohn); "I Naviganti" (Randegger); and "The fisherman's good night." Herr Hause (piano) and Herr Schubert (violin-cello) each contributed a solo. Herr Schubert conducted. The hall was crowded, and the concert was highly successful.

HAMBURG.—The representations in the Carl Schulzetheater, under the direction of Herr Schmidt, are discontinued, for the simple reason that the director told the artists he had no money.

MAYENCE.—We have had concerts here every day, alternately, one day in the Aulage and the next in the Raimundi Garden, with the band established by Burgermeister Schott (the late well-known publisher). In the winter the band belongs to the Town Theatre.

WIESBADEN.—M. Jules de Swert (the violoncellist), who has been playing with success at Vienna, and at a concert at our Kurhaus, is putting the finishing touches to his opera, Parcival, which is to be brought out next season.

MR CARL ROSA seems to be always changing his mind. It is now Wagner's Meistersinger, now Macfarren's Robin Hood, now Weber's Oberon, now Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, and so on. The enterprising impresario has at last hit upon the Mignon of M. Ambrose Thomas, for Miss Gaylord. What next? Mr Rosa abandons the idea of giving performances in London this year. Alas! for poor English opera (or opera in English); no one has any faith in it.—Graphic.

DE CAUX v. DE CAUX.

The Paris Correspondent of the Daily News writes:—"The Caux-Patti suit came on late on Friday afternoon before the Civil Tribunal. President Aubepin took the greatest care to prevent even barristers knowing that he was to hear it that day. It was placed at the end of a long list of cases, some of which could be very rapidly heard, and the rest of which he knew he would be asked to adjourn. The usher muttered in a scarcely audible voice the words, 'De Caux contre de Caux,' as M. Senard and three more advocates were quitting the court, where they had been to ask for more time for the further preparation of briefs. President Aubepin then hurried through the reading of the judgment.

'We hereby rule the separation of persons and of goods asked for in his petition; and we moreover commit to the care of Maitre Champetier de Ribes, notary, the liquidation of the community, and to M. L'Evesque, judge, the drawing up of the report on said liquidation; the Marquise de Caux to pay the costs of the suit.' The property vested by the Marquis de Caux for his wife in France amounts to nearly £80,000 sterling. As they were married without a contract, he will at the winding-up or liquidation get the half of it. Her diamonds and other jewels and trinkets, and I am told also laces, velvets, and shawls, which come under the head of articles of luxury, will be sold; or, if she chooses, she can take one half, and the other at a valuation."

LETTERS FROM BAYREUTH.

Under the title of "Letters from Bayreuth," the well-known musical critic, Mr Joseph Bennett, has republished, in a compact volume, a series of very interesting articles, originally addressed to the Daily Telegraph, on the performance of Wagner's Ring des Nibelungen, in August, 1876. A perusal of this little book, as unpretending as it is full of solid information, accompanied by searching and highly intelligent critical remarks on the subject treated, will amply repay the time spent upon it by an attentive reader, whether he be a proselyte to Wagner, or a disbeliever in Wagner's theories. Nothing could be clearer set forth, in that genuine Saxon English of which Mr Joseph Bennett is unquestionably a master; and whether we may agree with all his conclusions, or the contrary, a consideration of his arguments, pro and con, will not be the less entertaining and instructive. What was said once upon a time, by an eminent critic, about the late Lord Lytton, to some friend who disputed that prolific author's claims to original genius, applies with equal truth to Mr Joseph Bennett—"His diction, sir, alone is a charm." And to this may be added the subdued gravity of Mr Bennett's style, his strong common sense, and the logical acuteness of his reasoning, from whatever point of view he may regard the topic he discusses. Apart from all this, however, the "Letters from Bayreuth" deserve to be universally read. They give us Wagner in a nut-shell—that is, according to the impression created by the arch revolutionist upon the mind of the writer.—Graphic.

SEVEN YEARS AGO.*

The moon, like a soft and shining pearl, Gleams white in yon sapphire sky, And slowly the leaves, with tuneful Are gently wafted by. [swirl]	Just seven years! yet thy comely face Is as young and fresh to me; Nor age nor care have left a trace That my fond eyes can see.
Full many an argent August moon Hath passed since I knew thee, And (like life's joys) passed all too soon, Whene'er thou wert with me.	And, best of all, thy tender heart, Thank God! is still as true; And mine has ne'er had cause to smart, Nor yet its trust to rue.
Thine eye is still as fond and bright, And thy words still kindly flow, As when first we met that August night Just seven years ago.	My love and my life are knit in one; That love no change can know; 'Tis deeper, firmer, stronger now, Than seven years ago!

BERLIN.

(Extract from a Letter.)

The theatrical season is at present very dull. The comedians of the Imperial "Burgtheater" at Vienna, who gave a series of performances at the National Theatre, have left again for home. The excellence of their representations and the good selection of pieces draw better houses than was expected. Quite a sensation was produced by Miss Wessely at Leipsic, a very talented artist, who promises to become one of the leading actresses of the future. She is now only seventeen years of age, but shows a wonderful perception in delineating human character. On seeing her as Marie, in Goethe's Clavigo, I was struck by her marvellous rendering of this difficult part. At Wallner's Theatre the Hypochondra continues to be appreciated by comparatively large audiences. The Friedrich Wilhelmstadt has come out with The Portrait Lady, a new opéra bouffe in the style of Offenbach, not containing much originality. The lessee at Waltersdorf's Theatre, after vainly endeavouring to attract the public by representations of Anzengruber's moral plays, chiefly depicting the life of the lower classes in Austria, has been obliged to close. A like fate seems to await the Thalia Theatre, which is changing from hand to hand without any proprietor being more fortunate than his predecessor. In the Städtgarten, a public place of recreation in the centre of the city, where open air concerts are nightly given, the ascension of balloons has a more magnetic influence than the music of Beethoven or Mozart. Last Sunday, to the amusement of the Berliners, a young actress accompanied the aeronaut in his ascent. They had a voyage of three hours, and effected a landing without injury to the fair occupant, who afterwards sent to the papers a description of her experiences in balloon travelling. For the next voyage a member of the Japanese Legation has bespoken a seat in the car. Our Eastern friends have become quite popular here, especially among the fairer sex.

CRYSTAL PALACE OPERAS.

On Saturday, at the Crystal Palace, the first of a series of ten operatic performances by the Rose Hersee Opera Company was successfully given, and attracted a large audience. During the last two years no operas have been heard at the Palace, and it was in compliance with numerous requests that the directors arranged for a reproduction of that form of musical entertainment, which for many consecutive years was one of the leading attractions in their annual programme. The opera selected for Saturday was Mozart's Marriage of Figaro, which had never before been introduced at the Palace, and had not been presented in London in an English dress since it was performed by the Carl Rosa Opera Company at the Princess's Theatre in the autumn of 1875. Two of the principal artists engaged on Saturday, Mdme Rose Hersee (Countess Almaviva) and Signor Campobello (Count Almaviva), occupied prominent positions in the cast of the opera at the Princess's Theatre, two years back; and about these, with the proviso that the two airs of the Countess could hardly have been rendered with more purely Mozartean expression than by Mdme Hersee, it is only necessary to say that on Saturday they maintained the high reputations they have long enjoyed. Mdme Cave-Ashton appeared for the first time as Susanna, and made a highly favourable impression, singing the music with a fidelity to the text and correctness of phrasing bespeaking the well-trained musician, and acting with much vivacity and intelligence. Miss Florence St John, a young lady who has never before been heard in London, has a telling mezzo-soprano, and acts with spirit. Mr Richard Temple was a remarkably good Figaro, while Mr Marler (Dr Bartolo) and Mr Arthur Howell (Antonio) were all that could be desired. Basilio and the minor characters were efficiently represented. By some mischance more than half the chorus failing to reach their destination, the few choral pieces were less effective than they might have been. As every one knows, it is on the efforts of the principal artists that the success of any performance of The Marriage of Figaro must depend, and it is due to all concerned to say that not only were the familiar solos, duets, and trios successfully sung, but that the glorious finale of the second act was executed with faultless precision. The fine band of the Palace played the overture in admirable style, and rendered full justice to the accompaniments. To the conductor, Mr Sidney Naylor, who has had a long experience as a chef d'orchestre, much of the success of the performance was due. The mise-en-scène reflected credit on the ability of the stage manager, Mr Arthur Howell.

On Tuesday Vincent Wallace's ever-popular Maritana was performed with the following cast:—Maritana, Mdme Rose Hersee; Lazarillo, Miss Florence St John; Don Cesar de Bazan, Mr George Perren; Don José, Sig. Campobello; the Marquis and Marchioness,

Mr Arthur Howell and Mrs Dixon; and King Charles of Spain, Mr R. Temple. It would be difficult to provide a better cast, and the manner in which the opera was executed would have satisfied the composer himself. It is no slight advantage to have a body of instrumentalists such as the Crystal Palace orchestra, with such solo players as MM. Dubrucq, Clinton, Wells, Wootton, &c., to execute obbligato passages—saying nothing of the leader, Mr. Watson, whose violin solo was admirably played. Of the manner in which such artists as Mdme Rose Hersee, MM. Perren, Campobello, and Temple acquitted themselves, it is needless to speak; but special praise is due to Miss St John, who, as Lazarillo, enhanced the favourable impression previously made by her Cherubino. Her delivery of "Alas those chimés!" was unanimously applauded. The quality of her lower notes surprised those who had supposed her to be simply a mezzo-soprano; and, although her vocalisation needs further polish, she has every chance of being successful as a contralto pure. Il Trovatore was the opera on Thursday, and Don Giovanni will be presented this afternoon.

Richard Wagner's Stage-Festival Play.*

(From Dwight's Journal of Music.)

[We translate here the concluding chapter of a little book by H. M. Schletterer, Director of the Conservatory at Augsburg, a cultivated musician and an admirable critic. The volume is made up of his letters from Bayreuth to the Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung, in which he records his impressions after each day's performance of the Nibelungen Trilogy and Introduction. We think it embodies, on the whole, the best account that we have yet seen, both in the way of description and of critical appreciation, among so many good ones, of Wagner's master effort. We wish some publisher and competent translator might be found for the entire work, which exceeds the narrow bounds of our fortnightly journal.]

We find ourselves at the end of the gigantic work. Congratulating ourselves on having happily survived it, and registering a vow of renunciation for all time of all repetition of the enjoyment, we will now attempt a résumé of the impression of the entire work, and try to see what prospects for future artistic realization these bold innovations, which Wagner has here for the first time brought partially before the world, may offer. Wagner we know, is proclaimed by the Hotspurs, who follow his flag from various motives, as the greatest poet and greatest composer of his time, as the perfecter of all dramatic-musical strivings. Possibly he believes all that of himself; he has at least given abundant proofs of bold self-consciousness. But let it remain undecided, whether he is fond of hearing himself compared to Æschylus and other men not altogether insignificant. Whether, as poet, he stands immediately next to Schiller and Goethe, the experts may determine. But, in our deepest, firmest conviction, the place next to Mozart and Beethoven is to this hour unoccupied. The performance of the Nibelungen Trilogy, apart from the manifold shortcomings in the more or less successful representation itself, could not yield any real satisfaction, not to speak of enjoyment. Even the most glowing of Wagner's followers had to confess, that helpless dreariness and dullness, infinite exhaustion and prostration, were the lot of all who attended the festival plays. The dramas of our great poets also move and thrill us, penetrate and stir us; and it would be terrible to think that people could always go away from the temples of Art only humming or laughing. It will ever remain the highest task of poetry and music to reach what is deepest in man and make him bow beneath the weight of imperishable impressions. But true and genuine Art elevates and refreshes at the same time, for in its inmost nature it conceals the balm for the griefs it brings. With Wagner's dramas it is quite otherwise.

Who has carried away from the Rheingold anything but nervous irritation and physical prostration? What artistic or dramatic idea was there to compensate us for the torturing prolixity of this prelude? In the first drama, Siegmund and Sieglinde interest us perhaps, and at the end the noble Walkyrie; but we cannot feel our whole soul warm for the guilty pair, the victims of a dark fate; and before Brünnhilde's destiny is finally fulfilled, we have long since been blunted for all impressions. Siegfried offers no moment that could lift us above the commonplace of life; and in the Götterdämmerung, of which the text, in point of invention and execution, may be designated as the best and most consistent portion of the Trilogy, it is at bottom only magic draughts that govern destinies. Even the underlying thought of the whole, that all for wretched gold and the guilt that cleaves to it, both gods and men must be brought low—(in the murderous drama all the actors, from Wotan down to the horse Grane, find annihilation,—only the insignificant Guttrune remains alive)—has nothing for us that really takes hold of us, at all events nothing to fill our soul throughout four evenings.

What chiefly enchains us in other poems, the mild relations of sympathy and love, the feelings and emotions of the acting persons, is almost wholly wanting in Wagner's dramas. He succeeds better in describing wild passion and fiery lust, than in expressing in tones the tender blissful feelings of the soul. Cheap effects may always be obtained by a thick laying on of colours. To our heart, which surely has some claims upon a drama, too little is offered in the four Nibelungen evenings, to enable us to begin to talk of satisfaction. Not the slightest interest is awakened in us for the fate of the soi-disant Gods; their uncouth progeny, governed by the most unbridled sensuality, soon become repulsive to us; to the men clings not a trace of moral character. Only in a few rare moments is any warmer sympathy excited; as when in the second act of the Walküre the love of husband and wife, and in the third, that between child and father, breaks out; when Siegfried yields himself up to the magical charm of the forest, and when Brinnhilde is awakened by him out of her long sleep. For the almost entire want of scenes and traits which work upon our inmost feeling, we are not compensated in the long run by beautiful decorations and costumes, which one very soon sees to satiety, nor by the bold scene shifting and the interesting writs of identification (Leit-motiven) which chase one another restlessly about in the orchestra; least of all by lengthy scenes, spun out with evident fondness, in which sensuality is raised to boiling heat and voluptuousness goes up in steaming, stifling vapours. How far a stage play may go in this direction, we will not here inquire; we are far from wishing to preach up absolute virtuousness and the diverting of the drama from any sort of sensuous delight. In pictures, under certain circumstances, even the nude can appear chaste and pure; yet there is a great difference between such noble works of plastic Art and those which purposely present voluptuous scenes merely to excite sensual passion. With Wagner it is too strikingly the case, that the description of wild, reeling sensual ecstasy is often what he aims at; he understands that like a virtuoso, and with a faun-like zest he riots in such exciting tone-pictures. By this means his Art becomes immoral and corrupting, an ideal for hysterical women and nervously exhausted men. The conception of love or sexual relations in his operas is unspeakably unsound, unnatural, and loathsome. One must actually find a peculiar satisfaction in risking swoons of the senses, when we can resolve to hear such music often.

STANZAS FOR MUSIC.*

The setting sun o'er the waving corn
On the hill which looks over the sea,
And the soothing sound of the breakers borne
In the ocean breeze by me,
Whilst the skylark's song in the evening chill
Echoes faint through the corn-waving breeze o'er the hill.

Or musing, a placid summer's night
Dreamily into the black
Of the death-silent wood where the moon trembles light
On the shadows demoniac,
And the air seems alive with the pure emotion
Of a few musicians at their devotion.

O! that my soul could sail in the sighs,
Hear, nay feel the beat
Of a throbbing heart to sympathise
With a rapture so tender, so sweet.
O! for the wondrous joy divine
Of a love-lighted face upturn'd to mine!

The clear receipts of the Salzburg Festival amount to between three and four thousand florins. The second day was the best in a pecuniary sense; 540 florins were paid at the doors in addition to the money received for tickets in advance.

Besides the two Cimarosas, Aurelio and Ippolito, who cropped up after it was reported that no descendants of the composer were living, another member of the family, Luigi Cimarosa, a nephew by the father's side, has made known that he also is alive, and is now residing in Madrid, where he has been established some twelve years, as musical composer.

Herr Jean Becker (who played many years ago at the Monday Popular Concerts), leader of the Florentine Quartet Union, lately instituted a concours for a new string quartet. From among 50 competitors, the prizes have been awarded to Bernhardt Scholz, of Breslau, and Herr Friedrich Lutt, of Mayence. Johannes Brahms and Robert Volkmann were members of the jury.

ITALIAN OPERA ENGAGEMENTS.—Additions have now been made to the list of artists seeking engagements in Italy, and in Italian operas. The list now numbers 132 first sopranos, 54 leading contraltos, 144 first tenors, 98 first baritones, 29 basses, and 8 buffos. In all, there appear to be on this list 465 vocalists who want berths, and these are wholly irrespective of the large number of German, English, and American artists who are unconnected with Italy, and about whom the list does not profess to trouble itself. [Mr Carl Rosa has travelling room for them all.—T. Q.]

There were two of them hanging over the front gate the other night. She was standing within the yard, he on the side-walk, both leaning on the top rail, and as happy as pigs in a cornfield. He was saying: "Now, my own little darling, sweet idol of my soul, whose image is always on my heart," when, perceiving the old man coming down the front walk, he continued in a different strain. "The potatoe bugs haven't destroyed our crops so much since we purchased Paris green, and you will find also that cabbages can be raised better on richer soil." The old gentleman turned back, remarking: "These young people take more interest in agricultural matters than is generally supposed."

M. Sellier, who has carried off the first vocal prize at the Paris Conservatory, formerly served in a wine shop of the Rue Drouot, behind the old Opera House. At a meeting of the composers employed on the XIX^e Siècle, printed in the above street, each sang something. At length, one asked the shopman to try like the rest. It was a Wednesday. The chorus-singers of the Opera, lounging on the pavement, were surprised to hear an air from La Juive sung by a voice so pure and strong. This occurred several days in succession. At the request of M. Léon Thivet, a composer, M. About went down from his editor's room one day to hear the phenomenon. Shortly afterwards, he persuaded M. Sellier to sing in the office, and, thanks to him, the young vocalist soon obtained a hearing from MM. de Leuven and du Locle, managers of the Opéra-Comique. They wished to secure him, but M. Halanzier undertook M. Sellier's musical education, and allowed him 400 francs a month till his début at the Opera, which will shortly take place.

LLANDYSSUL Eisteddfod.—The committee of the British School at Llandyssul, having handed over to the local school board the institution hitherto under their charge, and finding that a considerable debt remained, thought some time ago of getting up an Eisteddfod, the proceeds of which should tide them over the difficulty. The idea was warmly taken up by the promoters of secular education; and, notwithstanding the semi-party character of the project, it was supported by almost all classes and creeds over the district, as it took the form so dear to the Welsh heart, to which music and song can never come amiss. It was, consequently, no very difficult task to form an influential committee, and the enterprise of these gentlemen has been rewarded by the result. An audience of some 3,000, the attendance of a number of bardic gentlemen of note, who acted as adjudicators, choir-conductors, &c., two members of parliament, as presidents (Mr T. E. Lloyd, Coedmore, member for Cardiganshire, and Mr Davies, Llandinam, member for the Cardigan boroughs); with some promising choral parties in South Wales were among the distinguishing features which the Eisteddfod of Wednesday last owed in a great measure to the exertions of the committee. The marquee, erected on an eminence above the town, the accommodation provided for audience and reporters, with other preparations, gave unqualified satisfaction. — Cardarthen Journal.

MILAN.—Signori Gasseau and Steffanoni have opened the Teatro Dal Verme. The season is to last during August and September. The programme includes, among other things, Verdi's Macbeth, and a new opera with ballet, words by Sig. A. Ghislanzani, music by Sig. C. E. Pasta.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

NEW PIANOFORTE PIECE BY MADAME OURY. "CONSOLATION."

Easy of execution, but melodious and effective. Price 4s.; Half-price Cash or Stamps.

"We wonder who has not, in the hour of trouble, more than once derived comfort from the sweet sounds such as David must have used to mollify the troubled spirit of Saul. What better name, then, to give a graceful strain of peaceful melody, such as must convey to the sorrowing heart feelings of rest and sympathy, than 'Consolation'? Such is the title of a charming new piano-forte composition by that indefatigable and prolific writer, M^{me} Oury; prolific indeed, for the piece bears no lower an Opus number than 185. Its flow of peaceful melody, enhanced by the delicacy and variety of the accompaniment, and harmonised in the masterly style of an experienced writer, well fulfils the object of the title. In every sense of the word is 'Consolation' an admirable piece of music, and it must rank among M^{me} Oury's best efforts of the kind. As a morceau de salon it is of moderate difficulty, and of sufficient brilliance to display the capacities of a proficient performer. The composition is dedicated to Mrs Graver-Browne, of Morley Hall, and published by Messrs Paterson & Sons, of Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c."

I.

Pine heath with sand, fathomless sand underneath it, sand in which the wheels of a carriage turn but slowly and the horses progress but slowly, step by step—such is a landscape in the Brandenburg Marches, and such it was likewise a hundred years ago. It possessed then as few attractions as it possesses now, even though the moon sheds over it her silver light, as it did at the moment of which we are about to speak. Yes, the moon shone fully upon the arid, sandy expanse. The wheels of the carriage turned slowly with a monotonous creaking on the heavy axles, and the horses, snorting and tossing their heads, advanced only step by step. In vain did the occupant of the lumbering vehicle cry from the window:

"Get on, coachman, get on! Fresh horses are waiting in the village."

"It's no good, sir!" was the stereotype reply to the oft-repeated exhortation.

The driver was right. It is true that the clacking of his whip had the effect of causing the horses to raise their heads and appear as if about to make a greater effort, but they got no further than the mere attempt. As if answering in the negative, they shook their heads, let them fall again, and then relapsed into their old snail's pace. The gentleman's head would then be drawn back, with an oath, into the carriage, and its owner would continue to rail inside, while a woman's voice was also heard from time to time. But all this did not make the coach go quicker. After a continuance of hot, dry weather, such as there had been uninterruptedly for weeks previous at the period to which we are referring, the sandy tracks of heath were very bad for travelling; they were the terror of coachmen and horses. It is true that the clouds had gathered on the horizon and threatened a storm; yet the following day had been accompanied by, if possible, still greater heat than the day before. At last—at last—the wood opened, and a village appeared in sight. As a matter of course, everything in it was buried in the deepest sleep. Only a dog, disturbed in his dream by the rattling of the carriage over the rugged stones, began barking, and a dozen of his comrades joined in furiously. The moonbeams fell full upon the little village street, and the driver's practised eye soon discovered the thin pole stretching from the thatched roof of one of the houses like a gallows, and bearing at its free end the picture of some undefinable primæval monstrosity. That must be it, "The Pitcher," to wit, the inn where the horses of which the gentleman had spoken were waiting. But here, too, all was buried in the deepest sleep. The Coachman smacked his whip loudly in the air, but no one stirred. The carriage stopped, and the gentleman, jumping out, looked with astonishment at the house, the monstrosity at the end of the pole, and the Coachman.

"Why, what can this mean?" he asked at length, evidently in a state of thorough perplexity.

"Don't know, but will soon find out," grunted the Coachman, getting down clumsily from the box. He now began knocking violently at the door with his fists, and, when this proved of no avail, commenced kicking against it with the heels of his heavy boots.

"What's the matter, Baptist?" enquired the female voice from the carriage.

"God knows, Gerty! But there is nothing to be seen either of Mademoiselle Clarichon or of fresh horses."

"Mon Dieu, how terrible!" replied the voice.

Meanwhile the Jehu's indefatigable exertions on the door had at length some effect; shuffling steps were audible, and a bolt was shot back inside. The door opened and the form of the Landlord, with the inevitable sheepskin flung over his primitive toilet, stepped forth into the moonlight. He gazed in stupid astonishment at the gentleman and the Coachman, who both addressed him simultaneously; but, at all events, he understood neither of them. During this time the Lady, also, had scrambled out of the carriage and joined the other persons. She was thickly wrapped in a travelling cloak, and wore twisted round her head a black veil, which served as a frame to a small, pale face. It was easy to perceive in the bright moonshine that the face had passed the first bloom of youth and was not exactly handsome, but the features, and the large speaking black eyes, indicated considerable intelligence. The Lady began taking an active share in the conversation, but her intervention did not mend matters. The travellers were soon convinced that there were no fresh horses any more than a Mademoiselle Clarichon.

"Good Heavens! Good Heavens! what is to be done—what does all this mean?" sighed the Lady, in the greatest anxiety.

Again did they begin parleying with the Landlord, and, by dint of questioning and cross-questioning that rustic and sleepy individual, got something to the following effect out of him:—About noon the previous day, a young horseman had stopt at the house, and, after asking for something to eat and drink, had made enquiries concerning carriage horses. He struck the Landlord as being a very remarkable individual. By his speech and appearance he might have been taken for a woman rather than one of the male sex, and the Landlord still believed his visitor was a female in disguise. Soon after the stranger, a hussar officer had arrived, and a violent scene had occurred between the two. But the Landlord understood nothing of it, as they spoke a foreign language. The end of the matter, however, was that the Officer took the youth in his arms, and regularly covered him with kisses. The two then refreshed themselves thoroughly and rode off, without saying another word.

"O, mon Dieu!" sighed the Lady, with blank despair painted in her countenance, "All is lost; Clarichon has betrayed us!"

"As yet nothing is lost!" cried her companion, with awakening energy. "Coachman, we must make an effort. We must go on at once with the same horses."

"Can't be done! can't be done, sir! Just look at the poor brutes."

"It's no use talking, Coachman. We must go on at all risks. We will pay double. The frontier cannot be far off now."

"No, that it isn't," grumbled the Coachman, for whom the double pay was a terribly powerful bait. "We'll see what we can do; but it's more than the poor brutes can stand. Well—I'm contented. Here we go, then."

The travellers again climbed into the carriage and the Coachman on to his box, and the lumbering conveyance jolted noisily off, accompanied by the furious baying of all the dogs in the village. Shaking his head, the Landlord gazed after it. He did not grumble, however; with a contented smile he pocketed the gold piece which glistened in his hand. The door was closed, and the bolt noisily shot forward. But the good man was not destined to find rest. He had not finished answering the questions of the stout partner of his married bliss in the gigantic tent bedstead, anent the remarkable incident of the night, before someone again thundered violently at the house door. What an idea! Was there another piece of gold to be earned? Far more quickly than on the first occasion the Landlord went down and opened the door. But, this time, to his no small alarm, a detachment of Prussian dragoons was waiting in the street, and their commander, with military brevity, inquired in a peremptory voice about the vehicle which had started scarcely a quarter of an hour before. The Landlord, urged thereto by fright, gave the required information as curtly and concisely, and the troopers spurred after the carriage. Of course there was nothing in the shape of a gold piece.

The carriage, after leaving the village, had not penetrated far into the wood ere the horses manifested the greatest desire to fall once more into their old snail's pace.

"For Heaven's sake, Coachman, get on, get on! Shall we not soon be at the frontier?"

"We are not there yet," replied the Coachman from his box. But, in expectation of double pay, that worthy individual really tried to urge his nags, who were thoroughly tired out, into a quicker pace. "You see yonder eminence—directly behind it, is the frontier-post."

"Good Heavens! Good Heavens!" sighed the Lady aloud; "help us, or we are lost."

And lost they were. They had only got half up the eminence mentioned ere they heard behind them a jingle and rattling with which their ears were but too familiar, while immediately afterwards there resounded through the silent forest the terrible order:

"Stop, in the King's name!"

* From the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung.

At these dread words the Coachman mechanically pulled in his reins, and the nags were only too ready to stop. The next moment the troopers clattered up. A glance into the carriage convinced the Officer he had found the right persons, and come in the nick of time. A little later and the fugitives he was pursuing would have been in safety on the other side of the frontier.

"I am sincerely sorry, Madame," began the leader of the detachment, "that I have unavoidably for the second time the honour of taking your carriage under my care. This time, however, you must go, not to the Operahouse, but"—and here he stopped short.

"Do not hesitate; pronounce the terrible word!" answered the Lady firmly, seeing that escape was no longer possible. "We are to go direct to—Spandau."

Despite the Lady's apparent firmness, her pale lips quivered as she pronounced the terrible word.

"No, not exactly," replied the Officer with a consoling smile; "for the present we are only going back direct to Berlin. It is true that his Majesty is extremely indignant; that I cannot deny."

"Aye, I can very well believe it," interposed the Lady's companion; and it was undecided whether scorn or courage predominated in the tone of his voice.

"You have to be silent," observed the Officer harshly. "I have orders, at the slightest resistance, to put Monsieur Mara on horseback, and have him at least transported between two troopers to Spandau. As for Madame Mara, the purport of my orders is different."

"Act according to your orders, sir," the Lady replied almost inaudibly. "I answer for my husband." And, covering her face with both hands, she sank down sobbing upon the cushions. Her resolution had deserted her.

"Right about, Coachman; in the village we will procure fresh horses. Yours seem to have had enough of it."

"Humph," grumbled the Coachman to himself, as he obeyed the order, "I wonder where my double pay is!"

It was indeed Mdme Mara, Frederick the Great's celebrated singer, who, in the middle of the night and in the depths of the forest close to the frontier of Saxony, had been arrested as a runaway by Royal Prussian dragoons, in the name of the King of Prussia, and conveyed back to Berlin. It was Mdme Mara, the first German operatic singer, who, as a young girl, as Gertrude Schmahling, had entered on, and emerged victorious from, the struggle against the monopoly of Italian vocalists. The favourite of Frederick the Great, the idol of the Berlin public, had fled secretly from Berlin, and been apprehended as a deserter close to the frontier by dragoons. The King's anger might have terrible consequences. Yes, she had, indeed, good reasons for sinking down in mental prostration on the hard cushions of the carriage, for she was only too familiar with the anger-flashing eyes of her sovereign. And it was to meet those eyes, before which she trembled in the inmost recesses of her heart, that she was now being conveyed, without the power of resistance or delay. How different, however, things might have been! From the hut of poverty she had ascended to the sunny heights of fame. She was the renowned artist, the great singer cherished by princes and by their peoples; yet, at that moment, how did she yearn for the joyless obscurity of her youth, which now, despite all its bitterness, floated almost like past happiness before her mind's eye. Let us plunge with her into the reminiscences of her romance-like life.

To F. C. Burnand, Esq.

Liszt and Wagner have been staying together at Weimar, consulting, it is believed, about the fittest means of producing in public the now nearly completed opera, Parcival, latest composition of the author of Der Ring des Nibelungen.

Richard Wagner's Stage-Festival Play.*

Wherein chiefly lies for so many hearers the peculiar charm, and for the followers of the classical direction the weakness and repulsiveness, of Wagner's music? For the most part, probably, in its harmonic treatment and peculiar modulation; but also in its formlessness and its extravagant instrumentation, exhausting all means of effect. The ideal matter, the musical thought and inspiration, are always only alight with Wagner. He is a very skillful workman; but what he gives is after all only ingenious mosaic, in which his reckless sort of counterpoint and modulation mocks at all laws of Art. The inexplicable tone combinations which one meets in him have an inexplicable effect upon the laity, fearfully exciting to the nerves, while they confound and fail to satisfy the connoisseurs. Besides, often as you hear it said, do not believe that Wagner has created so much that is new in harmony, in imitation and in instrumentation. Most of his effects are found singly in older works. What makes his compositions appear new is the unartistic heaping up of all conceivable means of effect; the startling, often ugly combination of instruments, which only when heard from a cellar, as if from a distance, do not offend the finer ear; the planless grouping in all keys; the modulation never arriving at repose and reeling from one deceptive cadence to another; and the continual use of altered (i.e., augmented and diminished) chords. The great masters of the past purposely employed their effects always sparingly; hence the extraordinary effect which they produce even when often heard. Wagner, heaping effect upon effect, appears here too as a spend-thrift; but the consequence of these perpetual stimulants is a speedy satiety which sets in against his music, and a rapid wearing out of even the most brilliant combinations.

But even more than all these sickly symptoms of his compositions, the lack of melody in his operas will always stand in the way of their popularity. Just on that side where an opera composer ought to have superabundance, with him we find the most striking poverty and impotence. Do not speak to us of the sporadic melodies into which he now and then exceptionally goes astray. To be sure, we find such, but, for the wide compass and the pretentious nature of his operas, far too few. Wagner who gives with full hands what he does possess, would not be a miser in melody, if there were really melodic treasures in his possession. And then, divest his melodies of their harmonic and melodic accessories—and what remains? Allusions to what is well known, nothing conspicuous for originality or grace. Wagner, who constantly appeals to Schopenhauer, is unfaithful to his teachings, the moment he has to do with melody; for this wise man says:—

"In the compositions of the present time more regard is paid to harmony than melody; but I hold to the opposite view, and regard melody as the art of the music, to which harmony bears the relation of sauce to roast meat."

And about the Opera especially he has these very remarkable words:—

"It ought never to forsake its subordinate place, to make itself the principal affair and music the mere medium of its expression, which is a great mistake and sheer perversion. At bottom it is but the product of the somewhat barbaric idea of heightening the aesthetic enjoyment by the accumulation of means, by the simultaneousness of wholly different impressions, and by the strengthening of effect through the multiplication of the operating masses and forces; whereas music, as the mightiest of all arts, by itself alone, can completely fill the soul that is susceptible. But instead of this, during such extremely complicated opera music, the mind is impounded at the same time through the eye, by means of the most motley pageantry, fantastical images, and the liveliest impressions of light and colour; with which the fable of the piece has most to do. By all this the mind is drawn away, distracted, stunned, and rendered by no means susceptible to the holy, mysterious, interior language of tones. It all works directly counter to the attainment of the musical end."

Wagner's efforts to renew the life of Opera in subject matter and in form, are highly meritorious. Hitherto a single means of expression (music) has been made too much the end, while the end of expression (the action) has been made the means. Yet the relation of the two does not admit of being precisely reversed, unless the musical Art is to renounce all it has achieved for centuries and grant only a very subordinate position to what has always borne the burthen of dramatic music, the human voice. Poetry and Music, essentially hostile rather than friendly, can only work together to the same end through mutual concessions. Had Wagner as much melodic invention as he has dramatic fire and intellectual reflection, he would never have thought of the Music Drama—essentially a monstrosity—but would have contented himself with bringing what is a hybrid in its very nature nearer to all possible perfection. As we have just spoken of Schopenhauer, we may mention an interesting anecdote we lately read. A gentleman from Zurich, a zealous admirer of the great thinker, paid him a visit at Frankfort-on-Maine. As he took his leave, the philosopher said to him: “A certain Wagner in Zurich keeps sending me his writings. Please tell him he had better spare me; he understands nothing of music.”

We have spoken repeatedly of the poetic form in which Wagner clothes his poems, and have shown how no other measure offers greater and more whimsical difficulties for musical treatment than the so-called Stabreim (alliterative rhyme). Granting that the poet knows how to fit together his alliterations often very poetically and with graceful ease, and not taking into account the senseless un-German passages, which unfortunately occur in almost every Opera poem, every page of the Nibelungen text affords proofs that knotty, twisted and uneven passages, scarcely intelligible even to the reader, offer almost insuperable difficulties not only to the composer, who through the never changing movement of the verses is doomed to endless rhythmical monotony, but also to the singer. Nothing shows more clearly the wide departure which Wagner has taken from song music proper, than this tendency to the old alliterative rhyme, whose centre of gravity consists mainly in an arbitrary play with syllables and words, vowels and consonants, entirely worthless for a text for singing. While the Italian poets and the best German librettists have constantly endeavoured to furnish the singer with soft, euphonious sentences, rich in vowel sounds, so as to make his task more easy, here is required the enunciation of a text, which sticks already in the reader's throat, and which, apart from its general unintelligibility, is also musically fatiguing, because it admits of scarcely any but three-fold rhythms.

THE MUSICAL PITCH.

(To the Editor of the “Musical World.”)

SIR,—Absence and domestic engagements have delayed my reply to Mr. A. J. Ellis's letter of July 14. If he will read mine again, he will find that the first three-quarters of a column of his reply was quite unnecessary, because my charge was not that he advocated “equal temperament,” but that he entirely misconceived the meaning of those words. Equal semitones are not intended. As there never were six equal tones in an octave, so there never can be “twelve equal semitones.” Mr. Alexander J. Ellis kindly reads papers to the Royal Society and other societies on the science of music, although his numerous engagements have hitherto precluded him from acquiring a knowledge of the ratios of the semitones of a scale.

In the paper which he last contributed to the Society of Arts, although the subject was “On the Measurement and Settlement (?) of Musical Pitch,” he diverged to inform the Society that “The piano-forte shows us an octave divided sensibly into twelve equal parts, called equal semitones.” All had before been taught that diatonic and chromatic semitones were not alike. I had noticed so many elementary mistakes in the writings of this gentleman that, while answering upon the main subject of his paper, musical pitch, I could not refrain from informing him that there are no two equal semitones in an octave. In his reply he admits that he had not learnt those “small intervals,” but attributes that trifling deficiency in his musical education to the late Prof. Donaldson, of the University of Edinburgh, whose lectures upon musical science he attended between November, 1856, and April, 1857. Mr. Ellis's account is, that Prof. Donaldson “never proceeded above the sixteenth harmonic, and hence did not get into the small intervals, 16 to 17, 17 to 18, 18 to 19, and 19 to 20, which Mr. Chappell calls semitones.” As the lectures were given twenty years ago, and Mr. Ellis has been exercising great self-restraint for that long period, he must now be overborne with anxiety to know what is a semitone in music. It would be unfair to keep so actively employed a penman longer in suspense; but I must remind him that the late Professor cannot but have taught him, although the remarkable pupil did not learn. I introduced the name of Professor Donaldson, because I had known him, and had an opportunity of hearing him epitomise the subjects of his lectures at his own breakfast-table. Moreover, my recollections are confirmed by excellent authority. It was quite unnecessary that Prof. Donaldson should have carried practical illustration “above the sixteenth harmonic,” because he gave his pupils the rule for dividing tones into semitones, as well as into smaller intervals. Mr. Ellis speaks with great contempt of his deceased master; therefore, permit me to show which of the two was in fault.

Mr. Ellis admits having been taught up to 16, necessarily including 8, 9, and 10. Does our fluent writer contend that he was not taught, and does not know, that the interval of 8 to 9 is a major tone, and that of 9 to 10 a minor tone? or is it that he was not taught, and has not yet learned, how to divide a simple ratio? Mr. Ellis may choose his alternative. Donaldson told him to double the 8 and 9, and the intermediate number, 17, was the semitone; hence the 16 to 17 and 17 to 18. In the same way the minor tone gives 18 to 19, and 19 to 20. All the numbers are multiples of the vibrations of No. 1. If Mr. Ellis had ever read any book upon the subject, it would have taught him the same; or he might have learned it without book, from the harmonic scale, which includes every degree of consonance, and is therefore the one authority for music. Mr. Ellis informs us that he is “now perfectly familiar” with the above-named intervals, “thanks to Appun's tonometer.” I congratulate him, and hope that his ears have at length convinced him that they are not equal, as he said they were before the Society of Arts. “As Helmholtz did not publish the first edition of his work till 1862,” says Mr. Ellis, “Prof. Donaldson was of course profoundly ignorant of the elementary science of music.” Which of the two, Donaldson or Ellis, was or is the “profoundly ignorant” one may now be left to the judgment of the reader. It is certainly rather cool that Mr. Ellis should sweepingly condemn all who died before 1862 as ignorant—he not having read any of their works, or being no whit the wiser from their perusal. Among the “of course profoundly ignorant” of Mr. Ellis is the late Sir Charles Wheatstone, who cut away the base from Helmholtz's theories by anticipation forty years ago. In one of his earlier lectures, Wheatstone showed that a two-octave scale could be sounded from a tuning fork by sliding the piston in a resonating tube up and down. I have one of his resonating tubes, and can prove it still. Helmholtz mistook the sounds of resonators to be primary instead of secondary causes—to fortify the ear, instead of to deceive it. It is unnecessary to say how many men superior to Mr. Ellis in knowledge of the subject are now convinced that Wheatstone was right. No counter-proof has been, or is likely to be, attempted. One passage in my letter has bewildered Mr. Ellis. It is the following:—“It is impossible to consider Mr. Ellis's proposals for tempering the musical scale as at all happy. He would have certain numbers of vibrations and fractions of vibrations, which, added together, shall equal the two to one of the octave. But the calculations are purely geometrical, without consideration for the consonance of the intermediate intervals, and he has fallen into this error by a thorough misconception of the nature of a musical scale.” To all this I adhere; but I was wrong in adding that “Mr. Ellis selected 24 to 25 for the model semitone in a recent communication.” Twelve equal semitones in an octave are impossible, geometrically or musically; and I ascribed the proposal to take a real semitone in the centre of the octave to the wrong person. Mr. Ellis does not intend semitones of that class. With him a “semitone” is a purely geometrical calculation, which, like much else that he proposes, has no connection with music. “The equal semitone,” says Mr. Ellis, “is always stated to be nearly 1.0594, or as I put it in my paper, . . . very nearly $1\frac{1}{12}$, which is true within limits that the ear cannot perceive.” In music, semitones must diminish in ascent, and any two of the same ratio would be abominable to the ear. As all semitones in a true scale are unequal, equal temperament must leave them unequal. Mr. Ellis thoroughly confounds two opposite branches of science—geometry and music. Decimals are no parts of music, nor are semitones of geometry.

REGINALD BARNETT.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

On Saturday night Messrs A. and S. Gatti began their series of Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre, before an audience that crowded not only boxes, dress-circle, and galleries, but, as might have been anticipated, the area before and behind the orchestra. The decorations, by Messrs Dayes and Caney, Mr Gye's well-known "scenic artists," equal any similar display in former years; and among other expedients for neutralising the atmospheric pressure incident to pent-up throngs within a given space, were observed huge blocks of Wenham Lake ice, behind the reserved stalls separated by a barrier from the "shilling pit." These not only afforded refreshing coolness to all within their immediate neighbourhood, but, being lit up with variegated colours, gratified the eye. While, however, the general aspect of the interior is a matter of importance (as are to many visitors the refreshment tables, which, at appropriate or inappropriate moments, attract so many to the rear), of still greater importance is the programme, vocal and instrumental, provided by the Messrs Gatti for their exclusively musical patrons. About this feature of the entertainment anything like disappointment was unlikely, so long-experienced and distinguished a conductor as Signor Arditì being answerable for the result. Signor Arditì has engaged a company of instrumental performers of tried excellence—comprising sixteen first violins (Mr A. Burnett "leader," with Mr Viotti Collins at his side), twelve second violins (Mr Val Nicholson, principal), eight violas (Mr W. H. Hann, principal), nine violoncellos (Mr C. Ould, principal), ten double basses (Mr E. Ould, principal), and the usual complement of "wind," "brass," and percussion—such eminent professors as Messrs Svensden (flute), G. Horton (oboe), Lazarus (clarinet), W. B. Wotton (bassoon), C. Harper and J. W. Standen (horns), H. Reynolds, with three others (cornet and trumpet), W. Webster and T. Harvey (trombones), S. Hughes (ophicleide), Pheasant, Middleditch, Austin, and Orchard (instruments of percussion), and E. Lockwood (harp), representing their several departments, and supported by others quite equal to the task. There are eighty players in all, according to the printed catalogue of names. These, however, in the "Selection" and other special pieces, were reinforced by the fine band of the Coldstream Guards, under the direction of Mr Fred. Godfrey, which helps to complete the "one hundred performers" announced. The colossal structure representing the orchestra, occupying its customary place between area and stage, and looking as imposing as ever, could hardly be filled by a more thoroughly efficient body of musicians. The hearty and unanimous welcome accorded to Signor Arditì, on taking his place before the conductor's desk, marked the general esteem in which he is held; and the irreproachable execution of Mendelssohn's fiery overture to Ruy Blas (which followed the National Anthem) at once satisfied good judges as to the quality of the performers. This was further exemplified in music of quite a different character, by the genuine feeling which characterised the Larghetto in F major, from Spohr's Third Symphony (C minor), including that wonderfully expressive theme for violins, &c., on the fourth string, known and admired by connoisseurs. It is a genuine treat, now and then, to hear a specimen of Spohr's too-much neglected symphonic music; and this larghetto is one of the choicest specimens that could have been hit upon. The brilliant overture to Auber's opera, Marco Spada, in which the melodious charm of the second theme contrasts so happily with the always busy figure of the tartarella, was another ordeal from which Signor Arditì and his followers came forth with well deserved honours.

The remainder of the programme, though "miscellaneous," was distinguished by great variety of interest. The "selection," built upon prominent themes from Cinq-Mars (now playing at the Paris Opéra-Comique), was particularly welcome; and Signor Arditì, who has arranged it expressly for these concerts, may claim the credit of having introduced the first notes of M. Gounod's latest opera to an English public, just as some time ago he had introduced, under similar circumstances, the first notes of Verdi's Aida. A more effective potpourri of its kind could not easily have been contrived. Its performance not only called into requisition the band of the Coldstreams, but also the aid of skilful solo players, whose names in connection with their respective instruments it is unnecessary to recite again. We cannot pretend to offer any opinion about the absolute merits of M. Gounod's most recent effort with such assistance only as is obtained from a series of fragments, however ably put together. Enough that the audience, to judge by the applause, were evidently gratified. A new valse, entitled "Le Tortorelle," by Signor Arditì, lively and tuneful in itself, was given with such spirit by the orchestra, that a repetition was asked for and accorded; while, later on, a still livelier piece, from the same pen, called "The Drummer Boys' Polka," in which eight drummer boys belonging to the Coldstream Guards, headed by a very small drummer in plain clothes, who played with extraordinary vivacity, and was generally believed to be Master Luigi Arditì (a son of the composer), won a similar compliment. Among the singers were Signor Gianini (tenor), and Signor Medica (baritone), both favourably known last year, each of whom was called upon to repeat a solo—that of Signor Medica being "Di Provenza," from La Traviata, that of Signor Gianini the barcarole from the second act of Un Ballo in Maschera. Mdlle Giuditta Celega (her first appearance) sang "Quando a te liete" (Faust), and, though apparently nervous, pleased by a nice quality of voice and an unobtrusive manner. Mdlle Maria Derivis (another new comer), with a fresh soprano voice, already telling, but in need of further cultivation, made a favourable impression in "Ah! fors è lui" (La Traviata), and, being called for, returned and sang a French air in the popular Spanish rhythm, assisted by M. Marlois—again the able accompanist wherever the pianoforte is required for vocal solos. In the second part of the concert, Mdlle Derivis essayed the "Valse" from Gounod's Romeo et Juliette, which just now is a little beyond her powers. Nevertheless, this young lady exhibits decided promise, which depends chiefly upon her own assiduous perseverance to fulfil. Yet a third aspirant, Mdlle Lucia Rajmondi, also with a good soprano voice, and who in the first part joined Signor Gianini in a duet from Un Ballo in Maschera, winning general approval, and in the second attempted the famous Bolero from the Vespres Siciliennes, written by Verdi, more than twenty years ago, expressly for Sophie Cruvelli. This is an arduous piece for one whose experience has not yet ripened, and we should have preferred hearing Mdlle Rajmondi in something less ambitious. How many beautiful and less exacting things are at the immediate command of young and eager vocalists need hardly be insisted on.

The programme of this unusually varied entertainment also included solos for violin, pianoforte, and violoncello. The violinist was that young and graceful artist, Mdlle Pommereul, Belgian by birth, and promising to reflect credit upon the Belgian school, of which Vieuxtemps and Léonard are the acknowledged representatives. Mdlle Pommereul's execution is not only accurate and pure, it is prepossessing in the bargain—because, while playing with all needful expression, she seems wholly and solely absorbed in her music, never venturing upon the slightest evidence of self-assertion. As Mdlle Pommereul advances in years, her tone, already sweet and legitimately musical, will gain in fulness. We confess that we should have preferred hearing her in something of higher pretensions than M. Sarasate's fantasia, an air from Faust. Her performance, however, was so much to the taste of the audience (as it was to our own) that not to welcome the "encore," and a repetition of that part of the fantasia which begins from the waltz of the scene of the Kermesse, was out of the question. In short, we expect much—very much—from Mdlle Pommereul. The pianist was Mdlle Jane Debillemont, who, like her fair sister of the fiddle, had previously been heard in London. Mdlle Debillemont, who selected Chopin's Polonaise Brillante for the occasion, has an elastic touch, a full tone, and plays with considerable brilliancy. She was called back at the end of her performance. The violoncellist was M. Antoine Bouman, a musician attached to the service of the King of the Netherlands. Although this gentleman only came forward near the end of the second part, and his choice of a piece was the somewhat monotonous "Andante and Allegro" of Goltermann (accompanied, not with the orchestra, but on the pianoforte)—by his subdued playing, his legitimate tone and well-balanced phrasing, he entirely won the sympathies of the audience, and was re-called amid well-merited applause. Signor Arditì should on a future occasion allow this clever artist a fairer chance. Even after the violoncello solo there was another "encore," for the finale to the third act of Verdi's Ernani, in which the solos were allotted to Mdlles Rajmondi and Celega, Signors Gianini and Medica, the orchestra taking its accustomed part, strengthened by the band of the Coldstream Guards. The concert ended, characteristically enough, with a "Quick March," during the performance of which the musical section of the audience, fairly tired out—thanks to the repeated exercise of the assumed privilege of "encoring," a privilege which, we have repeatedly urged, cannot be too emphatically set at nought—dispersed as quickly as the measures of the march were redoubled.

On Wednesday night the first part of the concert was exclusively given to what is termed "classical" music. The orchestra played the overture to Cherubini's Anacreon, the scherzo from Mendelssohn's A Midsummer Night's Dream, the andante from Schubert's unfinished symphony, and Mozart's delicious E flat symphony (the 47th out of 49)—a splendid selection. Bravissimo illustrissimo Arditissimo! And all went to perfection. Mdlle Pommereul played Beethoven's Romance in F, on the violin (encored), Mdlle Debillemont, the pianist, giving the "Harmonious Blacksmith" (last number of Handel's Suite in E major), and a somewhat hackneyed gavotte by J. S. Bach (encored). Mdlle Derivis sang "Batti, batti," (violinello, Mr C. Ould), and Sig. Medica "Non più andrai"—the whole concluding with "See the conqu'ring hero comes," in which the regular orchestra was strengthened by the band of the Coldstreams.

ADELINA (AIDA) PATTI

(From the "Daily Telegraph," July, 1846.)

Whatever may be the fate of Aida in this country—and a more complete acquaintance with the work by no means disposes us to look upon it as an abiding attraction—the performance at Covent Garden will not, for more than one reason, soon pass from memory. Amateurs will speak of it years hence with the admiration due to a scenic magnificence of the highest order, pleasantly recalling picture after picture—each a work of art, and each the result of an endeavour, earnest if not always perfectly successful, to reproduce in the nineteenth century the life of a well-nigh pre-historic time. But they will speak of the Egyptian opera with equal frequency and greater emphasis because of its connection with one who, taken for all in all, must be regarded as the most accomplished artist upon the lyric stage of our day. We sometimes declaim, not without reason, against the domination of those who merely interpret great thoughts and act as the mouthpiece of genius. We object, naturally, to any exercise of power which subordinates the interests of art to private ends, and we demand that whatever is first in consequence shall be first considered. But while we ask for all this, and are quite right in doing so, it must not be forgotten that the mission of executive talent is both lofty and of vast importance. We may say this with reference to the concert-room, when the interpreter, having received into brain and heart the ideas of the composer, reproduces them instinct with a vitality partly derived from his own inner life. How much more may we say it in view of the lyric stage, where not only are musical thoughts and feelings expressed, but where the individuality to which they belong is created and offered to the judgment of both the senses and the intellect. Hardly inferior to the genius which invents is that which, under such conditions, reproduces; especially when, as sometimes happens, the one with commanding power improves upon and lifts to a higher rank the creation of the other. It is unnecessary to demonstrate this fact. The public, in all stages of artistic development, have practically recognised it, and, indeed, from public indulgence springs the power which artists—men and women—of like passions with ourselves—often exercise under the influence of narrow and selfish, rather than broad and generous, views. Having regard to these considerations, and to the position occupied by Madame Adelina Patti in connection with Signor Verdi's latest work, no apology can be necessary for dwelling, in a special manner, upon the merit of an assumption which, more than anything else, distinguishes the performance of the opera, and entitles it to a place on the tablets of memory.

In a former article we pointed out the fact that Signor Verdi and his librettist work together in striking unanimity for the purpose of keeping all their chief characters in an agony of passion. Their object is certainly attained with Aida, who, from first to last, knows no amount of repose, or even of relief from poignant distress caused by laceration of the most sensitive among human feelings. In the first act, Aida the slave finds a powerful and jealous rival in Amneris the Princess, while her love for Radames is pitted against that of kin and country. The second act witnesses the outrage of her affection by Amneris, the danger of her father, and the seeming death of all her hopes. Next she is compelled to betray the confidence of her lover by dread of the paternal curse, and lastly, with nothing for which to live, she voluntarily shares a fate her agency has in part entailed. Always, therefore, Aida is kept at the utmost stretch of painful emotion, without rest, or more than a doubtful prospect of relief. How much this increases the difficulty of the part must be obvious after a moment's thought. It is not alone that a strain hard to bear is imposed upon the physical powers, but also that the greatest tact and skill are required in order to avoid wearying the audience by monotony of circumstance and expression. The eye of the mind, like that of the body, is charmed by play of light and shade, and by gradation and contrast of colour, whereas in the absence of such things it tires, and is disposed to turn away. Giving due weight to these facts, we can better appreciate the result of Madame Patti's latest impersonation. Her Aida nowhere fatigues us, but sustains its interest to the end, though in less able hands the character would be as oppressive as one of those leaden skies which stretch, riftless, from zenith to horizon.

Madame Patti, it is true, cannot transform the character, but she accomplishes a still higher feat; taking the part as given to her, she contrives, by the power of her genius, so to present it that defects of construction are for the time concealed. This result, it should be observed, is not gained by any sacrifice of the original idea. The Aida of Madame Patti is the Aida of the story up or down to the severest stretch of passion. Nothing is shirked, but everything is ennobled by a dramatic instinct which, even amid the restraints of the lyric stage, gives the character a perfect command over the springs of our emotion. This general effect is, of course, due to a multitude of details, each deserving consideration. But it will suffice to indicate a few commanding situations wherein Madame Patti most powerfully demonstrates her surpassing gifts. We pass over the soliloquy wherein Aida expresses the conflict of her affections in view of the Ethiop war. Here the artist's success arises chiefly from singing which combines the highest vocal skill with profound natural expression; but, later on, when Amneris discovers Aida's love, and threatens vengeance, the dramatic artist comes to the front. It was a happy idea of the librettist to make the poor slave remember, under the taunts of her rival, that she, too, is of Royal rank, and Madame Patti makes the most of it. Her utterance of the words, "Mia rivale—Ebben sia pure—Anch'io—Son tal—" is a splendid outburst of pride and indignation, followed by a contrast which never fails to thrill the house. Shrinking from an avowal of her identity, Aida suddenly checks herself, and, falling at the feet of her mistress, exclaims, "Che dissi mai?—pietà! perdono!" Here we have a master-stroke of dramatic art, for in voice, bearing, or facial expression, the transformation is as swift and thorough as fancy can conceive. In the interview of Aida with Amonasro, Madame Patti again triumphs by means perfectly natural and highly artistic. For a time the Ethiop maiden resists her father's entreaty, but the extent of her love for him appears when her submission is demanded on pain of a curse. Aida yields at the sacrifice of her conscience and at the expense of her affection for Radames, but only after a struggle which Madame Patti makes obvious in all its intensity, and in all its stages up to the point of a terrible decision. The subsequent meeting of Aida and her lover, wherein it is her turn to play the part of tempter, and his to yield, exhibits art equally elaborate and perfect, earnestness in this case being accompanied, and its end almost condoned, by an intensity of affection that alone might make the pleader irresistible. Worthy of all that has gone before is the scene in the fatal dungeon, where Madame Patti, by art apparently simple, shows how love can conquer death, and make the victory seem the most natural thing in the world. No more touching display of pathos, powerful but unexaggerated, has been witnessed on the lyric or, for that matter, any other stage. It comes with the climax of the story, and it exemplifies the climax of art.

We have dwelt, all too briefly, upon Madame Patti's embodiment of Verdi's heroine, with no more than a casual glance at her vocal achievements. These, however, will be taken for granted, and need no setting forth. It may be urged that Madame Patti is not less famous for dramatic than musical skill; but, without disputing the assertion, we must insist that in Aida she has, as an actress, taken higher rank than ever, and achieved a success which will be remembered when, perhaps, the opera itself is little more than a name.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DR GRIPE.—On the contrary. We have the leaderette before us, cut from the Daily Telegraph of May 26. Here it is:—

"In his letter of Tuesday last our Paris Correspondent noticed the revival, at the Opéra-Comique, of Cendrillon with a success as great as that obtained years ago, 'before the artificial talent of contemporary composers had eclipsed the genuine musical genius of former masters.' There are four works in the repertory of lyric drama bearing the name of Cendrillon, and founded on the same story—that of Laruelle, produced at the Opéra-Comique in 1759; that of Steibelt, first played at St Petersburg in 1809; that of Nicolo Isouard, the composer of Joconde, brought out at the Théâtre Feydeau in 1810; and that of La Cenerentola by Rossini, heard first at Rome in 1817. We must conclude that the opera of Nicolo is the one referred to by our correspondent; and if so, the fact of its being received with so much favour by the Parisians, stands in marked contrast to the recent failure of Joconde amongst ourselves, and points to a reaction against the highly coloured effects of modern art. This is not the first time, however, that Cendrillon has been revived in the same theatre. It was played in 1845, with Mesdames Casimir and Darcier, M^{lle}. Grignon and St Fay in the cast, Adolphe Adam having first strengthened Nicolo's weak orchestra, and even added an air for the prima donna. If M. Carvalho has now produced the work as Nicolo left it, and that with success, its failure in 1845 may have been due to Adam's temerity in adapting the naïve favourite of one generation to the more vulgar taste of another."

Dr Gripe is perpetually confounding one French composer, before and during the period of Isouard, with another. It was Boieldieu, not Monsigny, who was alarmed at the success of Isouard; Monsigny, not Dalayrac, composed Le Déserteur; and Berton, not Bierrey, wrote Aline Reine de Golconde. Dr Gripe's letters are much too lengthy to print in extenso; but if he would send us one of reasonable proportions, we might possibly find space; for, errors notwithstanding, Dr Gripe has really something to say—which cannot be admitted of all our would-be correspondents.

SICUT VELUM.—We are at a loss to explain whence the original paragraph emanated. It had a sort of fountain-head odour about it.

OUR English musical critics are sad dogs. They either get a percentage on the percentage of the agents of prime donne, or they obtain it direct from the prime donne themselves. In either case they are sad dogs. Richard Wagner insinuated as much, so far back as 1855; and the charge has been reiterated over and over again. Only just now, a new prima donna has suffered materially because she declined to fee an agent, who was thus disabled from paying a critic—or critics—who helped that agent in his transactions. We pity the new prima donna for giving credit to such stupid nonsense, more especially as she has those about her who know better, and ought, as people of experience, honesty, and good faith, to have taught her better.

Our last experience of the conviction entertained among foreign artists, that the English critics are a set of unprincipled scoundrels, is in a letter addressed to the editor of a paper called The Adrian Times. We never heard of The Adrian Times before; but we have an idea that there is some such place as Adrian in Michigan (U.S.). Next week we shall print this letter, and the sensible comment on it made by the New York Music Trade Review, in their entirety. Mad. Florence Ricca Knox, who, on the 16th of April, made her début, in the Favorita, at the Royal Italian Opera, is the authoress. At present we only quote one passage:—

"I knew that the critics were there in full force, to tear me to pieces, first of all because I was an American (!) and a 'débutante,' and because the favour and praise of the English press had not been bought up. That species of blackmail is carried on here as elsewhere, I find, much to my sorrow."

We shall not comment upon this infamous calumny just now, but merely beg to call the attention of Mdme Florence Ricca Knox to the fact that Miss Kellogg, also an American, received in this country the cordial welcome due to her exceptional ability. And Mdme Albani?

If there was something like an esprit de corps among English critics, such grossly insulting libels to their disparagement would be impossible. But, unhappily, there is nothing of the kind; and of this artists, and occasionally managers, have endeavoured to make capital. A remarkable instance of this has occurred lately, into the particular details of which, however much against our inclination, we may be forced to enter.

SAMUEL TOPER TABLE.
(T....t.)

A SHORT time since, Herr Tappert* indited an attack in the Musik-Wochenblatt against Dr. Hanalick, with reference to Herr Wagner's now familiar "Letters to a Dressmaker." In an article on the Salzburg Musical Festival, Dr. Hanalick incidentally puffs out his assailant as follows:—

"But these chiefs of Associations have recently been fearfully enraged about the Dressmaker-Letters published by Spitzer in the

* Or "Tapper."

Neue freie Presse, in which letters 'the martyr and re-awakener of the German nation' draws his own portrait, with such sweet details, in pretty little white satin trowsers and a pink silk dressing gown. I perfectly understand these gentlemen's anger at such wonderfully curious revelations—but I fail to understand the impudence of calling to account one who has nothing at all to do with them—viz., myself. A Berlin teacher of the piano, Herr Tappert, affirms in the leading organ of the Wagnerian Inquisition that without my consent Herr Spitzer would not have been allowed to write these feuilletons. The editor of this paper will readily testify that I had not the slightest knowledge of the letters to 'Dear Miss Bertha' previous to their publication, and that—far from Vienna—I read them in the Neue freie Presse with as much astonishment as anyone else. But Herr Tappert is not content with merely inventing this flippant charge. Supposing, probably, that the 'Master' would feel better pleased that I should be sacrificed on the altar of the Future instead of Herr Spitzer, he let loose upon me all the scorn excited in him through 'dear Bertha.' He states that my opposition to the Music of the Future springs from a purely personal grudge, because, in May, 1861 (!), Wagner 'greeted me curtly, as he would have greeted a person utterly unknown to him.' No one in Vienna ventured, we are told, to revive Tristan, which had been laid aside because 'Herr R.' (Raymond?), 'the Hofrath, and the Imperial Chief Chamberlain were afraid' of me. But after Wagner adopted at an evening party a more friendly tone towards me, I met him, it is stated, with tears and sobs, and painfully avowed that I was misjudged by him. (How anything in my Wagner criticisms can be misjudged or misunderstood is certainly unintelligible.) Hereupon Wagner promised me 'his unconditional participation in my subsequent efforts' and—an order for the resumption of Tristan und Isolde at the Imperial Operahouse immediately followed! Such is the miserable old women's twaddle, bearing on each word the stamp of untruthfulness or impossibility, dished up for his Wagner Associations by Herr Tappert—who, by the way, is a perfect stranger to me—in order that he may be revenged—on Herr Spitzer and the Neue freie Presse. But let us get rid of this drivel which the black companions of the pink silk master squirt as far as these peaceful mountains. Let us bathe in the purifying spring of eternal beauty and music, clear as crystal, such as Mozart gives us!"

It is understood that Herr Rappert* is preparing an elaborate rejoinder to this spicy onslaught. D. J.

THE BARKER FUND.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—The result of the appeal made on behalf of Mr Barker, the inventor of the pneumatic action, having fallen somewhat short of the anticipations of the committee, they have determined to make a final effort to obtain additional funds before closing the list of subscriptions.

The committee feel sure that there are many musicians, both professional and amateur, who would gladly contribute towards this object, and that the absence of their names from the present list can only arise from want of knowledge of the urgency of the case. The committee venture, therefore, earnestly to press upon such of your readers as are interested in organ matters the desirability of their assisting as speedily as possible in efforts to procure a small annuity for this most deserving artist.

Subscriptions may be sent to the Hon. Treasurer, F. Davison, Esq., 24, Fitzroy Square, N.W.

(Signed), J. F. BRIDGE, Mus. Doc., F. DAVISON, Hon. Treas., H. Y. SMART, J. STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., E. H. TURPIN, Hon. Sec. Coll. Org., GEO. CARR, Hon. Sec. (Sub-Committee Barker Fund.)

MR JOHN SIMON.

In accordance with a resolution adopted at a recent meeting of the committee of the Simon Testimonial Fund, it is determined that the funds subscribed shall be spent in a bust of that gentleman, which will be placed in the hall of the Royal College of Surgeons. Mr Robert Lowe, who had presided at the meeting referred to, observed that there were no more valuable contributions to medical literature than the Reports Mr Simon had sent out to lighten the work of the medical profession. At the present moment he believed the value of those Reports was underestimated, but at some future time they would be properly regarded, and the nature and importance of their author's services more publicly acknowledged. It has been arranged that a small copy of the statue shall be presented to each subscriber of two guineas and upwards. Donations will be received by the honorary secretary, at 1, Adam Street, Adelphi; or at the bank of Messrs Roberts, Lubbock & Co., Lombard Street.

* Or "Rapper."

MDLLE TIETJENS.

The secretaries of the Leeds Musical Festival have received the following letter:—

"Her Majesty's Theatre, London, August 11th, 1877.

"DEAR SIRS,—I am very sorry to say that Mdlle Tietjens is not making the progress we had all wished. Her medical attendant, Dr Spencer Wells, up to last Saturday gave me full assurance that her services were to be relied upon. During the last three or four days, however, she has become much weaker, and feels she will be unable to undertake the engagement. She, therefore, desires me to write to you to request you will remove her name from the programme. I need scarcely say it causes her great sorrow in having to abandon all idea of singing, although she desires me to add, should any change take place for the better (as you have still six weeks before the Festival takes place), she would only be too delighted to be of any service to you.—I remain yours faithfully,

"J. H. MAPLESON.

"P.S.—On inquiry this morning, I have received the enclosed telegram from her medical attendant at Worthing, which I send for your information:—

"'Mdlle has passed a restless night, but is not in absolute pain. Has had no sickness. This morning she feels very weak.'"

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

MDLLE TIETJENS.—We regret to say that the health of Mdlle Tietjens has undergone no improvement. On Tuesday, at Worthing, she had to submit to another operation, which has left her naturally in a state of great exhaustion.—Times, Aug. 11.

THOUGH he himself commenced as an infant phenomenon, Mozart showed a marked dislike for the performances of immature artists. On one occasion a precocious boy played the piano to him. The great composer listened, but not without exhibiting, from time to time, signs of impatience. At length he said to the young virtuoso: "You are not without talent. Work, and you will obtain a high position."—"Ah! I should so like to compose!" exclaimed the boy. "Tell me, please, how I ought to set about it."—"In the first place, you must learn a great deal more and grow a little older. It will be time enough to begin composing when you have done that."—"But you composed when you were only thirteen," observed the boy.—"That is true," replied Mozart, smiling. "But then I did not ask anyone how I ought to begin."

A SHORT time since an individual requested an interview with the manager of the Grand Opera, Paris. On being admitted, he said: "Sir, I am a professor of living languages. I speak English, German, Spanish, Italian, Russian, Hungarian, Wallachian, Roumanian, Turkish, Slavonic, Arabic, Swedish, Norwegian, and a little Chinese. I am completing my course of the last language. Here are the certificates given me by the professors of the Collège de France, and certifying that I am no impostor. Despite all I know, however, I am starving. You can save me. Engage me at your theatre as interpreter. People from all parts of the globe come to see M. Garnier's new house. You have frequently a difficulty in understanding foreigners in your box-office and at the pay-places. Accept my services, and all this will be avoided." M. Halanzier at once engaged his visitor.

WHEN directing recently his concerts at the Albert Hall, Wagner took a strange delight in getting up conversations with those near him. At the last concert, during a by no means easy piece from Tristan und Isolde, he chose as the recipient of his utterances Herr Tombo, the harpist from Munich. But that gentleman did not appear particularly inclined to reply. At length, in answer to an oft repeated question of Wagner's, he rose and said: Seven— please do not talk to me—eight—for I cannot reply—nine—I've seventeen bars' rest—ten—or I shall mull the whole thing." Hereupon Wagner made a low bow, and counted the remainder of the eventful seventeen bars with his neighbour. The upshot was that Herr Tombo got triumphantly over the seventeen bars' rest, and Wagner gave him a friendly shake of the hand.

THE oldest of existing Conservatories of Music is the School at Palermo, founded in 1747. Then come in the order of their respective dates: The Conservatory of Paris, 1795; the Liceo di Bologna, 1798; the Conservatories of Naples, 1806; of Milan, 1808; of Prague, 1810; of Parma, 1825; of Madrid, 1831; of Brussels, 1832; of Leipsic, 1843; of Berlin, 1850; of Cologne, 1850; the Musical Institute of Florence, established in 1860, and opened in 1862; the Conservatories of St Petersburg, 1862; and of Moscow, 1866. More recently founded were the Conservatories or Schools of Music at Vienna, Warsaw, Buenos Ayres, and the Liceo Marcelllo, at Venice.

MAD. ADELINA PATTI.—Having, through her agent, Sig. Franchi, paid M. Léon Escudier the "débit" of 100,000 francs, as agreed upon should she be disabled from fulfilling her engagement with that impresario, it seems evident that she will not appear during the forthcoming season at the Théâtre-Ventadour. On the other hand, should circumstances be modified, she can only sing at the Italian Opera; so that, in any case, M. Escudier may congratulate himself on having made an excellent bargain. According to the generally well-informed Ménestrel (which is at variance with Galignani), Mad. Patti, for the present, abandons the idea of visiting the United States. There is, in other quarters, some talk of a winter series of performances in the principal Scandinavian towns, to precede those for which she has already stipulated in the Austrian capital. One thing is, however, certain—that she will be one of the company at the Royal Italian Opera next year.—Graphic.

AMONG recent deaths announced by foreign journals are those of Mad. Montessu (Asnières), one of the most famous operatic dancers when "ballet of action" was in its prime, and the original of Hérold's Sonnambule; Auguste Pilate (Hospital St Louis, Paris), for many years chef-d'orchestre at the Porte Saint-Martin, a composer of some distinction, who assisted M. Flotow in his four-act opera, the Naufrage de la Méduse, and, in 1837, wrote music to the King of the Danube, for our London Adelphi; Warot, father of the well-known Belgian tenor of that name (Bois des Colombes), composer, conductor, actor, and singer in one, whose works comprise examples of every style, instrumental as well as vocal; and Giuseppe-Maria Luzzi (Naples), for many years impresario of the San Carlino, a theatre in which the old Neapolitan style of comedy has always found a home.

THE new opera of M. Camille Saint-Saëns, called Etienne Marcel, will not be brought out in Paris, as had been expected, but at Lyons, next winter. If we may judge from the impression created by the Timbale d'Argent, M. de Saint-Saëns' most recent dramatic work, the Parisians are not greatly to be commiserated. Without a shadow of Wagner's genius, this newly extolled French composer becomes day after day more hopelessly Wagnerian.

CHERUBINO informs his readers, in to-day's Figaro, that "Mr Weist Hill has declined the offer made him by Mr Mapleson, to conduct a series of promenade concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre." From the same authority, however, we learn that Mr Weist Hill has consented to direct a series of orchestral concerts which Mdme Viard-Louis intends giving, early next spring, at St James's Hall. Mdme Viard-Louis could not well be in abler or more zealous hands.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—Miss Florence Sanders (Mr W. H. Holmes's highly gifted pupil) was pianist at the Alexandra Palace "classical concert" on Friday, Aug. 10. Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, selected by the young artist for the occasion, was played in a style which showed the pupil to be worthy a master who has few equals. On Saturday, Aug. 11, Miss Carina Clelland (re-called after "Casta Diva"), Miss Marion Severn, and Mr Sidney were the vocalists. The band, under the direction of Mr Weist Hill, played, among other pieces, the Overture to Guillaume Tell splendidly. The concert-hall was crowded.

August—August—August!

(From our Monthly Collector.)

August is remarkable for the following events in connection with music. The 3rd August recalls to mind the death of the Padre Giambattista Martini, Bologna, 1784—the first performance of Rossini's Guillaume Tell, in 1829, at the Grand Opera, Paris—and the inauguration of the Teatro alla Scala, Milan, in 1778, with Salieri's opera, Europa riconosciuta; the 4th, foundation of the National Institute of Paris, in 1795, thanks to the exertions of Sarrette; the 5th, death of Nicola Vaccai, Pesaro, 1848—birth of Ambroise Thomas, at Metz, 1811; the 7th, first performance of three oratorios in one, Putifar, Giuseppe e Giacobbe, by Pietro Raimondi, Teatro Argentino, Rome, 1852; the 8th, death of Carl Heinrich Graun, Berlin, 1759; the 10th, death of Hippolyte Monpou, Orleans, 1841—inauguration of the statue of Lesueur, Abbeville, 1832; the 12th, inauguration of the Beethoven Monument, Bonn, 1845—death of Giovanni Gabrieli, Venice, 1613; the 13th, death of Francesco Durante, Naples, 1755—death of Bernard Romberg, Hamburg, 1841—death of Giovanni Battista Ferrari, Venice, 1845; the 16th, birth of Gioachino Selvestro Serrao, Setubal (Portugal), 1801—first performance of Verdi's Aroldo, Teatro Nuovo, Rimini, 1857; the 17th, death of Lorenzo da Ponte, melodramatic writer, and author of the books of Don Giovanni and Le Nozze di Figaro, New York, 1838; the 17th, death of Giuseppe Scarlatti, Vienna, 1777; the 18th, death of P. Lichtenthal, Milan, 1853; the 19th, birth of Antonio Salieri, Legnago, 1750—birth of Nicolo Porpora, Naples, 1686; the 20th, first performance of Rossini's Comte Ory, at the Théâtre de l'Opera, Paris, 1828; the 21st, death of P. G. Lindpaintner, Nonnenhorn, 1850—inauguration of the Teatro della Canobbiana, Milan, with Salieri's opera, La Fiera di Venezia, 1779—death of Emanuele Astorga, Bohemia, 1736—inscription in honour of Rossini placed over the door of the Liceo Musicale, Bologna, and the substitution of his name for that previously borne by the adjacent square, 1864—inauguration of a bronze statue of Rossini, Pesaro, 1864—funeral solemnities in honour of Rossini—execution of Cherubini's Messa per Defunti, Pesaro, 1869; the 22nd, death of Luca Marenzio, Rome, 1599; the 24th, death of Claudio Goudimel, Palestrina's master, Lyons, 1572; the 25th, death of Nicola Jommelli, Naples, 1774—first performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah, Birmingham, 1846; the 27th, death of Josquin Desprès, Condé, 1521; the 28th, first performance of R. Wagner's Lohengrin, Weimar, 1850—death of Antonio Caldara, Venice, 1763; the 29th, first performance of Sir Michael Costa's Eli, Birmingham, 1855—death of Félicien David, Saint-Germain en Laye (near Paris), 1876; the 30th, birth of Bonifazio Asioli, Correggio, 1769—first performance of Ponchielli's Promessi Sposi, Cremona, 1856; the 31st, death of André Philidor, London, 1795—first performance of F. Liszt's Messa solenne di Gran, Gran, 1856.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From our Correspondent.)

Paul et Virginie has proved a great success. Since its first performance, on July 21st, all the artists have much improved, and all goes well with the "sad tale of our childhood!" La Favorite, Faust, Trouvère, Robert le Diable, and the ever adolescent Fille de Madame Angot, have also been given at the Salle Monsigny, which has been entirely re-decorated. M. Froment has begun his season well. He has a large troupe of artists and plenty of resources; hence his success.

Boulogne is very attractive this year in the way of amusements. We have some visitors, but not so many as we could put up with; whether this is the result of some badly informed, or malicious correspondents to some English journals, I know not. All I know is that, during the last twelve years, the death rate is lower than at many English watering-places. The drainage question has been a subject of discussion ever since the creation of the town, or since B.C. 55, when Cæsar sailed from Portus Itius, as he calls the formerly-named Gesoriacus—which, translated from the Celtic, means: "ges," a wood, "or," country, "iach," healthy—in other words, a "healthy wooded country."*

I think Cæsar might have drained it then in the same way that the inhabitants drain their visitors now—a-days—or, as Cæsar drained the people of Cornwall—viz., of their tin. But, drains and joking apart, Boulogne must be healthy, or why should so many of those hard-working people, who play to please others, and on whose perfect health "in wind and limb" depends their bread, always frequent Boulogne? I mean that, despite our usual number of general visitors, we have our usual influx of artists—vocal, instrumental, &c.—this year. In fact, at the present time, more than usual.

I may conclude by stating the number of attractions to which I have alluded: Grand Circus Cottrelly, with the usual ring, sawdust, and merry clowns (the latter very good), and the usual vaulting through hoops and haute école business, not to mention an ancient elephant, a camel, two antelopes, and dogs. Grand Menagerie, where a Mme Pezon, who has assumed the management since her late husband departed this natural life in the clutch of a lion, and who, nevertheless, nightly puts her head into the jaws of the same king of the forest.

Last, not least, the Fair; with all the fun of the same, including a very good conjuror, Marcketti, by name; panorama; and some 250 shops, where you can purchase anything you may wish for, even Turkish sweetmeats or Russian leather purses; and games of chance and merry-go-rounds, where you can gamble, or gambol, or grumble, as you wish.

Prospective affairs:—Concert at the Etablissement, on Saturday, 11th, at which Mlle Boulanger (violinist), M. Nathan (violin-cello), M. Magnus (pianist), and a soprano and tenor from Paris, will appear. Grands Saluts, at St Nicholas, 11th, 12th, 13th. Races on 29th and 30th.

Boulogne-sur-Mer, 8th Aug., 1877.

MRS GEORGE MARCH (VIRGINIA GABRIEL).

In being driven down Grosvenor Place in her Victoria, on Saturday week last, the horse suddenly took fright, bolted, and became perfectly unmanageable until it reached the end of Lower Belgrave Street, where the carriage gave a lurch, which hurled the lady head foremost on to the road. She was at once placed in a cab and conveyed to St George's Hospital, when it was ascertained that her skull was fractured. The unfortunate lady lingered until Tuesday week, Aug. 7th, and then died.

Poor Virginia Gabriel! What a sad, untimely end to have come to at the age of 52, surrounded by all the influences of life that make it enjoyable. Her career must have been a pleasant and happy one—of good birth; a daughter of General Gabriel of H.M.S.; handsome in person; winning and attractive in manner; popular in society; in an influential position of life; with a rare talent for a woman as a musical composer; a fluent vein of melody in her nature. A clever musician, having studied under Molique for Harmony, she had many successes with the numerous songs she composed and published. Although she was independent in worldly means, she derived a large income from royalties on her works. In addition to her smaller efforts she composed two cantatas for voices and orchestra, which were publicly performed and met with success. She will be sadly missed in society, where the halo of her presence always constituted a charm. And thus it is—"A little sorrow and a little pleasure

Fate metes us from the dusty measure
That holds the date of all of us.
We are born with travail and strong crying,
And from the birthday to the dying,
The likeness of our life is thus."

MUSIC AT THE ANTIPODES.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Mr Lyster's Royal English and Opera-Bouffe Company is again at the Prince of Wales's. There is a galaxy of favourites. Mr and Mrs Bracy (Miss Clara Thompson), returned from California, were warmly received at the Operahouse. In addition to these popular artists, Miss Catherine Lewis continues her engagement with Mr Lyster. The "stars" also include Miss Lambert (a young lady of essentially Australian education), Messrs Templeton, Annie Beaumont, and George Leopold. The last-named does the comic business, and always well. Mr Beaumont, the first tenor, has been compared to Mr Sims Reeves; but, perhaps, this has been some of that Australian "blow," which Anthony Trollope has found to be a characteristic of the people of this colony. The pieces so far produced have been La Fille de Mme Angot, Giroflé-Girofla, La Pêrhole, Maritana, and La Grande Duchesse. Since the 4th inst., Mr J. Levey, the cornet player, has been performing twice each evening at the Operahouse. Lazar's Italian Opera Company returned from Adelaide, on the 1st inst., and appeared the next night in a concert at the Melbourne Town Hall. On the 2nd inst. the company appeared in Il Trovatore. The same evening they left for Sydney. Mrs Howitz, a young lady who has created a favourable impression in the concert-room, is announced to make her début shortly in opera as Maritana. Simonsen's English Opera Company are now performing at St George's Hall, and have already produced Martha, Satanella, and (for the first time in Melbourne) The Hermit's Bell. J. T. L. F.

LETTERS FROM BAYREUTH.†

(From the "Sunday Times.")

The Wagner Festival is over, but still there are more Wagner concerts to come: the Wagner sensation has subsided, and yet Wagner is all the talk of the town; we live, so to speak, in a Wagnerian atmosphere (no allusion to the biting East winds intended), and acknowledge the sway of the despot of Bayreuth. The man who fails to comprehend the dire significance of the "Purely Human" writes himself down an ass; as does he likewise who professes ignorance of the "homogeneity of the lyric drama," the relation of leit motives to the Art-work of the Future, or the bearings of the ancient myth upon Stage-Festival-Plays. It is the fashion to affect Wagnerism, and not to know something about "the man, don't you know, who writes music without any tune—but awfully quite too jolly, give you my word!" would be voted the worst possible "form" by our gilded youth. In fact, a gigantic bubble has been blown, and all the world gapes at it, as it shines in the unexpected light of popularity, and thus will they gaze and admire until it bursts and disappears from sight. Meanwhile, those who would keep pace with the times, and would know something of the matter, could do no better than to dip into the pages of Mr Joseph Bennett's Letters from Bayreuth, contributed last year to the columns of a daily contemporary, and now published in a collated form by Messrs Novello & Co. Here is a close and concise history of the whole of the Nibelungen Ring business, from the evolution of the theory from the Prophet's "inner consciousness" to its practical presentation at Bayreuth during the Festival; and it is a matter for congratulation that these records have been preserved, for, although the author is most modest in his pretensions, and albeit these letters were penned in the hot haste demanded by modern journalism, they contain most valuable criticism, searching analysis, and a grasp of subject such as are to be found in very few contemporary writings. Apart from the critical faculty possessed in so eminent a degree by Mr Bennett, and which is so ably displayed in these essays, the Letters from Bayreuth have an additional value from being written in terse, healthy, vigorous English, marked here and there by a subtle touch of humour of the keenest description. Eminently readable as these pages are, it must not be inferred that they belong to that class of light literature which dallies with a subject in the bright but ephemeral manner often mistaken for criticism. Mr Bennett's work has a higher mission to fulfil, and is in the main a serious and thoughtful disquisition upon the vexed subject of Wagner's theories and their method of tangible presentation. Permitting himself to be biased by no extraneous influence, such as a love for formulated music, a taste for opera as at present known, or a leaning towards the delightful art of the vocalist, the author gives both theory and practice the benefit of an impartial judgment, admitting readily the salient features of the new doctrine, but dealing unhesitatingly with its shortcomings. English writers have of late given us so little in the way of exhaustive criticism, that Mr Bennett's book will be all the more welcome; under any circumstances, however, a very high place amongst artistic efforts would be justly its due. In his preface he states that the letters, written from day to day during the performance of Der Ring des Nibelungen, have not been retouched, "and are, therefore, a statement of first impressions which, however erroneous, may at least claim the merit of genuineness." Notwithstanding this depreciation, there is nothing crude or unformed about the opinions expressed; rather do they appear the result of careful research and close application than the hasty jottings of one who writes, so to speak, against time.

But it is time that we quitted this preamble and took a glance at the book. The introductory letter not only anticipates the Festival and gives some particulars of the manner in which the Nibelungen Ring grew from its nucleus, Siegfried's Tod, but takes a comprehensive view of the principles which guide the Futurist in his search after highest art. A few extracts will show how Mr Bennett approached his task:—

"First of all it is necessary to clear the ground of a notion that the Nibelungen 'stage plays' make any pretensions to be regarded as operas—in other words, that, appertaining to the same class as Don Giovanni and Fidelio, they invite judgment as an advance upon those masterpieces. If it can be established that no such pretensions are raised—that, in point of fact, Wagner now brings forward a new thing, to be estimated for itself alone, and not by comparison—a huge difficulty is at once removed, and the question becomes liberated from a great deal of encumbering matter.

The result is that, while we are entitled to reject the music-drama if it do not satisfy us, we are debarred from abusing it because it fails to coincide with something else. For my own part I gladly recognise the distinctions Wagner lays down. It enables me to approach the Nibelungen dramas as M. Ollivier went into the German war—with a light heart, and to accept them, if I must, without violence to the affection entertained for other things, seeing in the art-work they illustrate an addition to sources of pleasure, not a substitute for any of them."

It must be borne in mind, however, that these words were penned before the occurrence of the Bayreuth Festival. We now pass to the description of the Festival and its surroundings. Of Das Rheingold Mr Bennett says:—

"Wagner tells us that the true materials for a national music-drama lie here. If so, I can only marvel that pantomime-writers have been so long unconsciously hovering on the verge of a great discovery."

In the following words are the impressions produced by the music epitomised:—

"We have, in Rheingold the continuous flow of formless music, the vocal phrases supposed to grow naturally out of the verse, the characteristic motivo associated with each personage, and the rich orchestration that never ceases to pour over the whole a flood of musical colour. Each of these features produces its own result. The formless music streams along the mind, so to speak, without passing into it. Speaking generally, we are not drawn to a consciousness of its presence, since it offers but little of an intelligible character to lay hold of. That it works upon the emotions in harmony with the drama—assuming that such a fantastic story touches us at all—cannot be denied. Wagner's music intensifies the poetic beauty of his dramatic subject when beautiful, and makes its ugliness more pronounced when ugly."

It has been frequently said that Wagner, an unsympathetic and unskillful writer for voices, would do well to abandon them altogether or to relegate them to a task like that of the actors in the old melodramas, whose blood-and-thunder sentiments were "spoken through music." And so, apparently thinks Mr Bennett, who writes as follows about Die Walküre:—

"A word for the orchestral writing must be added, because in it lay the greatest source of pleasure. So rich and satisfying were the instrumental passages in the scenes where Wagner's theory allowed him to produce beauty that the ear resented the intrusion of the voices as an offence. 'Let the orchestra alone' was the instinctive command to the actors. Need this have been the case? Is the negation of vocal charm a necessity of the system? We truly hope not—of this system or of any other; should it indeed be so, we may expect our stage-musical-drama actors to cultivate Punch's art, and gain in penetrating power what they lack in 'vocal charm.'

† Letters from Bayreuth, Descriptive and Critical, of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen," with an Appendix. By Joseph Bennett. London: Novello, Ewer and Co.

We pass over the details of the plots of the various concomitant plays for the simple reason that we have already been at great pains to relate them fully. Mr Bennett regards Die Walküre as superior in merit to Siegfried, though he says of the second act of the latter that it is "recognised as a masterpiece of compound art—a grand addition to the world's store of beauty." Without the music serving to express the abounding life of Siegfried the drama becomes "wonderfully clever as a piece of musical mosaic, and fertile in resource of expression;" but "no pleasure is given to the listener who cannot find all his interest excited by the verses and incidents with which it is connected." Of Die Götterdämmerung our author says:—

"The story of the Götterdämmerung is one which Verdi might have set to music, so rapidly do the situations follow each other, so intense is their dramatic interest, and so great are the opportunities for the effects which modern opera loses. By comparison, the earlier sections of Der Ring des Nibelungen are merely dialogues with an orchestral accompaniment; whereas here we have a libretto closely approaching the generally accepted model."

Götterdämmerung, however, is placed third on the list in point of artistic excellence; Die Walküre and Siegfried being first and second, and Rheingold last. For the masterly manner in which Mr Bennett sums up the case and delivers his judgment thereon, we must refer our readers to the "booklet" itself; there is much agreeable material to repay its perusal, and, if we mistake not, Letters from Bayreuth, notwithstanding the circumstances under which they were penned, will be sure to be regarded as standard productions. The writer also has something good to say about the town of Hans Sachs, the Birthplace of Mozart, Three Famous Graves (of Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert), and A Supper with Wagner.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.

The contest between the bands and choirs of schools, under the superintendence of the Local Government Board, took place with great success on Wednesday last. Cornets, with all recent improvements, as well as a euphonium and a trombone (ranging in value from 15 to 12 guineas), were given as band prizes by Messrs F. Beason & Co. and Mr W. Hillyard, and these were supplemented by purses of money offered by the lessees of the Alexandra Palace and the chaplain to the Strand Union Schools, together with a gold-mounted bâton to Mr T. Graham, bandmaster of the Milton Schools, Portsmouth, for having sent the greatest number of boys (thirty) into the army and navy since the last competition. The prizes for the school choirs comprised purses of 15 and 10 guineas, presented by Sir Frederic Fitzwygram, Bart., and 5 guineas by the lessees. Eight bands competed. The boys, whose ages vary from 8 to 14, performed successively in the Central Hall, each band playing a quick march of its own selection and a contest piece, with solos, from Balfe's Bohemian Girl, specially arranged by Mr R. Wheatley, to whom all the arrangements were confided, and who acted as one of the judges. Both the instrumental and choral performances were of real excellence. The competition was very close, and resulted in the award of the following band prizes:—1. Strand Union School, Edmonton. 2. St Pancras School, Levensden. 3. West London District School, Ashford. 4. St Mary's Orphanage, North Hyde, Hounslow. 5. "Exmouth" Training Ship. 6. Milton Schools, Portsmouth. The singing prizes were awarded to the best of the six competing choirs, as follows:—1. St Mary's Orphanage. 2. Milton Schools, Portsmouth. 3. South Metropolitan Schools, Sutton. In presenting the prizes to the band and choirmasters, Sir F. Fitzwygram expressed his gratification at the success of the competition, and his intention to give similar prizes in the next competition.

HALEVY'S L'Eclair and Boieldieu's La Dame Blanche are both in preparation for the re-opening of the Opéra-Comique, Paris.

WAIFS.

MAD. ADELINA PATTI will not sing this year in Paris; nor has any arrangement been concluded about her visit to America. Mr Gye, however, has secured her services for next year at the Royal Italian Opera.

WE regret to learn that Mr Gye, since the closing of the Royal Italian Opera, has been seriously indisposed.

MR H. JARRETT, of Her Majesty's Theatre, has gone for a short holiday to Switzerland.

Sig. Bottesini has been playing at the Politeama, Rome.

Wagner recently paid a visit to the Grand-Duke at Weimar.

Sig. Gayarre made a short stay in Milan after leaving London.

Mad. Ethelka Gerster and her husband, Sig. Gardini, are in Paris.

Mdlle Albani has been stopping at Spa—simply to drink the waters.

The Royal Operahouse, Berlin, will re-open on the 23rd inst. with Lohengrin.

Mdlle Heilbron is at Trouville, where she will remain till the end of the month.

Herr Wirsing has retired from the management of the Czech Theatre, Prague.

An opera, Wanda, by a Czech composer, M. Dvorzak, has been produced at Prague.

Twenty-nine theatres in Italy are still without managers for the next Carnival season.

The Italian operatic company under Sig. Ferrari has left Buenos Ayres for Rio Janeiro.

Gounod's Cinq-Mars will be produced next season at the Imperial Theatre, St Petersburg.

Madame Rose Hersee is announced to sing at the Brighton Aquarium Concert to-day.

In 1857, there were only 57 dramatic companies in Italy. At present there are about 100.

M. Leo Delibes has been created a knight, and M. Gounod a commander, of the Legion of Honour.

Flotow, the composer, has disposed of his estate at Reichenau, and now resides at his villa in Mecklenburg.

The Franco-Belgian operatic company, who have been singing at Valparaiso and Santiago, are now at Lima.

Portions of Wagner's Nibelungen Tetralogical Trilogy are to be given next season at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels.

Members of the English colony at St Petersburg have arranged private theatricals for the benefit of the Russian wounded.

Mdlle Marimon will sustain the principal female character in La Chef d'Or at the Théâtre-Lyrique. Mdlle Salla has succeeded.

The duty on pianofortes has been raised to 100 roubles by Russia. The German manufacturers will be the greatest sufferers.

Mr Carl Rosa and his opera company remain in Dublin till the end of next week. We understand they are doing excellent business.

The rehearsals of Fandango, the new ballet by MM. Meilhac, Halévy, and Salvayre, commenced at the Grand Opéra, Paris, last week.

We are glad to hear that Auber's charming pastoral opera, Le Philtre is about to be revived in Brussels, at the Théâtre de la Monnaie.

The Paris Opéra-Comique will re-open with L'Eclair. This will be followed by La Dame Blanche, for the débuts of M. Engel and Mdlle Ploux.

The net receipts of the late Spohr Festival at Cassel amounted to 2,900 marks. Herr Joachim, in consequence of Mad. Joachim's illness, could not appear.

Herr Lauterbach is slowly recovering from the effects of his accident in the Alps. There are hopes that he may not have to undergo amputation of any kind.

Herr Albert Hahn, editor of the Tonkunst, has left Berlin and again settled at Königsberg, to resume his duties as teacher of music, while still carrying on his paper.

The Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, will re-open early in September with Les Huguenots. Miss Minnie Hauk makes her début shortly afterwards in Faust.

The revival of Halévy's La Reine de Chypre, at the Grand Opéra, Paris, on the 6th inst., can only be recorded as a succès d'estime. A vast deal of money has been wasted on it.

According to report, Sig. Merelli will give M. Ambroise Thomas's Amleto and Sig. Böito's Mefistofele during the approaching Italian season at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna.

A bust of Chopin, by Mad. Beaumont-Castries, now exhibited in Paris, represents the composer on his death-bed, with closed eyes. The likeness is considered successful.

At the début of the great Lablache one of the audience remarked that in future no one ought to be astonished at anything, since they had just heard Heaven's thunder turned into a singing bass.

Sig. Giacomo de Angelo Levi has presented 500 pieces of music to the Liceo Benedetto Marcello, Venice. The collection includes the overtures and symphonies (in score and parts) of Beethoven and Mozart.

Previously to his leaving Munich to enter on his functions as Capellmeister at the Theatre Royal, Dresden, the University of the former capital conferred on Herr Willner the degree of Doctor, "honoris causa."

Mlle Mahlknecht, formerly prima donna of the Leipsic Theatre, and now occupying the same position at Hamburg, is about to marry Herr Albert Payne, member of the well-known publishing firm in Leipsic.

For the present the idea of holding premenade concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre seems to be in abeyance; but in place of them, we understand, Italian operatic performances at moderate prices are to be instituted. We shall see.

The Woltersdorff-Theater, Berlin, has been taken by Herr Carl Soherbarth, who will open it on the 15th September. His intention is to play old operas, such as Adler's Horst, Le Val d'Andorre, La Fiancée, &c. (Why not Le Philtre?—D. P.)

M. Ambroise Thomas is busy at Argenteuil, where he has a country seat, putting the finishing touches to his Francesca di Rimini, and composing ballet-music for that long-expected work, as well as for his last projected opera, Psyché.

Mr and Mrs German Reed have been giving their entertainment, (assisted by Messrs Corney Grain, Alfred Reed, Arthur Law, Misses Fanny Holland and Leonora Braham) in the banqueting room of the Royal Pavilion, Brighton, during the week.

Dr Hans von Bülow has accepted the post of conductor at the Glasgow autumn and winter Subscription Concerts, in place of Mr Arthur S. Sullivan, who has resigned. Tout est pour le mieux (dans ces meilleurs des concerts possibles); we doubt, nevertheless, if the change will be advantageous.—Graphic.

Mdme Rosa Csillag, once, at Vienna (1852-3), the rival of Mlle Tietjens, and remembered by frequenters of Mr Gye's theatre in Fidelio, Orphée (Gluck) and other operas, is now established as a professor of singing and declamation at the Vienna Conservatory.

The idea of Mlle Tietjens appearing at either the Gloucester or the Leeds Festival is, according to recent information, not for a moment to be entertained. She has had a relapse, and a fresh operation. We regret to impart such bad news to her many admirers among the English public; but it is of no use concealing the truth. A week since there appeared to be some prospect of amendment; but this is proved to be illusory. Mlle Tietjens remains at Worthing, there being little chance just now of her being removed to her home in St John's Wood.—(See another page.)

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

NEW PIANOFORTE PIECE BY MADAME OURY. "CONSOLATION."

Easy of execution, but melodious and effective. Price 4s.; Half-price Cash or Stamps.

"We wonder who has not, in the hour of trouble, more than once derived comfort from the sweet sounds such as David must have used to mollify the troubled spirit of Saul. What better name, then, to give a graceful strain of peaceful melody, such as must convey to the sorrowing heart feelings of rest and sympathy, than 'Consolation'? Such is the title of a charming new pianoforte composition by that indefatigable and prolific writer, Mdme Oury; prolific indeed, for the piece bears no lower an Opus number than 185. Its flow of peaceful melody, enhanced by the delicacy and variety of the accompaniment, and harmonised in the masterly style of an experienced writer, well fulfils the object of the title. In every sense of the word is 'Consolation' an admirable piece of music, and it must rank among Mdme Oury's best efforts of the kind. As a morceau de salon it is of moderate difficulty, and of sufficient brilliancy to display the capacities of a proficient performer. The composition is dedicated to Mrs Graver-Browne, of Morley Hall, and published by Messrs Paterson & Sons, of Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c."

MYNYDDOG.

"A fellow of infinite jest."

Falsity in an epitaph, be it never so absurd, is readily pardoned if dictated by affection. Few have the heart to speak or write harshly of the immediate dead, and eulogy over the newly occupied grave is an act of grace becoming one destined soon to be a fellow-dweller.* Seldom, however, do funeral orations find an echo; generally they fall like "earth to earth," and are buried with the object of their sorrowful adulation. Not so the words of Mr T. E. Lloyd and Mr D. Davies at the Llandysul Eisteddfod, on the death of Mynyddog, quoted in your sympathetic article in a late number of the Musical World. The respectful sorrow uttered by those gentlemen finds response in the hearts of all Welshmen not bigots; for the missed and lamented one, cut down in his prime, was perhaps the best known and most popular man in the Principality. Your English readers may ask "Who is this great man that has fallen?" He was neither great nor anyway noble, but a simple yeoman who secured the affection of his countrymen. Mr Richard Davies, better known by his bardic name, Mynyddog, was a farmer at Cemmes, Montgomeryshire, who quitted his plough for the more attractive, if not more remunerative, occupation of public entertainer and singer. It was not until he had reached middle life that his talents were discovered, when at a bound he became chief Eisteddfod conductor, and the most notable song writer and vocalist of his class. Possessing a commanding stature, a cool brain, ready tongue, and powerful voice, he moved and spoke on the platform as one having authority; and to Englishmen, perplexed by Celtic phrensy and strange crazes, he appeared the unraveller of mysteries. Retaining the quiet traits of the yeoman, and never assuming the swaggering dignity of the professional, he travelled from town to village, from one end of the country to the other, and was everywhere received, by high and low, more as a friend than as a rhyming songster. His popularity was scarcely caused by the quality of his voice, which was twangy and less melodious than many; nor by his piano playing, which was of the "tum-tum" order; neither were his tunes above commonplace; nor was his poetry of an elevated character. But he had wit that was electric; a wit that could set a thousand stolid faces into grinning motion, kindle in each eye a sympathetic spark, and call forth from tired throats redoubled peals of laughter. It was wit that knew no bitterness and scorned the aid of coarseness; wit inclined to virtue, that knew not scoffing; wit that invested common objects with a fresh interest, and never turned goodness into contempt; wit that saw the comic side of things, without vice, spleen, or spite; wit, in his native language, like flint to steel—which cannot meet without a flash.

Mynyddog fed the Welsh folk with jokes. The Celt hungers for amusement as much as the Saxon. The latter has, perhaps, the more robust appetite, and it is certain has more to gratify it. The Welshman has no theatre; the drama has never taken root in the Principality. Mimic life has been allotted to the cities of the plains. But amusement of some sort must be got, to season the insipid food of everyday life, and at times will be sought for, though death and retribution stand in the way. To those, called Fortune's favourites, who make pleasure the business of their lives, the Welshman's amusements seem poor and mean. Still they are enjoyed with a surprising zest. Mynyddog's conceits were invariably relished. The Welsh miner, after long hours' imprisonment in the dark bowels of the earth, if Mynyddog was announced to appear in the neighbourhood, would pass the alehouse, hurry to his home, dress himself in his best, and trudge, with his Ruth, through rough roads and rougher weather, to partake of and join in the harmless mirth. The tiller of the soil and tender of the flocks would gladly quit the glories of the field and grandeur of the mountain when Mynyddog sang of things other than the silent stars and misty hill-tops. And a dweller in the dull town would welcome him—for he was comedian, singer, and punster in one; maker and utterer of homely ditties and tuneful jokes, well nigh sole entertainer in the Welsh tongue.

Mynyddog's loss will be felt most at Eisteddfods, where he was not only a singer of comic ditties, but conductor of the meetings, a post entailing important duties, which have no equivalent in English assemblies. Perhaps the office nearest to it in character is that of toastmaster to civic feasts. But in Eisteddfodau, chairman, speakers, and secretaries are for the moment really subservient to the conductor. Mynyddog had not the fervid eloquence of Talhaiarn, his predecessor, nor the poetic ability of other bards, his cotemporaries; neither had he the education and social position of some of his brother officials; but he had more tact than all of them put together. His humour never deserted him. Lear's Fool uttered no plainer speech to "Nuncle" than Mynyddog the jester to that many-headed majesty—"Eisteddfod." No object, no incident, escaped him. For the prize winners he had a "quid" of compliment; for losers a "pro quo" of encouragement. If the meeting, like a jaded horse, flagged, his wit whipped it into good-humoured activity. Differences, rows, and quarrels will occur occasionally at these meetings; in fact, they are natural to them; but a song or jest from him was often sufficient to cool down the hot blood, and restore order and good fellowship. Mynyddog has left no son to perpetuate his name, nor any work, poetical or musical, to make his fame perennial. Like an exhausted melody he has passed away, leaving traces only to be soon effaced. But mountain winds will chant his dirge, whilst ever and anon his name shall conjure up tender memories to the fleeting generation of Welshmen. PENCERDD GWFFYN.

A Canard about a Duck.

An occurrence not devoid of piquant interest is announced from Vienna. It relates to last season. The celebrated Italian-French-Spanish-American singer (Mad. Adelina Patti) was, in the Austrian capital, greatly admired and greatly run after, as she always is. Even the mighty of the earth paid her some little homage, and thus it happened that she was among those invited to an evening party given by Baron Rothschild. Of course, not "without an object," like the other guests, but to delight the latter by her singing. On such an occasion it is customary for those who indulge in the luxury of serving up, among other delicacies for the benefit of their friends, a few songs from the throat of a famous vocalist, to pay her a fixed honorarium, frequently settled beforehand. On the evening in question Mad. Patti enchanted all present, including the Princess Pauline Metternich. When the fair artist had concluded her pieces, the Princess went up to her, and, mentioning a favourite song, begged her in the most friendly manner to sing it. Mad. Patti consented, but whispered a few words to Rothschild's Secretary, who was standing near her. The Secretary immediately reported the words to the Baron. They were to the effect that "she could, of course, sing the song only on the same terms as the other pieces." The Lady had—oh! Idealism, hide thy weeping face!—fixed her honorarium at so much "per song," and she desired to be paid at the same rate for the song the Princess wished to hear. It is superfluous to say that the original honorarium was something unusually large. Baron Rothschild hastened to communicate Mad. Patti's message to the Princess Metternich, begging her, under the circumstances, to forego the song, and promising, in return, to place eight thousand florins* at the disposal of the Princess for her poor pensioners. The Princess immediately renounced her expected treat. Among those to whose ears the proceeding of the artist found its way was the Empress Elizabeth, who, in consequence, ordered that the name of Mad. Adelina Patti should be erased from the list of vocalists at the next Court Concert, and that of Mad. Ethelka Gerster substituted for it.—Berlin Echo.

[How very amusing this would be, were it not a—a—a—Canard! —A. S. S.]

FRANKFORT.—Weber's Abu Hassan has been revived at the Stadttheater after a lapse of many years. Abu Hassan was composed in 1811, at Darmstadt, and Weber dedicated it to the Grand Duke of Hesse. The opera was first performed at Munich, June 4th in the same year, and subsequently at Frankfort, Stuttgart, Berlin, and Vienna. Translated into Danish, it was given at Copenhagen, and in an English version at Drury Lane (1825). Weber improved the work, touched up the orchestration, and composed the air for Fatima, which is now one of the most striking pieces. Abu Hassan was in its time considered a master work; but Der Freyschiütz, Preciosa, Euryanthe, and Oberon somewhat disturbed that belief, and a revival at the present time is not a sure speculation.

LEIPZIG.—Herr Franz Nachbaur, of Munich, opened a starring engagement at the Stadttheater as George Brown in Boieldieu's Dame Blanche. His second character was Massaniello.

GERTRUDE ELIZABETH MARA.

Pictures from the Life of the first German Operatic Singer.

By W. LACKOWITZ.*

II.

We must enter the abode of the bitterest poverty, if we would become acquainted with the early history of the most eminent German female singer of the last century—Gertrude Elizabeth Mara; an abode deficient in even the most necessary conveniences of everyday life. The fact is, poor Schmähling, musician, and teacher of music at Cassel, scarcely earned sufficient to enable his wife and himself to drag on a wretched existence. When, however, after many years of a joyless union, and just as he was turning the half century of his life, a daughter was born to him, and the little creature's mother soon afterwards died, his condition would have been much more desperate than it was before but for the fact that it could not be so. The child was sickly from her infancy. Her rickety limbs had not strength enough for her to walk or stand. There she sat, poor little thing, from morning to night, bound fast in her chair, and confided to the care of an old servant when Schmähling went out to give lessons. Her field of view was bounded by invalid fiddles, which had been sent to the musician to mend, and which lay or hung all about the small room. Of God's beautiful world outside little Gertrude had never seen aught; her entire range of thought was encompassed by musical ruins. One day, when her father came home, he heard the sounds of a fiddle in his room. He listened in astonishment. Who could have come during his absence? It was evident that someone was waiting for him, and whiling away the weary hours by playing the fiddle. It was a scale, almost perfectly in tune, which he heard repeated again and again. He opened the door. Who can paint his astonishment! The performer was little Gertrude, the poor sick child. When her father stood before her, so unexpectedly, she nearly let the violin fall from fright. It had been so near her chair that she had been able to reach it. The talent slumbering within her had sought and found an outlet in her imperfect performance. But no word of reproof passed her father's lips; his astonishment was joyous astonishment. Had there arisen a solace for his old age, a source of assistance in his need? He felt a presentiment of the divine spark in his child, and, to her indescribable delight, she now had regular instruction. The result exceeded all expectations; her progress was surprising. News of the miracle presented by the little weakling soon flew, as a matter of course, beyond the limits of the sorry room. The story seemed incredible. The poverty of his domestic arrangements prevented Herr Schmähling, however, from inviting to his own dwelling the unbelievers who would fain have convinced themselves by their own senses of the truth. So, as the mountain could not go to Mahomet, Mahomet was obliged to go to the mountain. Then commenced in Cassel the wonderful peregrinations, about which the subsequently so celebrated lady used herself to speak when a matron; for her memory had faithfully preserved them. Her father went first with the violin-case, followed by the old servant with the child-prodigy, seated in her little chair and carefully wrapt up in shawls. Thus did the strange procession wend its way to the worthy tailors and glovers who were old Schmähling's good friends. In time, the doors of the more well-to-do, also, were flung open. People overlooked the father's utter want of culture, nay, roughness, and were lost in wonder at the weak child, who handled the bow so energetically. Richer presents than the father had ever been able to make her flew into the family coffers. It was at one of the above visits that a rich Frankfort merchant heard the child, and offered to take her—of course, not without her father—with him, and have her talent further cultivated. Schmähling, we need scarcely say, accepted the offer, and Gertrude created no less astonishment in Frankfort than in Cassel. Her health, moreover, gradually improved. During the two years of her stay at Frankfort, she learned to stand and walk, though not for any length of time. After she had completed her course of study, her father resumed his pilgrim's staff. He visited Vienna with Gertrude, then nine years of age—she was born on the 23rd February, 1740. On the road, however, he had an opportunity of convincing himself that Germany was not a sufficiently rich mine to be worked by such a prodigy, and Vienna fully confirmed the experience he had gained. But to make money, to make a great deal of money, was his principal aim. He eagerly seized, therefore, the notion suggested by the British ambassador at the French Court, of going with the child to London. Aye, London was the place where people would certainly appreciate such a wonderful phenomenon, and the recommendations given him by the art-loving Englishman could not possibly fail in their object. Thus did father Schmähling start for foggy England. His expectations seemed not to be ill-founded. The reception of the two new comers was, indeed, brilliant. The ambassador's recommendations were a golden key which opened the most aristocratic houses. Every one was speaking of the wonderful child, and at length the Queen, also, who heard scarcely any other subject discussed by those around her, expressed a wish to become acquainted with the little girl. The right moment had now arrived! The golden shower could no longer fail to pour down upon father Schmähling. Unfortunately, the latter counted without his host. . . . The Queen could not bear to see anything ugly, and little Gertrude Schmähling was most decidedly repulsively ugly. The young virtuosa, moreover, when giving a performance, worked her arms in the air in such a manner that she became almost like a spider, and at the same time made the most horrible grimaces. The Queen was startled and could not be induced to receive "the ugly thing" a second time. This was, of course, a signal for all the sycophants attached to the Court: their doors were thenceforth closed to the wonderful child. The golden rain did not come, and the posture of affairs began to grow critical. Fortunately a lover of art turned up at the right moment, and interested himself for the two beings who, without him, would soon have been sorely pressed. He was not only a rich, but a practical man. He had observed that little Gertrude possessed a very agreeable voice, and, thanks to her musical talent, easily learned and retained short songs. He proposed to the father, therefore, that the latter should discontinue the fiddle, and have her instructed in singing, adding that, if he did so, he should have no need to trouble himself about the expense. It would not have been necessary to use any of the arguments adduced by the welcome Mæcenæas to the effect that violin-playing was naturally unpleasant and unbecoming for a girl; that as a violinist Gertrude would always produce the most disagreeable effect, &c. The old musician did not take long to consider. On the one hand, the aristocratic houses had gradually closed their doors on him, and the gold-springs threatened soon to become entirely dried up. On the other hand, he saw beckoning to him a new future, and the almost certain prospect that all the doors which had been shut against the violinist would one day be thrown open to the singer. The new Mæcenæas, too, was really in earnest, for, hardly had Schmähling agreed unconditionally to the proposed plan, ere Gertrude began taking lessons of the celebrated Paradisi. The latter had been a world-renowned singer. After retiring from the public exercise of his art on the stage, he became the most eminent singing-master in London. He was paid a magnificent price for his lessons, and had accumulated great wealth. He was magnificently paid for Gertrude Schmähling, and so she became his pupil. What she learned of him we do not know. It is possible that, in his school, she laid the foundation of her subsequent extraordinary skill, which reached such a point, that there was no living singer who could serve her as a model, and she had to imitate the roulades of celebrated flautists and violinists. Enough that she became his pupil, and that with her name the name of Signor Paradisi as well has been permanently handed down to posterity.

Nor are we acquainted with the particulars concerning the immediate results of the instruction she enjoyed. It would seem, however, that those results were not such as father Schmähling probably expected, as far at least as regards the material effect on his purse. It appears certain, that London as persistently refused to open its doors to the singer as it had done to the violinist, and that consequently gold and jewels did not fall into her lap. Papa Schmähling cared only for pecuniary success, and, as the flesh-pots of Egypt, for which he so ardently yearned, appeared, despite the new era, only very sparingly on his table, he suddenly determined to return home. In his opinion, Gertrude could not now fail to be considered a wonderful phenomenon in Germany. Remarkable perverseness of Fate. The good people of Germany his compatriots, took the liberty of entertaining a different opinion to that of the old musician. Schmähling proceeded at first to Cassel. But, as we know, a prophet is nowhere worth less than in his own country; this always was and always will be the case. The Seven Years' War had emptied men's strong chests. The country of Hesse especially had been drained most fearfully by the French before the battle of Rossbach, and can sing a song about the glorious traces of the Grand Nation. People limited themselves to what was absolutely necessary. Under the head of what is absolutely necessary, we must include, however, an Italian Opera, for there was still one in Cassel despite exhausted purses. But what was to be made of a singer who had fallen from the clouds on the other side the Straits of Dover, who was a native of Cassel, and could boast neither of name nor reputation? It was impossible to employ her at the Italian Opera, even though she had been pre-eminently beautiful, which was not the case. The fair Italian artists would never have allowed such an engagement, and it would not do to offend them. In a word, all the steps taken proved fruitless, and even the recommendations from England proved worthless in every instance. Nay, father Schmähling was actually unable even to obtain his daughter's appearance at a Court concert, which would at any rate have brought him in a few louis d'or. Week after week, and month after month, did he wait and exert himself in vain. At length he had no alternative left but to grasp his pilgrim's staff and once more set out upon his wanderings. In 1766 father and daughter reached Leipzig during the Easter Fair, and it was here that Gertrude's destiny as a singer was to be decided.

WIESBADEN (from a Correspondent).—The sixth Kurhaus Concert took place on the 17th August. Who does not know the beautiful Marble Hall, the concert hall, and banquet hall, the monuments of the days past, when roulette went round and round, and people won and lost fortunes. The indefatigable Kur-director, Herr Heyl, still administers with taste and judgment, to the gratification of his patrons. M. Saint-Saëns from Paris being here, was invited to play his fourth pianoforte concerto, which he did like a genuine composer who knows best how to give effect to his own music. He was warmly received. His well-known "Danse Macabre" and his poem symphonie, Phaeton, for orchestra, were played with great success. Mdlle Orgeni and Herr Sontheim were the vocalists, singing, as we have often heard them sing before, "Les tenors sont rares;" and Mdlle Orgeni will be remembered at your Royal Italian Opera. The performance of Flotow's Maria was marked by the debut of Mdlle Rolandt, young and beautiful, with a voice so sweet and sympathetic, and such faultless execution, that she took the house by storm.

Mozart.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—The following humorous poem is from the pen of the Concertmeister, August Müller, who died, in 1862, at Darmstadt. We give it in a free translation from the German original:—

"Mozart was a Musicus—Extraordinarius.

That he was sublime and grand is well known through ev'ry land. Besides a master of his art, was clever in other things, Mozart; What else he could besides yet be, will tell you all, this litany; Mozart was a joiner good, although he used not glue nor wood; But his "fugues" were such a hit, as made the very walls to split. He was a turner excellent, since ev'ryone will apprehend That nothing in his works is found, which is not smooth and very round.

Mozart was a mastersmith, who, without trouble, could forthwith, Play with keys of every sort, that is sure, upon my word.

Mozart was a blacksmith brave, in his works the proofs we have, For in truth it must be said: he hits the nail firm on the head.

A metal-founder he was besides, but this profession much derides, For wanton use of too much brass he thought was fit but for an ass. As maker of an instrument, was Mozart really excellent,

And you may for certain take, no man such "Magic Flute" could make.

As diplomate quite grand was he, and this we even now can see, For notes once issued by his hand are honoured yet in ev'ry land.

In "fencing" he was also strong, and never out nor ever wrong, For his tierces and his quates were in their right places everywhere.

As hairdresser I do believe that no one did so much achieve As Mozart when he dressed so fair a Titus for an Empeur.

A gravedigger, though one excellent, was Mozart, yet before his end. Who wouldn't be proud if he became, in "Memoriam," performed his Requiem?

By such great versatility, one must declare implicitly, That Mozart was the most sublime and greatest artist of his time."

You will detect, sir, the expediency of giving immediate publicity to the foregoing, which if you fail to do, I am by no means your obedient servant and slavish admirer. I have rendered it into English from the German (or, in some sense, Teutonic) of the Leipzig Journal, and am, yours under consideration,

THE THREE CHOIR FESTIVAL.

The programme of the 154th Festival of the Three Choirs of Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester, to be held at the first-named place in the first week in September, has been issued. Although hopes were entertained a fortnight since* that Mdlle Tietjens would be sufficiently recovered to fulfil her engagement as principal soprano, that hope is abandoned. Mdlle Albany will take the major part of the music originally assigned to Mdlle Tietjens. The Festival opens on Tuesday, the 4th of September, with full morning service at the Cathedral, on which occasion the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, who has hitherto held aloof from active participation in these Festivals, will preach the sermon on behalf of the widows and orphans. In the afternoon Elijah will be given; on Wednesday morning Bach's Passion and Beethoven's Mount of Olives, and in the evening Mendelssohn's St Paul and Part I. of Haydn's Creation; on Thursday morning a miscellaneous selection of sacred works, including Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, Brahms' Requiem, "Blessed are they," and the late Dr Wesley's anthem, "The Wilderness;" on Friday morning Handel's Messiah. There will be secular concerts at the Shire Hall on Tuesday and Thursday nights, and Evening Service, with band and chorus, in the nave of the Cathedral on Friday. The list of stewards includes the names of nearly two hundred noblemen and gentlemen.

HANOVER.—On the 14th August the highly-esteemed Court Kapellmeister Fischer, successor of Marschner, died at a public dinner given by a few friends in his honour on his return from a long journey. He was recounting to them in jocular manner how he had travelled from Munich to Cassel in seven hours—when, just as he was going to say "Cassel," he fell back dead. He was one of the giants of the old school, like Marschner, Spohr, Guhr, Esser, &c. The Court Theatre now, a few days before its re-opening, is without a conductor.

THE ITALIAN OPERAS.

(Reminiscences of 1877, from the Scrap-book of a Dilettante.)

No. 1.

ZARE THALBERG'S ZERLINA.

Fortunately, Mdle Thalberg, whose entrance was greeted with prolonged applause, did much to compensate for the deficiencies of the others. Her voice is more beautiful than ever, and has become richer and stronger since last season. Whether it has gained in flexibility and compass remains to be seen; but it was evident last night that she has been endowed by Nature with vocal gifts which, with proper cultivation, must speedily place her in the highest rank of the operatic profession. . . . Her voice is of such remarkably rich quality throughout its entire compass that it will bear any amount of cultivation, and abundantly repay it. Last night its freshness and brilliancy imparted an irresistible charm to her execution of "Batti, batti," and other portions of her rôle, and her intonation was faultless. The return of this charming young artist (now only in her nineteenth year) will enhance the attractions of the Royal Italian Opera, and her popularity was attested by the warmth of her reception.—Globe, May 5.

EMMA ALBANI'S OPHELIA.

Beyond the fact that the Ophelia of Mdle Albani becomes year after year a more finished impersonation (more poetical it could hardly be), and that, both in a vocal and dramatic sense, it may fairly take rank with her Senta, Elizabeth, and Elsa—her Wagnerian trilogy—there is nothing to add to what has already been said about it. To follow Christine Nilsson in this, one of the brightest of her creations, was no grateful task; but here success has recompensed ambition, and the Ophelia of the fair Canadian is pronounced by competent judges only second to that of the fairer (blonder) Swede.—Graphic, June 23.

ADELINA PATTI'S CATARINA.

L'Etoile du Nord appears to be growing in favour. . . . At any rate, the opera that used to be played once at the close of the season for the benefit of Mdme Patti, is now a more prominent feature. . . . It attracted an enormous house on Tuesday night, not a place being anywhere vacant, while the highest expectations of the audience were more than satisfied. . . . Mdme Patti was, of course, the "star" of the occasion, and never shone more brightly or with a steadier lustre. Her representation of Caterina amounted, indeed, both in a dramatic and musical sense, to one long triumph. The "Bohemienne," the prayer "Veglia dal ciel," and the important music of the last act, including the well-known and ingenious trio for voice and flutes, were all given to perfection so obvious that it was not possible to conceive anything better. As to the great artist's acting, the power of it is so well known that no word of description or of eulogy is needed.—Daily Telegraph, May 31.

ETHELKA GERSTER'S GILDA.

On Tuesday night Rigoletto was performed, with the new singer, Mad. Gerster, as Gilda. We are inclined to think that were Mad. Gerster to turn aside for a time from parts the prevalent characteristics of which are florid passages, more or less elaborately embellished, and devote her attention seriously to the study and practice of the plain cantilena, where level singing is indispensable, she would improve the quality of her middle voice, without in any way endangering the supremacy of her favourite high notes. The manner in which she sang more than one cantabile phrase on Tuesday night convinced us of this. As examples, we would especially point to her delivery of the melodious passage, "Quanto affetto," &c., which begins Gilda's share in the expressive duet with Rigoletto ("Veglia, O! donna, questo fiore"), and the recital of the story of her clandestine meetings with Walter Maldé, the pretended student. The charming soliloquy, "Caro nome," but for two florid cadenzas out of keeping with its character, would have been irreproachable.—Graphic, July 14.

CHRISTINE NILSSON'S RETURN.

The palmiest days of this historic house* were suggested on Saturday, when Madame Christine Nilsson made her first appearance for the season. Rank and fashion once more thronged to the Hay-market, amateurs of all classes crowded the interior, which by the way looked the picture of cheerfulness, and the rule of the evening was enthusiastic applause. In the experience of many present the occasion may have derived added zest from the fact that Madame Nilsson first trod the new stage in the part chosen for her début on the old. Whether this was by design or not matters little. Nothing could have been more appropriate, and all among the audience who were present when, 11 years ago, a new prima donna burst upon their gratified sight, must have witnessed Saturday's doings with special interest. Since she first played the Violetta of La Traviata, the Swedish artist has undergone no inconsiderable development as regards both the scope and character of her genius. There have been times when it seemed doubtful whether that development took precisely the right direction, but the strong good sense and quick perception of Madme Nilsson never fail in the long run to discover and correct mistakes. To these qualities the remarkable success obtained on Saturday night may in a large measure be attributed. Whatever tendency was once manifested towards an exaggerated style of acting has apparently been conquered, and Madame Nilsson now makes a careful and artistic use of the larger resources accumulated by her experience and by the natural growth of her eminent talent. All the more interesting on this account was it to compare her present Violetta with that of her earliest appearance amongst us. None could have forgotten the winning gentleness and grace of the débutante, and none could fail to see that those qualities still exist in all their charm, united to the dramatic power of a ripened artist. The advantage is thus in favour of the present over the past, and opera-goers have thus good reason to congratulate themselves that Madame Nilsson is not only again engaged in their service, but better qualified than ever to satisfy their most exigent demands. We need not describe for the hundredth time all the incidents of an "ovation," such as the public bestow upon the prime favourites of the lyric stage. The reader may imagine all he can of the enthusiasm without much risk of going beyond the truth. Animated by so warm a greeting, the Swedish artist exerted her whole powers, both as actress and singer; and when we say that her voice was as distinguished as ever for that undefinable quality which makes it so eminently human, and therefore sympathetic, it may be assumed that the effect she produced was immense. In point of simple fact, Madame Nilsson has not often so thoroughly conquered the enthusiastic approval of her audience by means so legitimate. No matter whether it was the brilliant music of the first act, the passionate strains of the second, or the pathetic melodies of the third, in each and all she sang like a great artist. Higher praise we cannot give; praise less high would fail in justice. We might dwell long upon the dramatic characteristics of Madame Nilsson's Violetta, but, as they are perfectly well known, to do so would be superfluous. Let us say, however—what, indeed, we have already indicated—that the assumption was one of exceptional finish as well as breadth of outline. While made a sufficiently striking figure in the earlier scenes, Violetta never appeared overdrawn, so that a perfect consistency was established between the gay reveller of the "Libiamo" and the girl whose love, in the last scene, conquers the assurance of coming death and conjures up a vision of happy life. This may be an idealised Violetta; but, if any one makes the fact a ground of objection, the answer is that no other would be tolerated, even if it were not the business of the stage, as a branch of art, to improve upon the realities of common, and, too often, repellent life. How much the audience admired the representation, and applauded the artist's tours de force, we need not stop to tell. Enough that Madame Nilsson re-established herself in the highest favour of the public.—Daily Telegraph, May 7.

* Her Majesty's Theatre.

COPENHAGEN.

(From a Correspondent.)

Uncommon musical activity has reigned here lately. On his way back from more northern latitudes, M. Henri Wieniawski gave two concerts. He was followed by an entire concert company, headed by Mad. Trebelli, who gave six concerts in the course of a week, at Tivoli. The company included Mad. Trebelli, Mdle Valleria, Sig. Talbo, and Herr Behrens. On leaving here, they will proceed to Sweden and Norway, first visiting, however, Helsingør, famous as being the place where Hamlet was buried—at least, so antiquaries assert—and where the celebrated organist Dietrich Buxtehude, a son of Johann Buxtehude, and the immediate predecessor of Johann Sebastian Bach, was born about 1635. Dietrich Buxtehude died in 1707 at Lübeck. He was greatly indebted as an organist to the two Dutch organists, Reinick Schweling, of Deventer, and Scheidemann, his pupil. Reinick, or Reinecke, was nearly a hundred at the time of his decease.

Adelina Patti.

The Marquise de Caux has taken proceedings for annulling her marriage, on the ground that the priest who officiated at Clapham was not provided with a special licence to solemnize marriages, from the Archbishop, but was simply delegated by the parish of St Philippe de Roule to give the nuptial benediction. Other informalities also are to be disclosed. Her petition states that she discovered shortly after the marriage that her husband's only object was to profit by her earnings, and that he never occupied any other attitude towards her than that of an impresario, seeking to make the most money possible out of her talent. She repeats complaints of violence, and urges that the judicial separation was accorded to her husband without her being allowed an opportunity of substantiating her charges.—Times' Paris Correspondence, Aug. 24.

EISTEDDFOD AT CARNARVON.—The Welsh National Eisteddfod was opened at Carnarvon on Tuesday. In place of the ordinary temporary pavilion, a large iron structure for the permanent use of the town has been erected at an outlay of £7,000. The proceedings were prefaced by a Bardic meeting at Carnarvon Castle. At its close, the Mayor (Mr Pugh), president of the day, was escorted by a procession to the pavilion. In his opening remarks, the President alluded to the value of these national gatherings as developing the latent talent of Wales, and encouraging a love for literature and music. He trusted that the other National Institution recently brought into prominence, the University College for Wales, would be successful in obtaining Government aid. The chief feature of the programme was a choral competition for 100 guineas, awarded to the Carnarvon Choral Union, the Waenafwr Choir taking a second prize of 20 guineas. The Carnarvon Amateur string band won the prize, and their leader, Mr. Howell Williams, a medal for violin. Mr D. Jones, Llandoverly, took the prize for musical composition, Miss Rees, of Neath, and Miss Williams, of Llanlyfyn, prizes for vocalisation. Professor Macfarren, who, with Dr Rogers, organist of Bangor Cathedral, was musical adjudicator, spoke very highly of the ability displayed by the various competitors. In the evening there was a concert, at which Mmes Patey, Edith Wynne, Mary Davies, and Marian Williams, Signor Foli, Eos Morlais, J. Sauvage, and Dr. Frost, assisted. Unfavourable weather militated against the success of the Eisteddfod on Wednesday, under Lord Penrhyn's presidency. His Lordship was glad that at gatherings productive of such beneficial results to the community, there was no longer a desire to praise and uphold everything Welsh. He had protested against such a tone when occupying the chair at Carnarvon sixteen years ago; and it was satisfactory now to find all joining heartily in objects calculated to promote culture and raise moral and social position. The chief choral prize, 100 guineas, subscribed by Welsh quarrymen for choirs from the quarrying districts, fell through, owing to the absence of competitors; and the chief literary honour for an essay on the state of society in Wales shared the like fate. Mr Bryant, of Corwen, won the prize bass. Mr Pritchard, of Bangor, won the forty guinea pianofortegiven by Messrs Brinsmead, for amateur pianists, Miss Jenny Davis, Llangollen, taking second prize, and Miss Cox, Threapwood Vicarage, third. The oration was delivered by Professor Mackenna Hughes. Mme Edith Wynne, Mme Patey, Signor Foli, and Professor Macfarren were again actively present.

Touching Eels.

"I'm an eel, I'm an eel, I'm a spitchooked eel," &c.
(Popular Tune.)

"Heal me of that Eel, Ilkwhelk!"

(Old Play.)

And yet were I to choose my lot,
And say I'd be an eel,
Would that be happiness or not?
Should I contented feel?
My aching heart, my puzzled brain,
Cannot support this mental strain.

Garret or Jarret.

(To Danophylin.)

DEAR DANOPHYLIN,—I am perplexed. Is it Jarret or Garret, either or both, who acts Mephisto to Dishley Peters' Fisto (Fausto)? I am resolved to know. You among men and Christian managers—you alone among mortals who have risen to immortality (dei Khiva), can decide—unless it be the great "J. H. M." himself. Your predecessor—or rather your revered T. T.'s predecessor, the late incomparable Shirley Brooks—engendered a quintain, beginning:—

There was an old fellow called Jarret,
Who kept (somebody) up in a garret (sic).

I forget the rest; but does not this sound like the prediction of a postaction? Answer, dishly (or rather frankly), and believe me, yours in sincerity, Rooses.

P. 8.—I saw Shaver Silver yesterday, reading Dr Donne. I tapped him on the shoulder (it was in St Paul's belfry). "You are," I said "at the beginning of Elegy XVIII." "Well?"—he replied, inquiringly—"it's the last—'Come, Madame, come.'" To which I answered, with some disdain, "Off with that girdle!" Here the conversation dropped; but, strange enough, I saw Arthur Sullivan, M.D., two hours later, on the Thames Embankment. He was looking for the roof which is to cover the new grand "National Opera" (conductor, Sir Michael Costa), because, without that roof, his Marie Stuart, and Christine as Marie, can hardly be given by "Lady Day."† Not finding the roof, he dined at the Garrick, met Sambourne, and slept soundly.

Catch that eel, or have the under-gardener disembowelled and quartered.‡ If that eel is not speedily soothed (alliteration intended) instead of Boodell it will be Bodeil.§ Your companions said all they had to say (and that was trenchant) in "Chapter I." Now they do nothing but walk about the garden, and stare at a trimmer. This does not look well for the sequel—for which you will naturally seek well (not new). Woodman, skin that eel!—

Skin that eel
Or you'll never be weel.

Buy a new horse, and trot back to Khiva, with "Pig"—you may then make some new dishkivaries.||

THE above Committee having learned with deep regret that Mr CHARLES S. BARKER, Inventor of the Pneumatic Action, is, at 70 years of age, in reduced circumstances, without means of support, are desirous of providing him with an annuity for his declining years, and beg to solicit contributions in furtherance of this deserving case. Owing to the Franco-Prussian war, Mr BARKER had to seek an asylum in this country after many years' residence abroad, when, unfortunately, it was too late in life to turn to profitable account those researches which had cost him so many years of patient and assiduous labour, resulting in the successful application of pneumatic action to the touch of organs, without which modern instruments and modern performances on them would be impossible, and more recently in the electro-pneumatic system, besides other minor but invaluable details to organ mechanism. As it is of urgent necessity that immediate steps be taken with a view to save him from actual want, the Committee put forth this appeal. Contributions should be sent to the Honorary Treasurer, F. DAVISON, Esq., 24, Fitzroy Square, London, W., as early as possible, the Committee being anxious to close the Subscription List before the 29th September next, by which time, it is hoped, a sufficient amount will have been obtained to enable them to carry out their object.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 25, 1877.

Mad. Florence Ricca Knox.

WE promised last week to lay before our readers the letter addressed by "Mad. Ricca" to the Editor of the Adrian Times, in which our musical critics as a body are so handsomely treated, and such civil things are said about managers, about the English and Italians, about artists in general and Mad. Scalchi in particular. Here it is (the italics are our own):—

"MDME RICCA'S DEBUT IN LONDON.

"To the Editor of the Adrian (Mich.) Times.

"So many false reports have reached me, coming from the American press, and particularly from Michigan, about my recent début in opera at Covent Garden, that I feel, in simple justice to myself, I ought to send to my old home a truthful account of that event. I write to you personally, because the Times has ever been friendly to me. I know that I have many kind friends in Adrian who are interested in me, knowing how I love the art, and having faith in my success. It is to them and to you, therefore, that I address myself. You all, doubtless, heard of my success in Malta, when I sang to critical Italian audiences during four months. A complimentary benefit was offered me, to take place immediately after Easter; and I wrote to Mr Gye, the director of the Covent Garden Opera, asking if I might remain in Malta until the 7th of April. His answer was a telegram that I must be in London by the 1st of April, to sing Leonora in La Favorita. Therefore I left Malta at a day's notice, and at a great sacrifice came by land at double the expense, and arrived here on the 29th of March, in perfect health and voice. Imagine, then, my surprise and indignation when Mr Gye gave the part of Leonora to Mme Scalchi, an artist who had been eight years at Covent Garden, and is a favourite with the public. The reason alleged for the change was that he (Gye) did not wish to present two new artists to the public on the same evening (meaning Gayarre, the great tenor, and myself). Of course, I believed him then, but I know now that, as he did not need me this year, he would not pay me, nor continue the liberal terms of his five years' contract with me. He intended to sacrifice me by making me follow a great artist in the same part, and give me no sort of a chance. The Favorita was a success, thanks to the tenor.

"After it had been given twice, and I had been in London two weeks, I saw my name announced to sing the part on the 16th of April. No rehearsal was granted me, and nothing was done by either the manager or the press to help me in this trying ordeal. I had not a dozen friends in all that great assembly to greet and encourage me. Yet, from the moment I appeared, I was warmly cheered and welcomed. I knew that the critics were there in full force to tear me to pieces, first of all because I was an American and a 'débütante,' and because the favour and praise of the English press had not been bought up. That species of blackmail is carried on here, as elsewhere, I find, much to my sorrow." I had splendid support in the artists. The second act was immensely successful, the duet with the King being rapturously applauded and re-demanded, and we were obliged to repeat it; also, after my aria, 'O mio Fernando,' in the third act. The last act did not go so well, for I was excessively nervous, and my emotions paralyzed my efforts; but I went through without faltering, and was called before the curtain at the close. Was this failure? Was it not a favourable success for a first appearance in the first theatre in the world, and with a great orchestra that I had never sung with, and without a rehearsal?

"But the English and the Italians will not let an American succeed if intrigue and cruel jealousies can prevent it. Mme Scalchi said to an artist of Covent Garden: 'I will not have Mme Ricca succeed. I will have no rivals here. Whoever applauds her is my enemy.' (!) The Italians do not relish the Americans coming to take their place on the lyric stage, and sing in their language. No one has any idea of the jealousy that exists among artists.

A début at Covent Garden is a great ordeal for an old artist. What must it have been to a débütante, who had only four months' experience on a small stage, to be put on that immense stage, with a strange orchestra of eighty players, with new artists, without a rehearsal, without being certain of the dramatic part of the business, to rush out into a blaze of lights, and sing and act a rôle as important as that of Leonora? The miracle is that I did not die of stage fright, or was not 'struck dumb,'—as one of the home papers reported.

"The critics (so called) were very unkind and very untruthful—at least some of them; and Mr Gye, only too glad to get rid of paying me, wriggled out of his contract, saying that my voice was not powerful enough for his theatre. It is so absurd that I could laugh over such a poor excuse if I did not rebel at the injustice. My voice was never stronger or clearer in my life, and I have been entirely free from cold or sore throat since last year. I have many projects and plans for the coming fall and winter, and I intend to show these people what I can do before I quit this cold country. I had the honour of singing at the Earl of Darnley's mansion last week, and met with great success. Pardon my long letter. I wanted so to give you a true and minute account of my experience, and my début in opera in England.

"FLORENCE RICCA KNOX.

"London, June 20."

Comment on such a letter as the foregoing would be superfluous. Never having heard Mad. Ricca, or read a single article in any paper concerning her, pro or con, we are unable to offer any opinion as to her merits; but whatever these may be, they do not entitle her to insult a body of gentlemen of whom she knows absolutely nothing. Here we have, in another and more

* Who may have been the lady's informant? Mad. Ricca was not in the Haymarket, where nothing but truth is spoken, even concerning critics, but in the Coventgardenmarket—bucolic paradise!

offensive form, the impertinent reflection of Herr Anton Rubinstein—"En effet, c'est l'argent—c'est toujours l'argent!"

[Herr Rubinstein prefers Or to Argent—"Higher Development." B. B.]

MAD. FLORENCE RICCA.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Permit me to say a few words in reference to an article copied from an American newspaper, in which it is averred that I accuse the English critics of being "blackmailers." The article in question was copied from a private letter, and was not, therefore, intended for the public. So far, I may be acquitted of any intent to cast any imputation upon the gentlemen connected with the English press, in the estimate of the American people or any considerable portion of them.

With respect to the charge itself, the word "blackmail" is, I know, an ugly one. I beg to say, in explanation of it, that it was based upon some unfortunate experiences which I had on the Continent, and through whose occurrence I was misled by some events which took place soon after my arrival in London.

I herewith most expressly disclaim any knowledge of "blackmailing" by the English press, and have further to say that I was labouring under a misapprehension when the charge was originally made.

FLORENCE RICCA.

Herr Rubinstein on England.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—It is not so very long ago that Herr Rubinstein is said to have said to Dr Hans von Bülow—"The English people are the least musical of any." Some flippant wag, on being told of this, observed, "the remark was justified by the fact that, in the course of two seasons (1876 and 1877), Herr Rubinstein had earned from £10,000 to £12,000 of English money." Supposing this to be true, it has made no change whatever in the Moldavo-Bessarabian artist's opinion of England, English amateurs, and English musicians—that is, if we may credit a gushing account of "An Evening with Rubinstein," copied by the New York Music Trade Review from another American periodical. The article itself, though too "high falutin" for ordinary English tastes, I should recommend you, as a cumini sector, to put by for the attentive perusal of your readers on a future occasion. Meanwhile, I would merely call attention to a particular part of it. The after dinner conversation turned on the relative merits of English and foreign orchestral players. Herr Rubinstein—the authoress of this epileptic table-narrative informs us—"admitted a 'certain power of tone in English players—that is, in English bands, so largely made up of German and other foreigners'—but denied the existence of 'any individuality, delicacy, or intelligence in the interpretation of the leading violins.' * * * 'Sluggish and heavy; they did not leap out to meet him, as at the great Conservatoires. 'Et il me faut ça—il me faut ça. En effet, c'est l'argent—c'est toujours l'argent'—or, in other words, the one aim of art in this country is not art, but money; and a man labours so incessantly, no matter how, to accumulate wealth, that he has not the time, even had he the requisites, to become a great artist."

This is cool from a virtuoso who has mastered a certain repertory which, compared in extent and variety with that of Hans von Bülow, Charles Hallé, Clara Schumann, or Arafella Goddard, is as a bunch of grapes to an entire vineyard, and who at each of his visits to London, since 1857, with the addition, from time to time, of sundry compositions from his own pen (not invariably of the choicest), has given the identical series of pieces over and over again—one and all familiar before he had perplexed our tiptoed, squeamish lady amateurs, our shrinking, pusillanimous, ostrich-like, head-hiding professors, with his erratic method of interpreting them. "Oh"—it will be said, by the Duchess of Fitzbattlease—"the dear! he plays everything without book." So much the worse. Though, for upwards of twenty years, he has toyed with the same string of pieces, the book would now and then be of as much service to him as the sun to the steel clasps and buttons with which M. Ferulus, the pedagogue, in Paul de Kock's novel, diverts the company's attention from his threadbare suit. If only as an occasional "refresher," moreover, it would be acceptable. I am of opinion that all or any of the pianists I have cited would play by memory twenty compositions to Herr Rubinstein's one,—instead, for example, of three or four sonatas of Beethoven, all Beethoven; three or four preludes and fugues of Bach, all Bach; three or four pieces of Mendelssohn, all Mendelssohn; three or four pieces of Schumann, all Schumann. With the Variations, in D minor, of Handel, those unhappy little improvisations, the Gigue in G major, and Rondo in A minor of Mozart, and the eternal Moto continuo of Weber, one gets almost surfeited, bearing in mind the vast number of compositions by the same masters which Herr Rubinstein never attempts, any more than he attempts (why not?) the Op. 106 of Beethoven.

One would imagine, by the way, to hear the talk about his performance of Mozart's rondo, that such a thing as a pianissimo was never before heard upon the instrument. This he does play charmingly, though not more charmingly than I have heard it played by others. With his rendering of the Gigue I am less satisfied. It is quick—quicker certainly than Mozart ever dreamed of. Could Handel have heard the finale to his D minor variations, he would have taken off his wig, scratched his bare poll, and cried "Vat is dat?" In Weber's always played faster-than-possible Moto continuo, one may picture Herr Rubinstein with Etna in one hand, Vesuvius in another, and Hecla, or Oakeeiko-pōki on his head. Delirium tremens! To the Dii minores (demigods in their way), such as Dussek, Clementi, Woelfl, Hummel, Sterndale Bennett, &c., it cannot be expected that a virtuoso of Herr Rubinstein's stature would condescend; but it might be supposed that Schubert had written more than one sonata worthy his attention. Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor, despite its vaunted Funeral March, and delicate, simpering, boudoir-perfumed episode, is, on the whole, an inferior work to its companion in C minor, neither of them, however, presenting even a tolerable idea of the genuine sonata form, despite the vapouring rhodomontade of Friar Liszt. Then, is there only the "Cat's Fugue" (G minor) in Scarlatti's "Lessons?" Is there not one in F minor, far more beautiful?—and a third, in D minor, equally spirited? Like all sensational pianists, Herr Rubinstein shoots heaps of Chopin, who stands in peril, with his morbidly elegant sentimentality, of becoming something of an infliction. But wherefore so shy of Bülow-Beethoven-Raff?

I always like to hear this fiery virtuoso interpret his own music, though I don't greatly care to hear it interpreted by others. When Herr Rubinstein is in tranquil mood, his playing is absolutely beyond reproach; but when, to employ a homely expression, he "lets loose," and gives the reins to his Pegasus, despite his almost incredible mastery of whip and spur, that famous steed becomes unmanageable, and treats him as Phaeton was treated by the horses of Apollo. Seeing that, according to Herr Rubinstein, the one aim of art in this country is not art, but money, it may be asked why so fierce and uncompromising a champion should, by his visits, make certain epochs historical among us. Of course he does not come for money. Oh no! He comes for art. It is only the poor devils of orchestral players, many of whom, in the time that it takes Herr Rubinstein—with the smallest conceivable stock in trade, and rarely a new article—to gain £12,000, scarcely gain half as many shillings, that think of money and leave art to take care of itself! Being at the most but tepid art-lovers, they will not "leap out to meet" Herr Rubinstein; though, if their salaries were raised, they might probably make a venture, at the risk of breaking their necks. And since the Moldavo-Bessarabian pianist appears to regard "leaping out" as a genuine test of that reverence for art (vice money) which he pronounces non-existent in this country, it might be worth his while to double the salary of every orchestral performer who, on his ascending the steps of the platform, would "leap out to meet him." "Leapers" by the score would be the result, which though it might temporarily incommode Herr Rubinstein, notwithstanding "Il me faut ça" ("en effet"), would certainly amuse the audience. The advertisement of the day might be thus worded:—"Concerto in G major, composed and performed by Herr Rubinstein—previous to which the conductor (Herr Manns), and members of the orchestra will 'leap out' to meet him." The "very nodding" ("very nodding" is good) "Chinaman on the mantelpiece," to which the greatly moved authoress of An Evening with Rubinstein alludes, would be affected. There is a lovely peroration, by the way, to this palpitating effusion:—

"And the last I saw of him was the deep red of a monster cigar, gleaming through the darkness, as he said, 'Good Night!'"

So that Herr Rubinstein had been metamorphosed into "a monster cigar," and, like a Jack-o'-lantern, disappeared, with a faint laugh.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

HERR WILHELM TAUBERT, of Berlin, has just published, at Schlesinger's, his Opus 180—a concerto in A major, for pianoforte, with orchestral accompaniment. This gentleman is almost as prolific as Joachim Raff, the "Beethoven" of Dr Hans von Bülow.

THE performances of Mr Carl Rosa's company in Dublin appear to be more and more in vogue. As usual everywhere, among the most successful are Benedict's Lily of Killarney and Wagner's Flying Dutchman. A new singer, Miss Emma Beasley (soprano), has made "her first appearance on any stage" in the leading part of Balfe's Siege of Rochelle. She was received with great favour, and the local press speaks highly of her. The operas played during the week which ends to-day were to be The Flying Dutchman, Maritana, Robin Hood (Macfarren), The Marriage of Figaro, Faust (with a new tenor), and again (to-night) The Flying Dutchman. The Irish Times has the following:

"Mr Rosa is a staunch believer in the musical talents of the Irish. He has already several Dublin vocalists in his company—notably, Messrs Ludwig and Crotty—and next season will probably have a young Dublin lady amongst his prime donne."

Mr Ludwig has distinguished himself as Vanderdecken, in Wagner's opera, Mr Crotty as Michel in the Siege of Rochelle—both of which parts belonged to Mr Santley, when that famous baritone was a member of the company.

WAGNER, finishing his Parceval at Bayreuth, with another opera in contemplation, is working with his mind at ease. An enthusiastic patron is reported to have paid the deficit of last year's festival.—(From a suspected source.)

MIDLE FERNANDA TEDESCA, the young and highly-promising American violinist who was in England last winter (and whom we hope at some future time to hear in England), has gone to Heiden, in Switzerland, on a visit to some relations. She returns at the end of next month to Paris, to continue her studies under her distinguished professor, M. Henri Vieuxtemps, with whom, we understand, she is making genuine progress.

AT the last classical concert in the Alexandra Palace, under the direction of Mr H. Weist Hill, a young pianist—Miss Florence Sanders—gave a brilliant performance of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, which was received with more than ordinary favour. The young lady is a highly promising pupil of Mr W. H. Holmes.—Tatler.

BUDA-PESTH.—The National Theater re-opened with Aida, the principal characters being sustained by Mad. Thérèse Singer, and Herr August Perotti, the latter from the Stadttheater, Leipzig.

DARMSTADT.—The Court Theatre, being shut up for three months in consequence of the mourning for the death of the Grand Duke, will re-open on the 6th September under the direction of Capellmeister Seydlmayer.

AMERICAN DÉBUTANTES.

(From the "New York Music Trade Review," Aug. 3.)

We publish in to-day's issue a letter sent by Mrs Florence Rice-Knox to an American newspaper, which contains statements worth consideration. If Mrs Knox, or, better, Mdme Ricca, is right, she is the most injured artist that ever lived; insulted by Mr Gye, insulted by the London critics, insulted even by her friends, who—clapped their hands at her début, when there was no earthly reason for doing so. But, if Mdme Ricca exaggerates, she deserves blame and punishment. As far as we are concerned, we hardly believe a word of the whole statement the American lady ventured to volunteer, and we are bold enough to give our reasons for disbelieving her assertions. Mdme Ricca speaks of her success in Malta as of an event in musical history. A success in Malta does not mean anything, and a young, handsome woman can easily gain it there, even if her artistic merits are somewhat inferior, because the officers of the British garrison form the principal part of the operatic audiences; and those gentlemen are very lenient towards operatic attempts of fair débutantes. A success in Malta would be of about the same value as a success in Adrian, Michigan, to the inhabitants of which place Mdme Ricca's letter is directed. But the letter is sent to an American newspaper for publication, and, consequently, belongs to the world. If the letter were a communication to a private person, we should refrain from entering into this affair of a lady; the communication is made by an "artist" to an "Editor," and Mdme Ricca has to bear the consequences of her, at least, imprudent step. Mdme Ricca was engaged by Mr Gye, of the London Covent Garden Theatre, sang Leonora in La Favorita, and the contract between her and her London manager was cancelled, or, as the technical term reads, she was "protested" by her manager. Mdme Ricca accuses Mr Gye, Mdme Scalchi, and the London critics; she dreams of a premeditated conspiracy against her, but confesses, in her own statement that the last act did not go so well on account of nervousness. Whoever knows Donizetti's Favorita must own that this last act is the climax of the prima donna's rôle, and a singer who has failed in this act has made an undeniable fiasco. People in Adrian, Michigan, might not know that exactly, but opera-goers in New York, London, and Paris do. Besides, we lack comprehension of a lady singer who gets nervous at the end of her début. We know of many débutantes, who appeared trembling during the first scene, and mustered courage so far that their talents were developed and shown to their best advantage while the opera proceeded, but we cannot understand how a success of three acts (such as Mdme Ricca claims for herself) can intimidate a débutante so that the climax of her rôle falls flat. It is absurd to say such nonsense, but still more absurd to presume that other people will believe it. Mdme Ricca, it is clear, made what we should call a fiasco d'estime, and is either too proud to own it, or does not know her own capabilities. Why should Gye intrigue against her? He is glad enough to get cheap artists, and would be still more glad in keeping those artists, their success having been assured. But even cheap artists are too expensive for an impresario, after their fiasco has been established through the entire press, and very likely through the verdict of the audience, except the friends of the débutante. As to Mdme Scalchi, it is rather cool on the part of Mdme Ricca to accuse an accomplished artist, with a long-established reputation, of being jealous of her, a mere beginner. If Mdme Ricca were really better than Mdme Scalchi, no intrigues would have helped the latter lady. A real success can impossibly be prevented; the public of a metropolis is not to be so easily guided or misguided in this regard. Mdme Ricca charges the English press with black-mail—a serious charge, which ought to be resented by every honest journalist throughout the world. There is no doubt that some of the London critics will sell their favourable opinions, as some critics do everywhere. But this transaction deserves by no means the charge of black-mail.† As long as Mdme Ricca cannot prove that her "début" was unfavourably criticised in the papers on account of her not seeing the writers, she has made a grave accusation without being able to sustain it. Among the thirty or forty London musical critics there are surely honest men enough who would scorn any monetary offer made to them by an operatic "débutante," and are not likely to sell their frank opinion for a couple of pounds, through which a singer, with a very limited salary, might try to bribe them."

* It would have been only fair to those who don't "sell their favourable opinions" to specify those who do.—D. P.

† In the name of honesty what else is it?—D. P.

Mdme Ricca accuses the English and Italians as two nations which will prevent the rise of American talent. Shall we prove, with one single instance, that Mdme Ricca is entirely wrong? We name Emma Albani. This lady, being an American, is one of the leading stars in London, and in her own country the public showed her the cold shoulder. When Mdme Ricca, in the last paragraph of her letter, declares that the critics were untruthful, and Mr Gye's assertion, that her voice was not powerful enough for the stage at Covent Garden, an absurdity, she does not say anything new. It is just the same thing hundreds of singers have said before her, but not one of those singers ever made a success in all their lives. Take the worst possible singer in the world, and he will tell you just the very words Mdme Ricca has uttered. If the American lady would study seriously, instead of sending letters to American editors, she would act very wisely, and, maybe, avoid in future time any necessity of further correspondence in the same tenor. Otherwise, we are afraid Mdme Ricca will have the chance of writing some more letters, in which she will be obliged to accuse managers, critics, and singers of other cities. The result, however, might be more injurious for the plaintiff than for the defendants.

The letter Mdme Ricca has sent is that of a spoiled, naughty child, and we hardly had thought it worth while paying any attention to it, if we did not consider it as a specimen of a quantity of letters which American operatic débütantes send over to this country. It is true, not all of these letters find their way into newspaper columns; but often enough we read of successes American ladies made on operatic stages in Europe, and, we regret to say, only in one case out of fifty the report has the truth on its side.

Only last winter we had the best proof of falsified European criticisms. Fact is that Mdme Emma Abbott never made a success on any operatic stage in Europe, and when she came over here, her manager, the renowned De Vivo, tried to explain to the public the reasons why the lady had left the European stage. Religious feelings had to lend their aid. Mdme Abbott had refused to sing La Traviata, on account of moral objections, and the managers in Paris and London, for the sake of these moral objections, had to renounce her services. Glorious idea! Well, we have heard the Daughter of the Regiment, and we could easily understand that any manager might willingly renounce the services of Mdme Abbott, and that, if not moral objections, artistic ability would prevent the lady from singing La Traviata. Christine Nilsson and Clara Louise Kellogg have both the Traviata on their repertoire, and neither of these renowned artists had ever the slightest stain on their reputation. Mdme Abbott wanted the assistance of the church-people here; therefore, the moral objections to the Dame aux Camélias. Mdme Abbott might last for one or more seasons in concerts in America; for the operatic stage she is to be considered dead, as well in America as in Europe.

We have some renowned American prime donne, Albani, Kellogg, Cary; America can boast of very valuable operatic singers, who will build up their career in an honourable way; but when all the American girls and women who study for the stage with European teachers believe that a study of two or three years makes them great, secures them a position, when puffs will do the rest, they are decidedly mistaken. Let Wartel, Lamperti, Manuel Garcia, Mdme Marchesi, San Giovanni, Pierini, and all the other singing-masters of reputation take the money of these ladies; they might teach them a good deal, but, where the real talent is lacking, the best teacher in the world will not help them to a reputation which managers, critics, or the public will recognise. There are too many American singers in the market. Everybody wants to be a "star," and in most cases darkness takes the place of shining splendour. Genius makes the operatic star; Talent, the good singer; if talent pretends to be genius, the fiasco is unavoidable, and leads good artists to ruin. Suum cuique.

An opera-comique by M. Codes, entitled Le Chevalier de Lartignac, (libretto by M. Dias) has been produced at Dieppe. Another, music by Delfès, libretto by MM. de Leuven and Adenis, has been given with success at Rouen. It is entitled La Trompette de Chamboran.

* This is remarkably considerate on the part of our New York contemporary! Call us at once the "Forty Thieves,"—D. P.

DR CROFT.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Among your list of notable events connected with music, for August, you have neglected to mention the death of Dr Croft, on the 14th—an event surely noteworthy by all English musicians.

Yours truly,
[Although the list was not ours, "E. P." is heartily thanked.—

WAIFS.

ALEXANDER PALACE.—The Promenade Concerts at this popular resort continue to be well attended on the Thursday and Saturday evenings, and the various performances by the fine body of instrumentalists under the direction of their admirable conductor, Mr Weist Hill (Alfred Mellon's successor as our English Costa), are highly appreciated. The vocal portion of the entertainment is also well worthy notice. On Thursday evening, the 16th inst., the singers were Mdme Ziméri, her first appearance at the Alexandra Palace, and Mr Wilford Morgan. Mdme Ziméri who gave the Page's song from the Huguenots, and Donizetti's cavatina, "O luce di quest' anima," was warmly received and called after each performance. Mr Wilford Morgan, a general favourite here, sang Meyerbeer's "Fishermidwife," and the "Bay of Biscay," being unanimously summoned back to the platform after the latter.

Mr and Mrs J. B. Jewson and family are now in Ramsgate.

Dr Hans von Bülow has been drinking the waters at Creuznach.

M. and Mad. Lemmens (Sherrington) were at Paris a short time since.

L'Africaine will be put in rehearsal at the Grand Opera at the end of the month.

Mdme Ethelka Gardini-Gerster will remain at Pesth till the autumn season.

Herr Wilhelmj is slowly recovering from his severe illness, at his villa at Mosbach.

Herr Theodor Wachtel contemplates fixing his permanent residence in Berlin.

Mad. Marie Cabel is gradually recovering her speech and the use of the paralyzed arm.

Herr Franz Nachbaur is engaged to sing at Rome, next spring, the part of Lohengrin in Italian.

Only 16,000 marks have, up to this time, been collected towards the Spohr Monument at Cassel.

A catalogue of Richard Wagner's Literary Works has been published by E. Kastner, in Vienna.

Mdlle Aimée, with a small operatic, or rather operettatic, company, has left for the United States.

Mdlle Teresa Singer, the Paris Aida at the Opéra Italien, has been performing in Verdi's great work at Pesth.

Mdlle Richard, a new member of the Paris Grand Opera company, will make her first appearance in La Favorite.

Mr Handel Gear has returned from his visit to Germany, and will join his family next week in the Isle of Thanet.

Herr Richard Wagner has returned to "Wahnfried," Bayreuth. He is working at Parcival, and still another opera.

A new three-act comic opera, La Lectrice de l'Infante, by M. Serpette, is in preparation at the Bouffes Parisiens.

Before being created a Russian noble, Anton Rubinstein had received a patent of nobility from the King of Denmark.

Herr G. Beck, the bass barytone, is about to marry Mdlle Maria von Hamm, "leading juvenile lady" at the Töplitz Theatre.

The Cluny Theatre, in Paris, has in preparation a scientific play, by M. and Mad. Louis Figuié, entitled Six parties du Monde.

It is proposed to found in Rome a school for female students of music, sculpture, and painting, on the model of the Art School at Milan.

Herr Georg Unger, the Siegfried of the Bayreuth Festival, will shortly become a member of the company at the Leipsic Stadt-theater.

The King of Holland has conferred the order of the Oaken Crown on MM. Emile Bourgeois and Edouard Broustel, pianists and composers.

A new play, entitled England in the days of Charles II. (founded on Peveril of the Peak, by W. G. Wills, is to be produced shortly at Drury Lane Theatre.

Offenbach, in association with MM. Calvot and Duru, has finished a new comic opera entitled Mademoiselle Favart, the leading part in which is destined for Mdlle Girard.

The Campobello-Sinico Concert Company will give two grand promenade concerts on the Covent Garden system, towards the end of October, at the Exhibition Palace, Dublin.

Mad. Mathilde Ziméri, the attractive young vocalist, who met with so favourable a reception at the Alexandra Palace last week, is to sing again at the concert to be given this day (Saturday).

Herr von Flotow's new opera, Die Musikanten, the libretto of which is founded (as we have said already) on an episode in the life of Mozart, will be produced in Italian, at Turin, next October.

The proceedings of the third session of the Musical Association for the investigation and discussion of subjects connected with the art and science of music, have been published by Messrs Chappell.

Liszt will shortly leave Weimar for a prolonged stay at Rome. Since the death of Cardinal Antonelli, the relations between his Holiness and the musical Abbate have re-assumed somewhat of their former cordiality.

M. Victor Massé, who has been in a bad state of health for a considerable time, is taking a six months' holiday. It is not announced who temporarily replaces him as Professor of Composition at the Conservatory.

M. Edouard Philippe, business manager of the Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris, formerly director of Les Enfants de Paris, has been named "Officier d'Académie" for his ten years' services rendered to Orpheonic institutions of France.

The Conservatory has this year furnished seven young artists to the operatic stage of Paris—M. Jourdan, Mdme Castillon, Mdles Carol and Mendez, to the Opéra-Comique; M. Talazac, to the Théâtre-Lyrique; M. Sellier and Mdle Richard to the Grand-Opéra.

Herr Josef Gungl, at present in Hamburg, and favourably known as military Capellmeister, has entered the lists as operatic composer, and set the libretto of Rothkäppchen (Little Red Riding Hood). Some of the music, introduced at his concerts, was favourably received.

We hear that Mr Francis Howell has completed a new cantata entitled The Song of the Months, the libretto by Sarah Phoebe Howell. The copyright has been purchased by Messrs John Boosey & Co. Songs from the work have been appearing in the Musical World during the last seven months.

The Meyerbeer Prize has been awarded by the Royal Academy of Prussia to Herr Arnold Krug, teacher in Stern's Conservatory, Berlin. In 1869, the same gentleman carried off the Mozart Foundation Prize, at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, and in 1870 the Prize of the "Musikalische Gartenlaube," Leipzig.

In this day's Figaro, "Cherubino" writes:—"Mr and Mdme Lemmens-Sherrington have been staying in Paris, where the lady has, I am told, been engaged for a series of concerts at the Exhibition Palace at the Trocadéro next year. At one time there was a feeling against British-born artists in Paris, but now, since the success of Mdme Patey and Mdme Arabella Goddard in the French capital, more liberal ideas have prevailed, and the artistic entente cordiale between the two nations bids fair to be further strengthened.

Miss Furtado's death leaves a distinct gap in the ranks of our comédiennes—I would use an English word if I could, but there is not one. I saw her first appearance in Ixion at the Royalty, a piece which, curiously enough, introduced to the public at least four distinguished actresses of the present day, and I ventured then to predict for her a brilliant future. My prediction, I am glad to know, was more than verified; and, had Miss Furtado lived, she would probably have become the best actress of her day in a certain line of parts.—Tattler.

Several papers have asserted that Mdme Patti was not asked to sing this year at the Royal Concerts. Mdme Patti was not only asked to sing, but her name was announced in the official list. Some few days before the concert for which Mdme Patti was engaged she was compelled, by the advice of her medical attendants, to decline the honour intended her, and Mdle Gerster was, I believe, substituted. It has further been stated that Mdme Patti telegraphed to America her acceptance of an engagement with M. Strakosch. That gentleman is at present in this country, and the engagement is still under Mdme Patti's consideration.—The Theatre.

A curious theatrical case has been before the Vienna law courts. Some time ago Herr Loewe, a theatrical critic of the Neue Freie Presse, received a letter from Fräulein Olma, enclosing a bank-note for a hundred florins, and requesting him to speak favourably of her performance. He sent back the bank-note, with a letter saying that he and his colleagues were guided in their criticism by the merits of artists and not by money considerations. Fräulein Olma apologised, and explained that she had acted upon the advice of the leader of the claque. Thereupon Herr Loewe commenced criminal proceedings against the leader of the claque. The defence set up was that Fräulein Olma had mistaken the name, and that the defendant had referred her to a nephew of his, named Löwy, an advertisement canvasser. But, unfortunately for this defence, he had given the address of the critic of the Neue Freie Presse, and, moreover, Fräulein Olma had received a visit from the nephew, and had given him a note for a hundred florins. The court sentenced defendant to three months' imprisonment.—The Theatre.

Mdme Liebhart's concert scheme in connection with the Flower and Fruit Show at the Agricultural Hall, and announced in the Figaro of July 28th, is taking definite proportions. Sir Julius Benedict, Messrs Kingsbury, G. B. Allen, and Ganz will conduct; there will be an orchestra of eighty, and four military bands; while the solo vocalists already engaged are Mesdames Edith Wynne, Liebhart, Anna Bishop (who will make her first appearance since her return from the Antipodes), Osborne Williams, Enriquez, and Sterling, Misses Giulia Warwick, Frances Brooke, Sinclair, Rhoda Temple, Derby and Elton, Messrs Lloyd, Cummings, Parren, Pearson, Wilford Morgan, Vernon Rigby, Maybrick, Wadmore, Thurley Beale, and Lewis Thomas. In addition to this imposing list of singers there have been engaged, as solo instrumentalists, Misses Albrecht, Brouil, and Frances Thomas, Messrs Ganz, Tito Mattei, Cheshire, Watson, Pettit, White, Young, Hutchins, Sanders, and T. Harper. The concerts will begin next Tuesday, August 28th, and for the first Saturday concert, on September 1, Miss Giulia Warwick has been retained.—Figaro.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 6d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

NEW PIANOFORTE PIECE BY MADAME OURY. "CONSOLATION."

Easy of execution, but melodious and effective. Price 4s.; Half-price Cash or Stamps.

"We wonder who has not, in the hour of trouble, more than once derived comfort from the sweet sounds such as David must have used to mollify the troubled spirit of Saul. What better name, then, to give a graceful strain of peaceful melody, such as must convey to the sorrowing heart feelings of rest and sympathy, than 'Consolation'?" Such is the title of a charming new pianoforte composition by that indefatigable and prolific writer, Mdme Oury; prolific indeed, for the piece bears no lower an Opus number than 185. Its flow of peaceful melody, enhanced by the delicacy and variety of the accompaniment, and harmonised in the masterly style of an experienced writer, well fulfils the object of the title. In every sense of the word is 'Consolation' an admirable piece of music, and it must rank among Mdme Oury's best efforts of the kind. As a morceau de salon it is of moderate difficulty, and of sufficient brilliance to display the capacities of a proficient performer. The composition is dedicated to Mrs Graver-Browne, of Morley Hall, and published by Messrs Paterson & Sons, of Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c."

Musical matters at that time in Germany were entirely swayed by Italian opera. Not only to Germany, but to all parts of Europe, did Italy send forth her art-versed sons and daughters. Italy was then regarded as the high school, properly speaking, of music, as of sculpture and painting. Whoever wished to achieve anything in his own country had to prove he had studied in Italy. Otherwise he was held of no account. It was more especially the pupils of the so-called Neapolitan school who helped Italian music to this unconditional supremacy; and it cannot be denied that the school in question had really produced masters of great eminence. We will here mention, besides Scarlatti, only Francesco Durante, Leonardo Leo, Niccolò Porpora—Farinelli's master—Pergolesi, Jomelli, Piccini, Sacchini, Traetta, and Paisiello. These eminent men were certainly not to blame because, in course of time, the outward accessories began to overweigh the internal substance; that a period of general deterioration set in; and that, instead of being the fruit of a progressive system of development in a talented brain, the act of composing an opera was a mere speculation, the result of simple machinery set in motion to order. The machinery, however, did its duty. It brought the composer fame, profitable places, and princely presents. These were the sole objects at which he aimed; art as such was quite a secondary matter, and necessarily so, for the princely customers and sovereigns he served did not want art-pleasures; they desired amusement for the senses, and with such it was the first object of opera to supply them. Brilliant scenery, marvellous mechanical effects, gorgeous processions, sweet melodies, and beautiful female singers, together with the sensually intoxicating tones and virtuosity of the castrati—all had to be combined to make opera what it ought to be. The Italian opera which then ruled supremely everywhere turned on one single point: love-making, nothing but love-making. It had little of the drama, or indeed of aught like action about it; it was merely a vehicle for spectacle, in which music as music was but a secondary consideration, while the mounting of the piece and the virtuosity of the singers constituted the first. Musical art was restricted to the composer's writing the greatest possible number of airs for the leading lady and the first singer, who were always rivals—airs in which both could exhibit all their artistic skill. As for a passing situation or a gleam of truth—who ever thought of such trifles? It was the singers, male and female, the machinery and the scenery, which made up the entire substance of the opera. The heads of Italian-German opera, also, Johann Adolf Hasse in Dresden, and Carl Heinrich Graun in Berlin, followed strictly in the paths struck out by the Italians. If German feeling peeped forth now and then, the instances of it were only shooting stars, and possessed no importance. Italian opera became more and more vapid. The once so proud stream, flowing through smiling meadows, had terminated in a scanty desert, and crept along only with difficulty to its goal. German art, I may here parenthetically observe, pursued totally different paths. It might be inspired by Italian art, when the latter was flourishing, but it could not rise from the ruins of that art. At the time of which we are speaking, however, Italian opera was still exclusively dominant. In every large city all musical life revolved around Italian music alone—and such was the case in Leipsic, also, though other influences managed to assert themselves to a certain degree there, as Leipsic was somewhat distant from Dresden, the seat of the opera. With the termination of the Seven Years' War, the so-called "Grand Concerts" had once more sprung into life under the direction of Johann Adam Hiller. They were intended to introduce to the public the best instrumental and vocal works. Each concert consisted of two parts. The first part comprised a symphony—an overture, as we should now call it—an aria, a concerto, a divertissement for several instruments, sometimes a quartet, and sometimes a solo or a chorus from an opera; in the second part, another symphony, an air, and, to wind up, a piece for the entire orchestra were given. All these compositions were selected with the greatest care, and well rehearsed, every piece being fully explained in all its details to the executants. Thus it came to pass that the concerts quickly obtained an exceptional reputation, extending far beyond the walls of Leipsic, and this reputation they owed to their "Father Hiller." This worthy man's portrait greets us from his own biographical sketches, which render perfectly intelligible the love and respect he enjoyed among his pupils and the public. How different is the expression of his face from that characterising the stern features of Johann Sebastian Bach, his great predecessor as Cantor at St Thomas's School, though Hiller did not, it is true, fill the post till many years after Bach's decease. Bach was already dead when Hiller went as a student to Leipsic. This Johann Adam Hiller is a strange figure, but he is the more important, because, though living in the very palmiest days of Italian art-supremacy, and penetrated with the deepest respect for Italian masters, he was the father and founder of German operetta. The first impulse was given by Koch, a Leipsic theatrical manager. This person had a comic subject taken from the English and arranged by an author called Christian Felix Weisse, as early as 1752, and a musician, named Standfuss, wrote the music for it. Under the title: Der Teufel ist los oder die verwandelten Weiber (The Devil is let loose, or the Women Transformed), the piece, with a second part, Der lustige Schuster (The Merry Cobbler), proved extremely successful. In consequence of the war, it soon disappeared, however, from publicity, not cropping up again till 1765. Weisse remodelled it, and wrote some fresh songs, the setting of which was entrusted to Adam Hiller. The latter displayed such felicitous skill, and took such interest in this new kind of stage composition, that he tried his own hand upon some books by Schiebeler. But the notion of an original German Singspiel (singing-piece, piece interspersed with songs) was first awakened with full force in Weisse by the movements to which opera buffa had given rise in Paris, and, to ensure the notion's speedily bearing fruit, he allied himself with Adam Hiller. It was thus that the operettas of Lottchen am Hofe, Die Liebe auf dem Lande, Die Jagd, Der Erntekranz, and many others, sprang into existence. And this happened at a period when no male or even female German singer could be found on the German stage. What was thought in musical circles of the matter, even after Hiller's operettas enjoyed the most general approbation of the public will be best seen from a letter written by Reichardt, who observes: "With regard to the representation of the operettas, I will simply say thus much: I have invariably pitied the composer with all my heart for taking the trouble to write any more than street ballads for such singers; whenever there was one of Hiller's airs, full of noble sentiment and expression, I pictured him to myself singing it, full of warm feeling, to me at the piano, and then had to listen to the singing of that big-mouthed, screeching woman and the watchman's voice of the lover." Adam Hiller is even a still more important figure than he would have been, from the fact of his having remedied this evil as well as others. It is he who formed the first great German women singers, such as Gertrude Schmähling and Corona Schröter, who were eventually able not merely to compete with Italian singers of their own sex, but victoriously to drive them off the field. Gertrude Schmähling went to this remarkable man, who no sooner perceived her great vocal talent than he firmly resolved to undertake the task of training it. The father's avaricious plans formed, it is true, no inconsiderable obstacle; in Hiller's opinion a great deal, nay, almost everything, was wanting to complete the young vocalist's education, while, according to the view taken by her father, she required no more instruction, but simply an introduction to the musical world. As concerns the girl herself, she was already sufficiently sensible to entertain grave doubts of her own capabilities. She had heard singers enough to know that she was no particularly shining light. The separation of father and daughter was, therefore, the principal condition, if the plan was to come to anything. But this was difficult of accomplishment, for even Gertrude's firm refusal to follow her father one step more on the path hitherto pursued, remained without effect. Paternal tyranny was not overcome till Gertrude promised to allow her father a fixed annual sum. Whence, however, was she to obtain it? Father Hiller hit upon a scheme. The encouragement with which his concerts had met enabled him to engage her as leading vocalist with a fixed salary. This had the desired result. Old Schmähling at length yielded, and handed his daughter over unconditionally to her new teacher.

Richard Wagner's Stage-Festival Play.*

Heretofore it has been held sovereign law, in an opera text, to compress the action as much as possible; because, through the greater space which the music by its very nature always occupies, the progress of the work must drag somewhat in any case. Now whether what is sung consists of recitatives, arias, or duets, etc., or of unmelodic "infinite melody;" whether the orchestra is treated only as an accompaniment, or as a principal person in the conversation; whether the centre of gravity be placed in the human voices or in the instruments, always the word sung demands more time than the work spoken. Hence in a good libretto all that is unessential, all unnecessary repetitions had to be excluded, while reflections and philosophical inquiries had to be renounced as far as possible. But Wagner, we know, will write no operas in the traditional sense; so all these rules never trouble him. The drama of the future, therefore, has become a drama of long-windedness for the present. Such never ending, wearisome, indifferent jabberers, chewing over and over what is already familiar, the stage has never seen except in the Ring des Nibelungen; never was the action dragged out to such length; or, to the dismay of the hearers, expanded to such breadth through unessential and uninteresting episodes; never was a public and its claims to artistic enjoyment so recklessly disregarded and kept upon the rack, as here. Often have we heard the text-book of the Nibelungen Ring celebrated as a master-work of dramatic poetry. But it was by those who knew it only from reading it. The reading of a play very often produces a wholly different, even an opposite effect from its performance on the stage. Readers of the Wagner poems might feel no shock at many faults in them, which to the public, present at the representations, were intolerable. One who was never weary of praising the book, must have been of another mind after attending the performance. A judgment on the text or music for an opera is only possible after its right to live has been tested on the stage. And just as little as from a book, can an authoritative judgment pass upon an opera from a pianoforte arrangement or a score. Poetry and music singly, each in and for itself, may appear excellent, yet both united fail of all effect.

The song as such, the voice part, in the Nibelungen Trilogy, is likewise a monstrosity, a brutal mockery of all that the world has hitherto recognised as beautiful and desirable. It throws us back at once three centuries, into the time when the first attempts at Opera were made. These too consisted solely of recitatives. But the singing voice, not enslaved and crushed by the instrumentation, was at least able to predominate a perfected declamation, a simple Cantilena, satisfying to the ear, a natural and unconstrained conduct of the parts, was even then regarded as the composer's most important task. And notwithstanding, when we read, in the enthusiastic descriptions of these performances, that an Italian public at the end of the sixteenth century listened to the Musica Dramas (this designation also is an old one) of Caccini, Peri, and Monteverde in the highest rapture, we can scarcely believe it. These Dramas per musica, sung in the stilo rappresentativo or recitativo, certainly bored the hearers then, as much as the Trilogy has bored us to-day; the reports of such proceedings were just as deceptive, as many which were sent out to all the world from Bayreuth; and the great mass of the seventeenth century, in its opinions and expressions about Art, was just as much terrorised and tricked into a hypocritical enthusiasm, as that of the nineteenth, while in its heart it certainly thought quite otherwise.

But not only do we see ourselves transported back to these beginnings of dramatic efforts. Wagner's treatment of the voice parts resembles in a fearful manner that of the Madrigalists of Orlando Lasso's time. Then it was the practice to print vocal works in several parts under the title: "To be sung or used on instruments." One could, for example, set a five-part song with three voice parts and two instruments, or with one voice part and four instruments, according as the fitting voices or instruments were available. This barbaric manner of song writing is what Wagner has brought back to us; for his voice parts are in fact only middle parts, without independent personality, only made to fit as well as may be into the thematic wild beast hunt of the orchestra. Drop out the part of Wotan altogether, or let a bass trombone blow it, the effect will be all the same, and the singer not be missed a moment.*

As a further musical absurdity, it must be mentioned, that the ideal contents (the musical subject matter) of the Trilogy reduces itself to an immense number of leading motives (Leit-motiven), which float up and down and cross one another in the orchestra, incessantly, as if caught in a process of fermentation. Down in that "mystical abyss" it boils as in a witches' cauldron; down there, in fact, you have to seek for the main matter; but the attention is continually drawn thereby away from the action and to mere accessories. And, as a further consequence of this arrangement, the musical interest, to which there is less and less that is new offered as the work goes on, and which sees itself continually referred to the same old motives, towards the end grows weaker and weaker, till it finally dies out. But what musical enjoyment has a hearer, who cannot understand and follow the leading motives at all?† If, poetically, the Götterdämmerung is the most successful part of the Trilogy, musically it is the weakest and most tiresome, the poorest in invention, since it is made up almost exclusively of old and long since played out phrases. Of all Wagner's vagaries this on the field of the Leit-motiv is the most unfortunate; for in no way could he more evidently betray the weakness of his creative power to the world, than through this helpless mania of wishing to enchain a theatre public with tone-figures which for the most part say nothing, and which keep repeating themselves through four long evenings?

Not less pernicious than the musical are the scenic innovations—with the exception of the removal of the prompter's box. The excessive importance attached to decorations, machinery, and effects of light, is oppressive and unartistic; and the darkened auditorium is a worthy side-piece to the underground orchestra. The Rheingold and Walküre have always made a certain effect in the Munich performances; in Bayreuth by the second evening the exhaustion and satiety were universal. Whence came it? In Munich, during the intolerable length of the representation, one could at least occupy himself with his surroundings, with his fellow-sufferers; but in Bayreuth every help was cut off. There, if one found not a mild comforter in sleep, he could only count in despair the bald pates which glimmered faintly through the deep twilight of the auditorium.‡

Borne down by the cares of the world, and oppress
In mind as in body, I laid me to rest;
The exquisite couch and the stillness profound
Well promised to hush me to slumber as sound.
But that fickle Somnus, of whom the control
Seems but to the cottager given,
Denied me his boon, till, like balm to the soul,
There came the sweet music of heaven.

I lay in a trance;—oft a clear, silv'ry note
On the vast sea of ether so softly would float;
And lower and fainter 'twould melt in the skies,
Then quickly return, and majesticly rise.
I listen'd enthral'd to the harmony grand,
As it echoed through infinite space;—
The whirlwind which sweeps from the desert its sand
Is a zephyr compared in the race.

Alternately swelling exultant and gay,
And then in rich cadences dying away;
As billows upheaved from an ocean of sound
Roll proudly afar, and a ripple is found.
I rose with a feeling of thankful delight
To Him who such solace had given,
Who had wafted my spirit from earth that night
To hear the sweet music of heaven.

John Hullah Speaks.

[REPORT FOR THE YEAR 1876, BY JOHN HULLAH, ESQ., INSPECTOR OF MUSIC, ON THE EXAMINATION IN MUSIC OF THE STUDENTS OF TRAINING COLLEGES IN GREAT BRITAIN.]

MY LORDS,—I beg leave to submit to your Lordships my report on the training colleges of Great Britain for the year 1876, the fifth I have had the honour to lay before you since my appointment as Inspector of Music.

One college (Aberdeen Free Church, for schoolmistresses) has been added to the number of those I inspected last year, making, in England and Wales, 40, and in Scotland 7, four of which latter have departments for students of both sexes, raising the whole number practically to 51. The number of students, with a few exceptions all of the second year, presented for examination has been unprecedentedly large, 1,964, being 116 in excess of the largest number, 1,848, of any former year—that of 1874.

Though the quality of the instruction given in the colleges continues to improve, and the number of students who take advantage of it to increase, I regret having again to record that there is no sensible decrease in the number of those who enter them without any musical skill or science whatever, and that even of those who know something of the art the accomplishment of the majority is very small indeed. Of the 1,964 students, the majority of whom had been pupil-teachers, 803 reported themselves as having entered their colleges wholly ignorant of music. All that need now be said—not for the first time—in respect to this is, that the majority of these unprepared students can only be enabled to teach children to sing from notes “satisfactorily” by a sacrifice of time which the colleges are unable to make, and by an amount of labour on the part of the students which it is unreasonable to expect should be long sustained. The musical knowledge needed for this may be attainable at any age, and it is often attained in a very short time; but the musical skill, or rather the power of associating musical symbols with musical sounds is a power the difficulty of attaining which—altogether unconnected with the particular symbols employed—increases with every year of our lives. This association is easy for children, difficult for “young persons,” and all but impossible for those in and beyond middle life. Being the basis of all real musical accomplishment, it is easy to see how important it is that it be attempted—and if attempted it will generally be acquired—early. I am not without hope that the practical examinations in music of candidates for admission into training colleges recently instituted will do something to raise the standard of skill among such candidates. I am more sanguine concerning the future preparation of pupil-teachers by means of the schoolmasters and schoolmistresses who have left the training colleges during the last few years. But the only certain remedy for this evil, to which I have so often referred, is the more general real teaching of singing in elementary schools, a subject on which I shall venture to speak at greater length presently. To return for a moment to that immediately before us.

The difference between the prepared and the unprepared students has been more strikingly brought before me this year than on any former occasion by an anxious musical instructor, who poignantly expressed his regret that I was not authorised to examine his first-year pupils instead of his second. The former, he said, already knew and could do more than the latter, an assertion I found quite justified by their subsequent combined performance, and by their answers to a few questions I put to some of them individually.

These “unprepared” students are an interesting subject of study for one who, like me, has occasion to test their powers in so many instances. They are to be recognised directly—I had almost said before—they begin to sing, by a variety of nervous and awkward tricks; by the manner in which they receive and hold the books or music given to them to sing from, by beating time with their heels, toes, knees, heads, or whole bodies—anything but their right hands—and especially by poking at, often actually hiding, with their fingers, the notes they are trying to sing. But I have already, perhaps, said enough—if not enough to be effectual—on this subject. I will only quote an observation made to me recently by an experienced musical instructor in a training college, apropos to it: “What our students begin here they generally learn with difficulty, do badly, and forget soon.”

I am glad to have to report that the number of “failures”—instances in which the candidates have exhibited so little practical skill that I have had to forbid their taking the music paper at the Christmas examination—has been this year unprecedentedly small, amounting only to 16. Of these no fewer than 15 were in Scottish training colleges. It would be unfair to argue from this any inferiority, incapability, or inclination for music, on the part of the Scottish people. It is the simple result of a very obvious cause. Music is an imitative art, and in the remote and thinly populated parts of every country musical performance is rare. Many of the students in the Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen normal schools come from districts answering this description. “Till I came here,” said a Glasgow student to me once, “I never even saw a piano.” This inaptitude, still absurdly called “natural,” will gradually disappear as competent teachers multiply; and this they are doing in Scotland. Not only is vocal music skilfully and zealously taught in the Scottish training schools, but instrumental also, and far more systematically and generally than in the English. In the Church of Scotland normal schools at Edinburgh, as I have more than once reported, the pianoforte is very efficiently taught, at the smallest conceivable expenditure of time and money, to the majority of the female students. This example has been imitated at Aberdeen (Church of Scotland), where 36 students, in classes of four each, receive instruction from a resident professor, Mr. Adrington.

But during my recent tours my time has been so closely occupied in examination in vocal music, that I have been unable to ascertain with any precision what is being done, in the English schools, in instrumental. That in a somewhat unsystematic and unrecognised way a good deal of instrumental practice goes on, is certain. In a much larger number of instances than before, students have been “accompanied” this year by fellow-students in the prepared solos they have sung to me; some even have accompanied themselves, and efficiently. At Culham the band of wind instruments formed last year still exists; its instruction, practice, and management being as before carried on, of course with the sanction of the principal, without any professional aid, i.e., among the students themselves. At Liverpool, Wandsworth, Lincoln, York, and possibly now in some other colleges, all the students receive instruction in instrumental music; and in several others, instruction is made accessible to those who show a desire for it. But instruction, recognised and systematic, like Mr. Mackenzie’s at Edinburgh, is, I think, quite exceptional in England. That its general introduction would be attended with some difficulty is certain; that this difficulty is not insurmountable is shown in the fact of its being given, even in a single college. I believe that an instance of recent opposition to its introduction to a female training school which lately came to my knowledge is exceptional, and indeed, it is to be hoped, unique. The present musical instructor—a professor of the highest rank, and full of zeal for the students whom, at considerable inconvenience and loss to himself, he is instructing—offered, without cost to the college, to enable a certain number of those who had learnt something of the pianoforte before their admission, to continue to resume their practice. The offer was declined at once, on the plea that such practice would not only interfere with their other work, but did not become persons of their station in life.

We have learnt—from Mrs. Malaprop—that “thought does not become a young woman”; it is new to hear—from an education committee, too—that to accompany a school song, possibly even to play a pretty tune to her scholars now and then, “does not become a school-mistress.”

ORGAN RECITAL AT SOUTHAMPTON.

Mr R. Sharpe, on Tuesday, gave another of a series of recitals on the organ in All Saints’ Church, Southampton, a three manual instrument of thirty-six stops, erected by Bevington & Son some ten years or more ago. The earlier recitals having been devoted to the works of Bach, Handel, and other composers. Yielding to a generally expressed wish, a modern programme was made up for Tuesday, as follows, and was listened to by a very full audience, filling the spacious galleries, which included a number of organists belonging to the town:—

March, Valour and Faith (Gritton); Andante in G (Batiste); Air, varied, composed for Holsworthy Church bells (Wesley); Offertoire in C, from Modern Organist (Wely); Andante con var. (Rea); Pastorale and Finale from Organ Sonata (Guilmant).

The executive power of Mr Sharpe is generally known, and on Tuesday he maintained his well-earned reputation. His stopping and happy combinations, particularly in the Andante by Batiste and the Pastorale of Guilmant, were all that could be desired. We have to thank him, the rector, and churchwardens, for three quarters of an hour’s most intellectual and perfect enjoyment.—(From a Correspondent.)

BAYREUTH.—The news from Wiesbaden that Richard Wagner had finished his new opera, Parceval, is unfounded.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—Permit me to say, in answer to an article in your columns of Aug. 4th, signed by that justly-celebrated and highly-esteemed composer, John Barnett, that I never, to my recollection, read the words of his song entitled "Your God is there," until now, in connection with his remarks upon a fancied resemblance between that production and a little song of mine that appeared in The Musical World of July 28th.

I beg the favour of your inserting them both, that those who are interested may judge of this resemblance.

YOUR GOD IS THERE.

"Before you stands a mountain,
Whose summit is in air,
Now mark it with devotion,
For behold! your God is there."

"Oh, dwelleth there our Father?
Is that His home above?
I mark it with devotion,
And I gaze on it with love!"

"Behold the sparkling ocean,
Rolling vast and wide:
Beneath its briny waters
The Almighty doth abide."

"Oh, dwells my heavenly Father
Beneath the liquid wave?
How blest must be the mariner
Who finds in it a grave!"

"Now mark you yon volcano,
From which dark vapours rise:

Amidst its blazing fires doth dwell
The God who never dies."

"Didst thou not say our Father's home

Was on yon mountain dread?
Didst thou not say th'Almighty dwelt
Upon the ocean bed?"

"And now amidst the fires that burst

From yon volcano's height,
Thou sayst our Holy Father sits
Upon His throne of light."

"Upon the mount thy Father dwells

'Neath ocean's depth profound,
Amid the fierce volcano's fires—
There, there thy God is found.

"Gaze where thou wilt, my gentle child,

On earth, on sea, in air,

In each His Spirit thou wilt find—

THY GOD IS EVERYWHERE!"

Yours obediently,

John Barnett.

GOD IS EVERYWHERE.

"Dear Mother," said a little child,
"Oh, tell me where is God!
His mansion must be beautiful,
This mansion of the Lord."

They stroll'd along the garden path,
'Mid verdure fresh and bright;
The child look'd up with beaming eyes,

All fill'd with wondrous light—
"God dwells within the flowers," she
"The lovely, lovely flow'rs," cried,
All warm'd and gladden'd by the sun,
And freshen'd by the show'rs.

"God may be in the shining brook,
So joyous in its flow;
Perhaps that babbling is His voice,
That speaks to us so low.

I hear a whispering in the trees,
A murmur soft and sweet;
Perhaps 'tis there He makes His home,

Where waving branches meet;
But then the sky is beautiful,
He surely must be there.

Ah! now, at last, I know the truth,
That God is everywhere."

M. J. BARNETT.

I see no marked similarity except in the subject—the general idea that God is everywhere; an idea about as original with me as with Mr John Barnett, being centuries old, before either of us came into existence. This idea pervades the Holy Scripture. The inspired David, for example, gives utterance to words of like import in the 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th verses of Psalm cxxxix. "Now it is possible that" Mr John Barnett and David "were inspired with the self-same idea, but, like the author in the comedy of The Critic," David "happened to hit upon it first."

Although David, were he still among us, might not be able to suggest any infringement upon his rights, since, so far as I know, he never possessed a "copyright" of his works, yet, he might remark upon the similarity of his idea to that expressed some hundreds of years afterwards by the favourite composer John Barnett. We are aware of the scores and scores of songs on the one subject of "Good Night," for example; yet, should a new "Good Night" song be issued to-morrow which did not in actual words resemble some previous one, who of us would suggest that the idea was borrowed from some other special writer?—Yours respectfully, Florence, Italy, Aug. 11, 1877.

M. J. BARNETT.

[We should be glad of a new "Good Night." There are Shelley's verses ready at hand. Where is the music to suit them?—to sound as fresh and new, in short?—D. P.]

RHAPSODY.*

(From our Amateur Bayreuth Madman.)

I sing of Araminta,
A theme to fire my soul—
(But thinking of Tchoukourakoff,
My blood I can't control).

Up, Englishmen, and fight
For genius and for beauty;
The man that don't, or wont,
Does shirk or fear his duty.

Shoot out the Cathay cuckoos,
That steal and foul our nests;
The long-eared, squint-eyed pigtailed!
(Don't keep them still our guests)

Did Araminta ever
Speak ill of any one?—
She only played her best.
What evil has she done?

But mud-worms hate the sun,
And fleas do hate the light;
That's why the blown-out Tartar flea
Could not restrain his bite.

But for that coward bite
We'll try to make him suffer;
And after John Bull's cuffs,
His skin shall be much rougher.

Has chivalry quite vanished?
And patriotism, too?
Or love we our insulters?
And wear not boot or shoe?

Oh! shame upon those Britons,
Who fear for 'ouse and wittle,
And seem to find their ecstasy
In flailing Kurdish squittle!

"GOD SAVE THE KING."

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—In your paper of the 4th August, "A. W. Thayer" says very authoritatively that "God save the Queen" was composed by Carey, and that there is no "perhaps" in the case; will you allow me to state that there is one "perhaps," which is well worth consideration—a theory, well supported—viz., that the National Anthem was composed by Bull, a Mus. Doc. and composer of the latter part of the sixteenth century. Perhaps the fact that Dr Bull resided much, and died in Holland, gave rise to the idea that "God save the King" (or Queen) was a Dutch or German tune. C. P.

[Again many thanks. But surely Carey was neither Dutch nor German?—D. P.]

ROME.—The operas announced for next season at the Teatro Apollo are Mefistofele, Boito; Der Freischütz, Weber; Le Roi de Lahore, Massenet; and Lohengrin, Wagner—probably also La Forza del Destino. The first ballet will be Loreley, by Sig. Monplaisir. Signore Mariani-Masi, Brambilla-Ponchielli, Mariani-de-Angelis, Stella Bonheur; Signori Barbacini, De Sanctis, Nachbaur, Raakmann, Vasselli, Castelmarty, and Bottarini, with Sig. L. Mancini as director, form the company—not a very strong one.

Adelina Patti.

(From "The Figaro," Aug. 29.)

As considerable interest has been excited by the latest legal step adopted by M^{me} Adelina Patti, and as her movements and intentions appear to be just now a matter of considerable doubt, I have taken the pains to investigate the facts. The information I have gained, and which may be accepted as authentic, will startle amateurs and opera-goers. The week before last M^{me} Patti left Ilfracombe, where she was staying, and went for one night to Paris. She then announced her intention to her professional advisers, and to her most private and intimate friends, to retire immediately from the profession she has so long adorned, and to take the veil as a nun. No arguments could shake her resolve, and the lady at once proceeded to carry her intentions into effect. Accompanied by a member of her household she departed for Brittany, where she entered the Convent of the Sacred Heart. There, I have the best reason to state, she still remains, resolved, so far as she can resolve, for the present, that "these garish lights shall see her no more." But, in order that she may take the veil, it is deemed advisable that her dispute with the Marquis de Caux shall not remain in the position it now is. M^{me} Patti has, therefore, filed in the Paris courts an application to declare her marriage with the Marquis de Caux null and void, on the ground that the priest who performed the ceremony was not legally licensed to do so, and (I quote from the official document) "that the said marriage is tainted by divers other vices and nullities, which will be particularised hereafter." This, then, I am credibly informed, is the true history of a step which has startled the operatic world. Indeed, the facts make the act intelligible. Whether M^{me} Patti will be induced, after all, to return for a short span to the stage, of which she was so lately the reigning queen, no one will now pretend to say. We all hope so, but at present the probabilities are all the other way. She is tired of the world, wearied of the worry and turmoil of mundane strife, and wishes for the peace and tranquillity of complete withdrawal from public life. She has, therefore, retired to the Convent of the Sacred Heart, with the avowed object of preparing herself to take the veil. We shall all hope for the best; but if M^{me} Patti remain in the same mind that she now is, opera-goers have seen la diva for the last time.

CHERUBINO.

(Extract from a Private Letter, Aug. 21.)*

"Adelina Patti has made no engagements for the winter. She is residing temporarily in a village near ——. All idea of her going to America is abandoned. Paris is out of the question; nor do I think there is any truth in the report that she would sing in Italy and Germany between now and her Vienna engagement."

(From the Paris "Ménestrel," Aug. 26.)

M^{me} Adelina Patti, autant par gratitude que par sympathie de famille, vient de signer un traité avec son beau-frère, M. Maurice Strakosch, qui fut son professeur de chant et le patron de ses premiers grands succès. Ce traité concerne l'Europe et nullement l'Amérique. Paris sera-t-il appelé à en profiter?

[How are we to reconcile these discordant statements? Fancy Adelina taking the veil! And yet "Cherubino" is generally well informed (when not in the neighbourhood of Cockspur St.)—Cherophilus Querr.]

* This is subsequent to her return from Ilfracombe and her short visit to Paris, after which M. Strakosch went to Brussels.

Arabella Goddard's Recitals.

Miss Arabella Goddard is a most pleasant person to criticise. Her mechanism is so faultless, and her command over every style of pianoforte playing is so complete, and, moreover, her extraordinary talent is now so thoroughly known, and universally acknowledged, that there is scarcely anything to say about her series of pianoforte recitals, except recording the programme. Were we rhapsodists, we might devote a whole column to the extolment of our gifted young countrywoman, but, being of the matter-of-fact order of beings, we should be out of our element in attempting an elaborate consideration of her many good points. Her first soirée was given at St. James's Hall, on the 27th ult., and the following was the programme:—

Quartet in E flat	Mozart.
Sonata in F sharp major (Op. 78)	Beethoven.
Recueil des Airs Variés, Nos. 2 and 3, Book 2 (Op. 71)...	Dussek.
Sonata in E major	Mendelssohn.
Trio in E flat	Schubert.

The sonata of Mendelssohn, one of his earliest works, was announced for one of Miss Goddard's soirées last year, but withdrawn. According to the programme put into our hands, Miss Goddard claims to be the first representative of the work in public. This is a bold assertion, for it is a moderately difficult and very beautiful sonata, and we should imagine must have been performed in Germany, though Miss Goddard is a traveller, and is, doubtless, well informed on the subject. Possibly it was intended to express that it was now given for the first time in England, but as that particular degree of novelty was claimed for Dussek's airs in this programme, it would seem that the distinction was intentional, and that Miss Goddard was well advised on the subject. A sonata that will always do credit to the player, and give pleasure to the audience, ought no longer to remain in comparative obscurity. The stringed executants who assisted Miss Goddard in the quartet, were M. Sainton, Mr Doyle, and Signor Piatti, and their playing was unexceptionable. The trio of Schubert contains many delightful and melodious subjects, of which there is occasionally some interesting and piquant treatment; but, altogether, it is prolix to a degree, and it is lucky that it was placed at the end of the evening, for many of the audience would have found it dreadfully tedious, in spite of the admirable execution bestowed upon the work.

With compliments from

Dr. Ghest.

JENNY LIND.

(From the New York "Music Trade Review.")

We translate from a French Journal (La Liberté) a curious and interesting letter from Jenny Lind, the "Swedish Nightingale" written by her at Dresden, where she now lives, to a friend in Paris:

"I want to speak to you of my baby. Well, I must tell you that God has given my dear husband and myself an adorable little girl, born on the 31st of March last. She is the perfect image of health and happiness. She laughs and crows in a way to delight all sympathetic hearts. We have given her a little Katherine among her other names, but we call her Jenny, I need not say in honour of whom. Our boy Walter, will be four years old on the 9th of August next. He is an intelligent child—very intelligent, very religious, and when he has been naughty it is touching to see the way he prays to God to make him good again—poor little chicken. He adores me obeys me, and I understand the child completely, for he is exactly like myself in nature, very impressionable, active, gay, high-tempered, affectionate, shy, good-natured, quick to learn, remembering all that he learns, preferring to the finest toys a horrible old doll, because it is one with which he has longest played, caring nothing about dress, but preferring to be loved, rather than admired. Is he musical? Not the least in the world. This is my great despair. But he is religious, and I think he will be a Christian. As to the baby, I cannot say as much. The little creature eats, drinks, laughs, mumbles over her shoes, and I have nothing to say against her character. My husband is now in England looking out for a residence, for we intend, on account of the children, to settle in that country. Yours affectionately, JENNY LIND."

As our Paris contemporary observes, this is certainly a very bright and maternal letter

BUENOS AYRES.—Sig. Gomez's Fosca, with additions by the composer, has been produced at the Teatro Colon.

VERONIES (Canton de Beaumont, Hainault).—A monument will be inaugurated, on the 9th inst., to François Joseph Gossec, commonly called "Gossec," who, born here on the 17th January, 1773, died in Paris, on the 16th February, 1829. Music will naturally be a prominent attraction, and it is to be hoped there may be more of Gossec than there was of Mozart at the recent Salzburg Festival.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1877.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

POLKAW.—“Hexameters” too late for this week. Though they are not scrupulously, in every instance, “hexameters,” they will appear in our next impression.

DR THEOBALD QUIRE writes:—“The story of Wagner’s ‘casseries,’ whilst directing at the Royal Albert Hall, contained in the last number of the Musical World, is apocryphal. True Wagner indulged occasionally in remarks upon his singers, especially those of the sterner sex, and what he said was often the reverse of flattering.” Dr Quire had better teach his grandmother to suck eggs.

Rubinstein.

(To the Editor of the “Musical World.”)

SIR,—The letter of “An English Musician,” which appeared in your last number, has invited more and fiercer retorts than I anticipated—though I certainly expected a few. The subject, however, being of the smallest conceivable interest, I shall crave your indulgence for two only out of the nine epistles (the other seven being mere drivel) you have forwarded to my address. The first appears to me like the ebullition of a maniac; and for that reason I give it precedence, as best suited to the matter under consideration.

“(To the Editor of the ‘Musical World.’)”

“SIR,—I consider the letter signed ‘An English Musician,’ printed in your last week’s number, a piece of gross impertinence. Put, to quote a Welsh saw:—

‘As the bell tinkles,
So the fool thinks.’

The Evening with Rubinstein came off at the house of a renowned Belgian professor and his no less renowned English wife—both, I should think (like all the company present), better musicians than your correspondent from the ‘Clarendon Hotel,’ if, indeed (which I doubt), he be a musician at all. Does he know the rondo from the Fifth Sonata, Op. 10, of John Cristian (not Sebastian) Bach? If not, let him hold his peace, and go to the house in St John’s Wood, next door to that where Rubinstein exhibited his supernatural genius. There dwells, or used to dwell, an English pianist (save the phrase!). The idea of comparing an electric thunderer on the keys like the Bessarabian Colossus with any ‘English pianist,’ from Potter, Holmes, and Bennett, down to Gibsons, Sloper, Taylor, and Goddard, is absurd. Compare the loftiest moon-mountain (out of Africa) to the ‘Ill of Primrose,’ upon which Mister ‘Omes erected ‘a horgin vide and tall.’ Ask Brinley Richards, or Ap’ Farren, what ‘English pianists’ signify; and they will tell you that they signify ‘English pianists’—voilà tout! It is sickening to listen to this nonsense about “native talent.” We have no native talent, in the way of music, whether for composition, or for execution. What is our Sterndale Bennett, I should like to know, beyond the fact that he lies in Westminster Abbey? Why, if he merited that distinction, Rubinstein should be buried on the top of St Paul’s cupola. The smallest German musician is worth Purcell, Arne, Bishop, the Wealeys, Bennett, Macfarren, Barnett (old Barnett), Balfe, Wallace, Hatton, Sullivan, and the whole of our English and Irish potters and patters together. And yet Mr Charles Salaman (himself a composer, we are to presume) talks of one Rook, Rookh, Rooke, O’Rorke, or O’Rourke! He will be next telling us of Parry the Elder, or the Tully who in no way resembled Cicero.*

“Your obedient servant,

“SMITHERS GOLDFINCH.

“Shamblies, Worcester, Aug. 27.”

* A good thing for poor James, who, in spite of his English music, died a natural death.—D. P.

The foregoing carries with it its own condemnation. Oh shameless Shambler! * * * [We take the liberty of substituting here a gap, the style of the peroration being personally offensive to Mr Goldfinch.—D. P.]

Touching, by the way, the rondo of J. C. Bach's Sonata No. 5 (Op. 10), it begins thus :

I could write out the whole from memory, if I only had the time (which I have not), and you the space (which you have not).*

Letter No. 2 is more wily and plausible. Mr Smithers Goldfinch, indulging in hard words and wholesale imprecations, like a tall bully lifts his head and lies (without, perhaps, being conscious he is lying); but "C. P." adopts a milder tone, cautiously insinuating paradoxes where his harder predecessor boisterously blabs bituminous bixwort. Listen to our Ephraim Smooth :

"(To the Editor of the 'Musical World'.)"

"SIR,—We all know the history of Herr Rubinstein's first appearance in England. M^{de} Goddard ruled supreme as a pianist. The novus homo (novus, at least, to England) seemed likely to be a formidable rival; thereupon, sundry letters, &c., appeared in the papers, shamelessly puffing M^{de} Goddard, and shamefully crying down Rubinstein. The English did as they were told, still smiled on (and paid) the lady, and turned their backs on the Russian. Naturally indignant at such treatment—at being condemned without a fair hearing—one of the best-natured artists in the world was sorely wroth at the attack on his art. He shook off the very dust of his feet against us, left our country, and almost vowed never to return. Since then there have been many changes. M^{de} Goddard retired, and has only just now re-appeared on the scene. Rubinstein went to New York, where he was splendidly received. As an example of what was thought of him there, a gentleman, well known in New York as an organ-builder, organist, pianist, and critic, was asked what he thought of Rubinstein as a pianist. 'Pianist!' he answered. 'He's an orchestra.'† But the great thing is the change in ourselves. English musical taste has widely-developed itself; the public refused to be led by the nose (or, rather, the ears) by the press. They will not be told whom to clap or whom to hiss—they will choose for themselves (as a sure proof of this may be cited the fairly successful run of Mr Irving's Macbeth, although it had been so utterly damned by the press‡). Rubinstein came to England again; he had a fair trial; he was heard, and had a reception worthy his talents; and the £12,000 is but a substantial proof of the English approbation. But that first insult rankled in his mind; his words were said in a spirit of indignation, which is surely natural and pardonable; we can but hope that in time he will change his opinion.

As to his disregarding the works of Sterndale Bennett, and other 'demigods,' that is too common a fault in most musicians to be particularly noticed in one. It is not hard to see, or, rather, to HEAR, why he should be preferred to Hallé, M^{de} Goddard, or even M^{de} Schumann; I think the fact that he 'interprets' his own music gives him the palm over Von Bülow, great as is the latter. The tone adopted by that very "English Musician" in his letter of Saturday, the 25th, is that of a disappointed pianist, whose talents the English public have failed to appreciate. Let us hope he will throw no more discredit on the name of English musicians by his want of fair judgment and of taste. I am, Sir, yours truly, "C. P."

* Assuredly not.—D. P.

† Just what a pianist ought not to be.

‡ This statement is plerheria.

I really thought that, after an absence of four years, all the miserable threadbare trumpery about Arabella Goddard had gone out of fashion. Everybody who knows anything about the subject is well aware that since she married the musical critic of a leading journal (not far from twenty years ago) scarcely any articles have been printed in that journal about her. Let "C. P." point out such articles, if he can. If he cannot he is guilty of deliberate slander, and his use of the phrase "shamelessly puffing M^{de} Goddard" is a flagrant and unmanly insult to a lady. The "shamefully crying down Rubinstein" is equally wide of the mark. Herr Rubinstein is open to criticism, just like any other public artist; and he has obtained due recognition. If I am advised that he is above criticism, I must reply that I am of a different opinion. The hint that M^{de} Goddard was "paid" for her public performances is beneath contempt. Every artist, I presume, is "paid" for his services, if they are worth paying for. With respect to the preference awarded to Rubinstein over "Hallé, M^{de} Goddard, or even M^{de} Schumann," I have only to say that, to the best of my knowledge, such preference is not entertained by musicians generally. That the fact of Herr Rubinstein's "interpreting" (!) his own music "gives him the palm over Dr Hans von Bülow," I deny—thinking, as I do, the precise contrary. Dr von Bülow is wiser in his generation.

I am, Sir, though not a "disappointed pianist," your obedient servant,
AN ENGLISH MUSICIAN.

[As "An English Musician" is attacked personally in both the letters to which he replies, we could not with justice refuse admission to his answer. But henceforth, unless accompanied by his name, as well as his address, we must decline inserting further communications from his pen. The same condition must apply to any contributions with which "C. P." may feel disposed to honour this paper.—D. P.]

Rent of Drury Lane.

Mr F. B. Chatterton writes to The Times from the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, August 27:—

"My attention has been called to a statement made by Mr Mapleson in a letter published in The Times of August 4—viz., that he paid a weekly rental of £300 for the above theatre. This I emphatically deny. Mr Mapleson paid me during his last seasons the some of £3,000 for a term extending over sixteen weeks. Other misstatements have also been made to the effect that I was desirous of exacting from Mr Mapleson additional terms. This I also deny; and it was not until the 16th of March last that he declined to take Drury Lane Theatre because I would not accept £500 reduced rental. In corroboration of these statements I beg to forward you copies of the following telegrams:—

"March 15, 1877.—F. B. Chatterton, Drury Lane Theatre, to J. H. Mapleson, Angel Hotel, Doncaster—Terms same as season before last from April 9, four months; this will give time for altering the theatre."

Answer.—

"March 16, 1877.—Mapleson, Wakefield, to F. B. Chatterton, Drury Lane Theatre, London—Take no heed of the advertisement which appears to-morrow morning."

The last telegram refers to the first announcement of the opening of Her Majesty's Theatre.

PURPLE POWIS.—You must get out of that groove—that ancient groove.

BAYLIS BOIL.—Out of the wisdom of the ancients? No!

PURPLE POWIS.—Does the sun follow its old course?

BAYLIS BOIL.—Yes—mit Donnergang!

PURPLE POWIS.—We have only seen one side of the moon.

BAYLIS BOIL.—High mountains and extinct volcanoes. No water; no atmosphere. Who is to show the other?

PURPLE POWIS.—Those whose imagination can travel. Imagination pays no turnpikes—

BAYLIS BOIL.—Pikes are going out—

PURPLE POWIS.—It wants no steam on land or water—

BAYLIS BOIL.—No propelling power?

PURPLE POWIS.—Well, no; it is because it is; it is its own cause and effect.

BAYLIS BOIL.—Erzeuger?

PURPLE POWIS.—No—Entelechy.

BAYLIS BOIL.—At what are you driving?

PURPLE POWIS.—Well, Rubinstein is because he is—

BAYLIS BOIL.—And Liszt?

PURPLE POWIS.—Liszt is multifarious and polyhedric. Not being singular—

BAYLIS BOIL (interrupting him).—Liszt seems to me very singular—

PURPLE POWIS.—Not being singular (emphatically)—Liszt are because he are.

BAYLIS BOIL.—And Wagner?

PURPLE POWIS.—Ah! There's your Erzeuger! There's your genius that begets new and unknown things out of what is old and known! There's your iconoclast and re-procreator in one! But I prefer Liszt.

BAYLIS BOIL.—I prefer neither. Genius is my affair. What genius does is always rightly done, however unconsciously—

PURPLE POWIS.—But art should be nature?

BAYLIS BOIL.—No. If it were so, Liszt would certainly not represent art.

PURPLE POWIS.—But the metamorphosis of themes?

BAYLIS BOIL.—Blow the metamorphosis of themes. Give me the Metamorphoses of Ovidius Naso—who sat at one side of Augustus, while the bleary-eyed Flaccus sat at the other.

PURPLE POWIS.—Well?

BAYLIS BOIL.—Well, you don't know the vocation of genius. Goethe insists upon the immutability of laws, and—

(Shade of Goethe appears.)

Shade of Goethe (in a sepulchral tone):—But what chiefly vindicates the practice of strict requisitions, of decided laws, is that genius, that native talent, is precisely the readiest to seize them, and yield them willing obedience. It is only the HALF-GIFTED that would wish to put his own contracted singularity in the place of the unconditional whole, and justify his false attempts under cover of an unconstrained originality and independence. To this we grant no currency; we guard our scholars from all such misconceptions, whereby a large portion of life, nay, often the whole of life, is apt to be perplexed and disjointed. With genius we love most to be concerned; for this is animated just by that good spirit of quickly recognizing what is profitable for it. Genius understands that art is called art because it is not nature. Genius bends itself to respect even towards what may be named conventional: for what is this but agreeing, as the most distinguished men have agreed, to regard the unalterable, the indispensable, as the best? And does not such submission always turn to good account?

(Shade of Goethe disappears.)

PURPLE POWIS.—Why, the twaddling old phantom is reciting a passage from one of his own books—

BAYLIS BOIL (solemnly).—Wilhelm Meister!

PURPLE POWIS.—Wilhelm Meister is a bore—

BAYLIS BOIL.—But Mignon?

PURPLE POWIS.—A common-place, long-winded pedagogue!—he never understood Mignon.

BAYLIS BOIL.—You are right. He left that to Ambroise Thomas—

PURPLE POWIS.—And—

BAYLIS BOIL.—Christine Nilsson.

[Exeunt, smiling—each content with his own acumen.]

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

MIDLE TIETJENS.—We regret to learn that Midle Tietjens is no better, and that another operation is to be made to-day. The distinguished vocalist is very weak and suffers greatly.—Times, Aug. 29.

M. DANIEL BERNARD, musical editor of L'Union, is publishing the Correspondence of Hector Berlioz. Those who possess autographic letters of the deceased musician are requested to forward them, or copies of them, to M. Bernard, 46, Rue Saint-André-des-Arts, Paris. ["Awast!"—said Cap'en Cottle's seafaring hero—and "went off to his ship."]

It is reported that Herr Max von Weber, the famous engineer, son of the composer of Der Freischütz, will be appointed chief of the German Railway Department.

It is said that Miss Minnie Hauk will sing in Paris after fulfilling her engagement at Brussels. She will do in Paris what she has done at Vienna and Berlin—win every heart.

THE Fifth Annual Report of John Hullah, Inspector of Music at the students' examination in the training schools of Great Britain, has recently been issued. In spite of a grumble or so, more especially on the subject of musical instruction in elementary schools (which ought to be the legitimate foundation of all), the accomplished professor takes a hopeful view of the object contemplated, to which he, perhaps more than any other man in this country, has given an impetus.

MR CARL ROSA, who has been paying London a brief visit, rejoins his company to-day, at Hull. We are glad to hear that Macfarren's Robin Hood is likely to prove one of Mr Rosa's most complete successes, both artistically and financially. This warrants a hope that Charles II., Jessy Lee, The Soldier's Legacy, She Stops to Conquer, and best of all (though as yet not adequately represented), Helvellyn, may once more come to light. In Mr Rosa we have assuredly the right man in the right place.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—It is a pity that the classical Friday concerts, so well selected and so ably conducted by Mr. Weist Hill, cannot go on "all the year round." The performance of the first three movements of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and of Mendelssohn's music to A Midsummer Night's Dream (as Shakspearean as Shakspeare himself), under that gentleman's superintendence, was alone worth a visit to Muswell Hill. We shall return to these concerts, which ought to be made a conspicuous and permanent feature by the managers of the North-eastern fairy palace.

THE LATE HECTOR BERLIOZ.—M. Daniel Bernard, of the Paris journal, L'Union, is preparing a book, entitled, Correspondence d'Hector Berlioz, to be published next winter, at Lévy's. M. Bernard solicits all those who may have preserved letters of interest from the renowned French composer and feuilletoniste to send him forthwith either the originals, or copies. Any amateurs, or musicians, in England (and there are not a few) who possess such treasures, bearing in mind the style in which Mendelssohn's correspondence has been "edited," will be chary about parting with them. If a man of genius is to be known by his letters, those letters should be produced en gros, intact, and without prejudice; otherwise the outside world is guided to a necessarily imperfect estimate. Berlioz was much more freely outspoken than Mendelssohn, and far less initiated in the ways of the world. His correspondence, therefore, if non-manipulated, would be doubly valuable. About disclosures of intimate family sympathies, relationships, and so forth, only the inquisitively prying can be curious; and there are a great deal too many such in the two volumes of Mendelssohn's published letters; but the opinions of distinguished men on questions relating to an art the practice of which has brought them eminence are of the utmost interest and importance. An ungarbled correspondence from the pen of Berlioz would be a real acquisition; a garbled one little better than useless. Whoever, then, commits letters, signed "Berlioz," to the custody of M. Daniel Bernard should stipulate, as a sine qua non, that they be published without curtailment, verbatim et literatim, or returned to the owner. Otherwise they might possibly be modified, or somehow tampered with—"best intentions" taken for granted.—Graphic.

Archæit.

(From a Czech Correspondent.)

SIR,—A highly interesting theatre advertisement has been discovered, and we cannot abstain from making it public to all admirers and adversaries of Meister Richard Wagner. We must add that Wagner was born on the 22nd May, 1813, at Leipzig, and became kapelmeister at Riga (Livonia), 1830 to 1839. Here we give the extraordinary playbill:—

Playbill.

Saturday, the 11th December, 1837, will be performed as a benefice to the undersigned, for the FIRST TIME, Norma.

Grand Romantic Opera, in 2 Acts, by Bellini.

The undersigned believes that he cannot show off better his regard for the theatre public of this town, than by the choice of this opera, which he chooses as a token of the development of art amongst the youthful musical talents under my direction. Norma is, of all Bellini's work, the one which, besides a wealth of melody, combines passion and dramatic depth, and even the most pronounced adversaries of new Italian School must confess, that the music of that Opera speaks to the heart. As all has been done for the splendid performance of that Opera, I may then hope, the opera loving public will honour me with their presence, as a testimonial of my earnest endeavours and pains of my duty I have had, since I occupied the post as kapelmeister, in what capacity I have always found kind and indulgent friends.

Richard Wagner.

Riga, the 8th December, 1837.

I am responsible for the foregoing, having translated it myself into English from the Didaskalia, of Frankfurt, which, as every English traveller knows, is taken in by the famous Brothers Drexel, at the Hotel de Russie. I myself patronise the Hotel de Turquie, although I have fought (and fled) indiscriminately with Cossacks and Circassians (both "Baah-Bazouks" to a nail). Sir, I am, yours (if you pay), Free Lance.

"No. 388."

The lasting impression produced by the Festival Performances at Bayreuth on beings of a mild disposition is strikingly exemplified in the case of the owner of the Patronage Voucher (Patronatschein) No. 388. (Nomina sunt odiosa.) "Starting from the conviction," he writes, "that the Patrons of the Bayreuth Festival Stage-Performances were impelled by ardent and inspired love of art to promote these performances," No. 388 thinks that "he may re-awaken these feelings of sacred enthusiasm in his colleagues, with the object of bringing the work commenced by them to what seems to him a worthy conclusion. It is known that the undertaking terminated with a deficit, and that the concerts given in London to cover the latter failed to do so, &c.; it is also known that the deficit was very considerably increased by subsequent claims, which the Master cannot well ignore, and which he does not wish to ignore. Shall we desert the man who, trusting in the genius of the German people, and actuated by a sacred belief in his art, called the work into life?"

—No. 388 is "not acquainted with Richard Wagner personally, &c.; he has no relations of any kind whatever with him, &c.;" and proposes to the Patrons that, "for the purpose of covering the deficit, they should come forward with voluntary post-payments." No. 388 tells us that "an additional sum of 150 marks would be required upon each Patron's Voucher issued, or 50 marks upon each Patron's Card. With this trifling sum, each one among us saves his faith in art, and every German among us the honour, which is, as it were, impawned, of the German name." Bravo! The concluding sentence is good. Dr P. is said already to have expressed his readiness to examine No. 388 psychiatrically. But how pretty is the bashfulness manifested by No. 388! He conceals his name under an inanimate number, and regrets that "he has no relations of any kind whatever" with Herr Wagner. Why, after all, should he entertain any scruples? The deficit, it appears, still amounts to one hundred thousand thalers.—Berlin Echo.

ST GEORGE'S HALL, LIVERPOOL.

Programme of Organ Recitals by Mr W. T. Best.

THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 30th:—

Overture, Peter Schmoll	Weber.

Triumphal March, Siege of Corinth	Rossini.
Prologue and Fugue, the Trumpet Fugue	W. T. Best.
Organ Sonata, No. 4, B flat major	Mendelssohn.
Chorus, "The many rend the skies"	Handel.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, SEPTEMBER 1st:—

Grand Chœur, G major	Th. Salomé.
Largo from the Sonata in E flat, Op. 7	Beethoven.
Overture, La Chasse du Jeune Henri	Méhul.
Prelude on the Chorale, "Schmücke dich, O liebe seele"	Bach.
Andantino in G major, Rosamunde	F. Schubert.
Grand March, E flat major	H. Smart.

MUNICH.—The delegates of the General Association of German Musicians held a congress on the 22nd, 23rd, and 24th August. It was proposed by the president, Herr Thadewaldt, that the Imperial Parliament of Germany be petitioned to invalidate any one in future from teaching music without undergoing a preliminary examination. If that could only be done in England!

FRANZENSBAD (Bohemia).—The programme of the Sinfonie Concert on August 18th contained: Beethoven's Symphony in B flat (No. 4); Loreley, legend for orchestra, with harp obbligato, by Charles Oberthür; Spohr's violin concerto in G minor; and the introduction to Kretschmer's opera, Die Folkunger. Again were our excellent solo players, Mlle Anna Dubez and Herr Anton Hahn, received with well-deserved applause; the former for her execution of the harp part in Loreley, the latter for his performance of Spohr's concerto. Capellmeister Th. Tomaschek conducted with his wonted precision.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From our Correspondent.)

Toujours Paul et Virginie. For the sixth and seventh representations, Paul, in the person of M. Herbert, made his farewell bow, being replaced at the eighth by M. Gérard, who did not sustain the part of the young lover in look, gestures, or voice, as did his predecessor. M. Herbert's voice, though not over strong, was always true, and he never sang falsetto; while his acting was—well, not that of M. Gérard. Our charming little Virginie, Mdle. Nau, took leave of us last night—not as Virginie, but as Ines in L'Africaine. The house was crammed with amateurs, who came to bear tribute to the talents of Mdle. Nau, as well as to the music of Meyerbeer. M. Robert, an old favourite, who took the rôle of Vasco di Gama, was hardly up to the mark. He has an agreeable voice, which he can use with ease, but in the upper register it is hard and metallic. M. Lourde, as Nelusco, was excellent, and as much can be said of Mdle. de Gérardon's Selika. It is strange that this clever artist brings to light so many dark-complexioned characters—to wit, Meala, the negress slave in Paul et Virginie; Azucena, in Le Trouvère; and Selika, in the Africaine. The success of the performance was generally commendable, as far as the band, chorus, and solo singers were concerned; but the scenery was far from good. M. Froment is sometimes particular about scenic effects, as was shown by the tableau of the monastery in Paul et Virginie; but in the third act of L'Africaine, when a section of a ship is placed on the stage, the quarter-deck should not be so near the footlights as to compel the artists, when the curtain falls, to put their backs against the "companion ladder." In the last scene, also, a tree in the centre, which should be the "mancanilla," reminded us of a venerable oak in Greenwich Park. With regard to other operas, I have only to tell of the success of Guillaume Tell, La Fille de Madame Angot, Les Dragons de Villars, and La Traviata.

Another attack has been made on the Queen of French Watering-places by a writer in another English paper (Weekly Despatch); but I think all the nonsense about our town being the home of diphtheria, scarlet fever, &c., has been shut up by a letter in La France du Nord, from "Un ancien habitant de Boulogne-sur-Mer." At all events, Boulogne is very full of visitors; there is no epidemic, and very little disease. Perhaps people come here to avoid cholera, dysentery, fever, &c., which they stand more chance of getting at parts in direct communication with the East.

AGRICULTURAL HALL CONCERTS.

On Tuesday evening the immense building at Islington was opened for a series of promenade concerts under the management of the popular Madame Liebhart. Great pains have been taken to render the hall attractive. The flags of every nation float together, rings and lines of gas jets give a brilliant illumination, and so splendid is the collection of flowers, in banks and parterres, that, as a flower show alone, the exhibition would be worth a visit. Samples of choice fruit are exhibited, and a prettier sight has seldom been witnessed in connection with a musical entertainment. Previous to the concert, prizes to the value of between £300 and £400 were distributed among the floral and horticultural exhibitors. The musical arrangements are on a liberal scale. Mr F. Kingsbury directs with his well known ability a large and well-selected orchestra, led by Mr T. Watson, and including in its ranks Messrs T. Harper, Walter Pettit, Reed, Pollitzer, White, Hutchins, Cheshire, &c., with the addition of the Royal Horse Guards and other military bands, which made the total number of instrumental players between 200 and 300, when Jullien's "British Army Quadrille" was given. In the overture to Masaniello the band showed its quality, and the "British Army Quadrille" afforded occasions for the exhibition of various solo-players of distinction. The auxiliary bands were dressed in costumes—British, French, Russian, and Turkish. A new valse, entitled "Mes Amours," a clever pianoforte solo by Signor Tito Mattei, Glinka's "Pas des Patineurs" (piccolo obligato, Mr Young), and a selection from the Grande Duchesse, were the instrumental pieces; but, considering the size of the hall and the quality of the audience, it may be worth consideration whether orchestral music of a higher class might not be introduced. The vocal music was well selected. Madame Liebhart sang with her accustomed finish of style and beauty of voice Vincent Wallace's "Sweet spirit, hear my prayer," and also a ballad entitled "Far from home." She was enthusiastically welcomed. Madame Anna Bishop's voice has lost much of its power; but the excellence of her style was shown in "Let the bright seraphim" (trumpet obligato, Mr T. Harper), and in "Home, sweet home," both of which were warmly applauded. Madame Antoinette Sterling made a great impression in Arthur Sullivan's "Lost Chord," and "Caller Herrin';" Miss F. Brooke was successful in "Tell me, my heart;" Mr Vernon Rigby and Mr Maybrick sang familiar airs with their usual success, and the audience seemed disposed to encore everything. The "encore" system is becoming an intolerable nuisance, and should be resisted for the sake of the public comfort, disturbed by a comparatively small number accustomed to music-halls. To judge from the success of the first concert, Madame Liebhart is likely to be amply rewarded for her endeavours to make dwellers in North London musical.

A CHILD'S SONG ABOUT RIVERS, CLOUDS, AND TREES.

The deep clear stream is gliding on towards the sea,
The birds are singing on the boughs of every tree,
The souls that love us round us staying, loving, smiling, and forgiving;
Heaven giving grace to weep, and killing self within,
With strength from Him who rules above to battle with our sin.

The moving shadows of the clouds on earth and sea,
The stars so brightly beaming o'er the hills and lea,
The twilight's prayerful healing power, Sunrise's life-soul gladd'ning hour—
God can give us strength to kill all sinful thoughts within;
And turn our hearts to thrones for Him; and blot out all our sin.

ELBERFELD.—Herr Hermann Schornstein intends giving a performance of the oratorio, Luther in Worms, by Herr Ludwig Meinardus, whose König Salomo was produced in 1865.

BRUNSWICK.—The twenty-fifth anniversary of Franz Abt as Court Capellmeister will be celebrated by two State Concerts, on the 29th and 30th September.

MAYENCE.—Herr Woolf, representative of the house of Schott & Co. in London, has been staying here, to conclude several important transactions. Herr Joseph Rummell, the composer, and Herr Lehmeier, the well-known pianist, are also here.

VIENNA.—Herr Brüll's new opera, Der Landfriede, is to be produced at the Imperial Operahouse on the 4th October, the Emperor's saint's-day, with Mad. Ehnn, Herren Müller and Scaria, in the principal characters. It has been accepted, also, at Berlin, Dresden, and other leading cities.

WAIFS.

Mad. Marie Roze will shortly visit America.*

Sig. Paliotti is restoring the drop-scene of the San Carlo, Naples. The Théâtre de la Renaissance, re-painted and re-decorated, opened with Kosiki.

Early on Thursday morning Wilton's Music Hall, East Smithfield, was totally destroyed by fire.

M. Caïso, tenor of the Paris Théâtre-Lyrique, has married Madlle Sablailrolles of the same Theatre.

Darasz Miazka's orchestra of "Zigeuner," or "Zingari," (Anglicé: Gipsies), is performing at Brussels.

The music hall in construction at the Trocadéro for the Paris Exposition will contain 7000 persons.

M. Ambroise Thomas is at Saint-Gildas, Brittany, working on his new opera, Françoise de Rimini.

A new opera, Le Mystère, words by M. Cadel, music by M. Verken, has been accepted at the Théâtre de la Monnaie.

Gilmore's Orchestra, about to make a two years' tour in Europe, will visit Paris during the Grand Exposition.

Herr Unger, the Bayreuth Siegfried, will play Faust and Tannhäuser at the Theatre Royal, Dresden.

Herr G. Vierling's quasi-oratorio, Der Raub der Sabinerinnen, is to be performed at Aix-la-Chapelle and Hamburg.

A benefit is being got up in Paris for Madlle Laferrière, pupil of the Conservatory, and daughter of the late eminent actor.

Mr Carl Rosa's last week in Dublin was his most successful. The company, now at Hull, began successfully with the Trovatore.

A buffo opera, Mademoiselle Favart, by MM. Chivot, Duru, and Offenbach, is to be produced at the Folies-Dramatiques, in October.

The Saturday performances are resumed this evening at the Grand Opera, Paris, (with Robert le Diable), and will be continued weekly.

Sig. Gomez is composing an opera, La Maschera, the libretto of which, by Sig. Ghislanzoni, is founded on an English novel (Whitehall).

Dr Edouard Hanslick, the eminent Viennese Critic, has published a very interesting analysis of the genius and artistic acquirements of Adelina Patti.

Miss Clara Louise Kellogg intends devoting the money she makes in California to the establishment of a Musical Conservatory, over which she will preside.

M. Letellier, former manager of the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, and, at various times, of the theatres at Montpellier, Bordeaux, and Marseilles, died a short time since.

The town of Arles has invited to a grand fête given expressly in their honour the members of La Cigale, a Paris Club of literary men and artists, natives of the South of France.

The great violinist, Wieniawski, it is said, is about to relinquish his post in Brussels, as first professor of the violin at the Royal Conservatoire of Music. His loss will be much regretted.

A new one-stringed instrument, the Dactylomonocordo, invented by Sig. Guida, of Naples, is played with one finger. Sig. Guida has introduced his invention to the public at several concerts.

In consequence of the extra expenses attending the war, the tax on pianos, in Russia, has been raised to a hundred roubles a year. The German manufacturers are in despair. Serves them right.

The Paris Ménestrel informs its readers that Mad. Adelina Patti has signed a treaty with her brother-in-law, M. Maurice Strakosch, as entrepreneur for all her future European engagements, America being left out of the question.

The oldest old maid in the world, says the Boston Courier, is Rebecca Anderson, aged one hundred and twelve, of Seneca Falls. She is so old that it is upwards of twenty-five years since a census-taker had the pluck to ask her how old she was.

Madme Patti absolutely declines to go to America. Her suit with her husband will be argued before the First Chamber of the Civil Tribunal at one of the earliest sittings after the vacation, but it cannot be expected to be settled before November at best.—Figaro.

Pennsylvania has a man who for eighteen years has not slept. He was probably nominated for office about that long ago, and will try to get a little rest as soon as he has finished making a tabular statement of the crimes of which he was accused by the friends of the other man.

An inquest on the body of a lad named Chaywood, chorister, of Trinity Church, Chelsea, was held on Tuesday, at Windsor. The deceased had been on a visit to Mr John Joel, of Chalvey. Getting on the line of the Great Western Railway, in pursuit of a dog, he was knocked down and killed by a train.

"When" enquires an American paper, "does a boy begin to prove the stern realities of life?" "Why, when"—replies the Boston (U. S.) Courier—"he finds himself up a tree in a melon-patch, with the farmer's bull-dog mounting guard, and the farmer heaving in sight with a shot-gun."

* Query? Ask "Cherubino."

TEIGNMOUTH.—At a concert given in aid of the Infirmary in this Town, Mr John Francis Barnett played with great brilliancy several of his compositions, including the grand fantasia on the "Ancient Mariner," which was greeted with unanimous applause by an appreciative audience, and his "New Gavotte in G minor" was honoured by an enthusiastic encore.—Teignmouth Gazette.

Our Copenhagen correspondent, writing on the 20th, says:—"The chief event of the week has been the concerts which Madme Trebelli Bettini has been giving here. The ten or twelve concerts have been crowded, and the visit has been a complete success. Madme Trebelli starts in a few days for Gothenburg, and goes thence to Christiania and Stockholm, returning by way of Finland and Germany to Vienna. She has arranged to appear ten times next February at the Royal Theatre."—Pall Mall Gazette.

The prevalence of colour-blindness is at last becoming recognised officially. How it is that so little has been known about it hitherto, is a distinct puzzle to me. Within my own personal acquaintance there are five persons who cannot distinguish between brown and green, and in two instances all sense of colour is lost. This malady certainly deserves attention, and I am glad, therefore, to see that the Board of Trade require all masters and mates applying for certificates to pass a test examination as to their power of recognising colour. The next thing ought to be to subject engine drivers and stokers to a similar examination.—Tatler.

On Tuesday afternoon the Thames at Old Windsor was the scene of an accident, which may involve the death of one of the sufferers. A fishing party including Mr and Mrs Joseph Thumwood, of Windsor, Miss Alice Thumwood, Mrs Christian (wife of Mr Christian, of the Eton College Choir), Master Frank Christian, and Mr C. Dobiner, were in a punt managed by Hayles, a Thames fisherman. The craft was moored out of the usual course of navigation, and the anglers engaged in their occupation, when a steam launch, coming down from the direction of Windsor, ran into the punt, capsizing it, and throwing Miss Alice Thumwood, Mr Dobiner, and Frank Christian into the water. They were rescued from drowning; but Frank Christian, it is feared, is seriously injured, Dr Ellison, one of Her Majesty's surgeons, giving but faint hopes of his recovery.

With reference to the cross suit commenced in Paris by Madme Patti for the nullification of her marriage with M. le Marquis de Caux, at the Roman Catholic Chapel, Clapham Park Road, on the ground that the ceremonial performed by the Very Rev. F. Plunkett was illegal, he not being a duly licensed priest, it must be remarked that this informality, if it existed, would be of no avail in the French courts, marriage being essentially a civil contract. The Marquis and Marquise de Caux were united at the French Embassy on the 27th of July, 1868, the witnesses on behalf of the lady being the Duke of Manchester and Sir Michael Costa. There are, however, counts in the indictment of the wife against the husband to cancel the union in London, Madme Patti affirms she was unable to state fully when the separation was pronounced at the demand of her husband.

THE TELEPHONE.—Mr A. Eubule-Evans writes from the Verulam Club, St James's Street:—"Just now the papers are full of references to the telephone; but, as I have nowhere seen it intelligibly described, perhaps the following simple description may be of interest. The telephone consists of a strong ordinary magnet, to the two extremities, or poles, of which are attached properly insulated telegraph wires. Just in front of the extremities of the magnet there is a thin plate of iron, and in front of this again there is the mouth-piece of a speaking-tube. By this last the sounds which it is desired to transmit are collected and concentrated, and, falling on the metal plate, cause it to vibrate. These vibrations, in their turn, excite in the two wires electric currents, which correspond exactly with the vibrations—that is, with the original sounds. If, now, the wires are connected with an ordinary line of telegraph, specially insulated for the purpose, the sounds can be transmitted to any distance, and, on arriving at their destination, are reproduced in a precisely similar apparatus. Already there are varieties of the telephone, but this is its essential nature. I have endeavoured to be brief, without, I hope, becoming obscure."

The new Glasgow City Halls will, as I have already announced, be inaugurated on the 13th of November, by a performance of the Messiah, but on the 15th there will be given the first performance of a new cantata, specially written for the inauguration of the City Halls by Dr G. A. Macfarren. There is something specially appropriate in the choice of both the composer and the work, for Dr Macfarren, albeit the greatest of living British musicians, is himself a Scotchman, while the work is a version, in the form of a cantata, of Sir Walter Scott's Lady of the Lake. The Lady of the Lake is, perhaps, the most popular poetic work of Scotland's heroic poet, and its scene is, I need hardly remark, chiefly laid in the vicinity of Glasgow, in the heart of that Rob Roy country which Scott loved so dearly. Nothing could therefore well be more thoroughly in keeping with the exigencies of the occasion than the cantata which Dr Macfarren has written for it. The subject, too, is peculiarly adapted to his talents, and its highly dramatic story has afforded him an opportunity of giving to the world a work which, so far as an opinion can be formed from a perusal of the score, bids fair to become one of the most generally popular of his many productions. The chorus parts have been for some time in Glasgow, where they are being carefully rehearsed under the direction of Mr Lambeth, and the leading vocalists have also received their music.—Figaro.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—Great interest is shown in this event, shortly to take place. From music-lovers all over the country applications for tickets have been received, and the seats for every performance are being rapidly taken up. The second seats, which are for the first time numbered and reserved, appear to be well appreciated. These seats will be much better situated than in 1874. On that occasion (as the Corporate Property Committee would not allow any part of the hall to be pierced) the gallery supports consisted of cross beams of thick timber. For the present gallery only eight light iron pillars are used, so that the view from the back part of the hall will be obstructed but little. The gallery itself will also be improved in its slope. In 1874 the rise was 4½ in. for each of the sixteen stages. For this Festival the rise has been made eight inches. The choral part of the Festival promises to be the finest yet heard in this country. Already no fewer than twenty-two rehearsals have been held—fifteen at Leeds (of which five were general), and seven at Bradford. Mr Walter Macfarren, who will conduct his brother's new oratorio, Joseph, at the Festival, has twice attended rehearsals of the work; and Mr Thomas Wingham of London (who is to conduct Mr Austin's new cantata, The Fire King), has also personally directed rehearsals of that composition. These two new works are spoken highly of by the chorus singers, and by all who have heard the rehearsals. Middle Albani, who was engaged by the committee in view of Middle Tietjens' inability to attend, will sing the soprano solos of Joseph, and also take part in several other performances during the Festival.

A Mystery.

A l'issue de la visite faite au Palais du Trocadéro par la Commission musicale de l'Exposition, M. Ambroise Thomas, ne trouvant pas à Argenteuil le calme voulu, s'est dirigé sur la Bretagne, pour se renfermer de nouveau dans ses rochers de Saint-Gildas, où l'architecte Clerget lui a construit un nid à l'abri des Parisiens. Seul, M. Jules Barbier, a osé franchir ces inexpugnables rochers, et encore était-ce pour causer de la partition de "Françoise de Rimini" dont plus d'une belle page sera datée du Saint-Gildas.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From the "Times.")

Gloucester, Sept. 4.

The weather yesterday boded ill for the prospects of the 154th meeting of the "Three Choirs," instituted long ago for purposes so often described that to comment upon them again would be superfluous. To-day, however, to the universal satisfaction, not only of the Gloucester people, but of those who come from all adjacent parts with the object of listening to a sacred oratorio in a Cathedral, the weather has brightened up, the sun shines without intermission, and "the rain is over and gone." If there is no change for the worse in the course of the next few days, the complete success of the Festival is, we have reason to believe, insured, and in the actual state of public feeling there is likely to be a more than ordinary donation to the fund for the widows and orphans, to say nothing about the never unimportant fact that the stewards—not very far from 200 in number, in the list of whom we find the names of many clergymen—will hardly be called upon to contribute anything towards a deficit. Last year (after the little schism which metamorphosed what used to be the "Worcester Festival" into a series of prolonged church services) the Mayor of Hereford entertained the Mayors and Corporations of Worcester and Gloucester on the first morning of the Hereford Festival, and this time the Mayor of Gloucester entertains the Mayors and Corporations of the sister counties in similar manner. They arrived in special trains, and were received by their host (or rather hosts, for the Town Council shared the responsibility) at the Tolsey, where they robed, and then walked in state to the Cathedral. The service (held in the choir), of ordinary cathedral use, was without orchestra, the music to the service being that of Dr Croft (in A); the anthem, Sir Gore Ouseley's "O sing unto the Lord." The congregation was very large. The members of the three choirs, as usual, gave their aid; and Mr. S. G. Hayward, assistant organist at the Cathedral, played the accompaniments, besides a voluntary (J. S. Bach) at the conclusion. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Gloucester himself, who selected for text the ninth verse of the 16th chapter of Luke, beginning from the words:—"That, when ye fail, they may receive you into lasting habitations." The occasion was one of special interest and significance, the Bishop of Gloucester never having been credited as a staunch upholder of the Festivals.

The Bishop commenced his discourse by referring at once to the position of the charity for the relief of clergymen's widows and orphans, in whose behalf these Festivals were established. The grave fact, he said, that the permanent interests of the charity connected with this Triennial Festival must be considered to be in some degree endangered at the present time, is the reason why he was now there, and why with others he was anxious to do all that could be done to keep up in its full efficiency a charity of long standing in our own and the two neighbouring counties. With regard to the particular form of sustaining it, which it is right to say had come down to us in an unbroken sequence from a period as distant as a century and a half ago, and rested upon what we might almost call local traditions, little need be said. Most of his hearers knew his general views and opinions, and to these it was quite unnecessary for him to allude on the present occasion. This, however, he might properly and rightly say—first, that so great did he deem the good effected by this charity, so serious, and, indeed, seriously increasing, were the needs which it was designed to supply, that he should feel himself acting with something more than unkindness to the silent and uncomplaining recipients of this Christian bounty if at a critical period in the sequence of these Festivals he failed to put private opinions somewhat in the background, and refused to appear in that place to press upon them a cause which he would show to them in the sequel even more than ever required earnest and benevolent support. He would not look back to those strange days when races and balls formed a part of the week's arrangements, but simply confine himself to the time during which he had been connected with the city and diocese. It was right that he should notice that many a quiet and salutary change had been effected in the arrangement and conduct of these Festivals. He should be much wanting in gratitude to the stewards and to the guardians of this noble cathedral, if he did not thus publicly recognise the distinct efforts on their part to make all who enter those venerable and historic walls feel verily that they were entering into the presence of the Lord of Sabaoth, and that they came there to take part with soul and spirit in a great series of the noblest and most heart-moving forms of praise wherewith it has entered into the heart of man to adore and to glorify his Maker. These efforts on the part of the Dean and Chapter and the Stewards he most joyfully recognised, and he felt with thankfulness that they have removed from before him some privately felt hindrances, and also some real stumbling-blocks. The right rev. preacher then proceeded to apply his text especially to the charity on whose behalf these Festivals were originated, referring to the condition of the clergy and the necessity for such a charity to help those who, through their self-sacrifice, were left unprovided for by this world's goods.

The oratorio of the day was the perennial Eljah, which, first heard in Gloucester some thirty years since, increases rather than diminishes in popularity. The performance began shortly before two o'clock and terminated about five. The Cathedral was as full as we can remember it to have been on any previous occasion, showing that Mendelssohn's last great work is always a safe attraction upon which to rely for the opening of a festival programme. Since the last meeting of the Three Choirs in this city, Gloucester has lost its Cathedral organist and the conductor of its Festivals since 1865. That in the late Dr Samuel Sebastian Wesley the artistic world generally has to regret one of the most consummate musicians of our time, to say nothing about his inimitable mastery of the instrument he loved so well, and to the ample repertory of which he contributed so much that will endure, need scarcely be said. Dr Wesley had not given the time and attention indispensable to win distinction as an orchestral conductor, but the association of his name with any institution having music for its object was of itself an honour to that institution. No son ever proved worthier a distinguished father than Dr Wesley, who inherited the love entertained by the elder Wesley for the works of John Sebastian Bach, and did as much to promulgate a taste for them in this country. No such man before him ever occupied the positions of Cathedral organist and conductor of the Festivals in the city of Gloucester.

Another estimable and well-reputed professor has also been lost to the Festival of the Three Choirs. It is necessary only to name Mr Townshend Smith, who for some quarter of a century was organist to Hereford Cathedral, and one of the most active promoters of the meetings of the Choirs. But very recently Mr Smith, after a journey to Gloucester on affairs connected with the business of the Festival, for which he was accustomed to train the Hereford choir and perform the duties of organist, was suddenly seized with apoplexy on his return home. Mr Smith was not, like Dr Wesley, a man of genius, but he was a musician of considerable attainments—a man of remarkable intelligence, great courtesy, and business habits not to be over estimated. He will in his sphere be regretted as much as Dr Wesley was in his. During all his career of influence he was the life and soul of the Hereford Festival. For this alone, independent of other claims to consideration, he will be remembered. That the death of two such men in the interval that has elapsed since the last assembly of the Three Choirs in Gloucester should call for some demonstration of sympathy was only to be expected. This could not through any other means be so aptly commemorated as by the performance of Handel's Dead March, given between the first and second parts of Eljah. We can only regret that the going out and coming back again of a large number of the audience did not admit of that reverential attention to a simple and magnificent homage to the dead which such an occasion should have enforced.

The performance of Eljah, under the direction of Mr Charles Harford Lloyd, Dr Wesley's successor, was for the most part excellent. That the absence of so glorious a singer of sacred music as Mlle Tietjens should have been lamented, more especially the cause of her absence borne in mind, was natural.

Nevertheless, what could be done in the circumstances was done according to the best means at hand. That which had been set down in the first part for the eminent prima donna, was undertaken by Mdme Sophie Löwe and Miss Adela Vernon. The first had been already proved at the Monday Popular Concerts, at the Crystal Palace, and elsewhere; the second, who has studied under a no less competent mistress than Mdme Sainton Dolby, is comparatively a beginner. She, however, promises well, and sang the music allotted to her with real intelligence and feeling. Happily, the services of Mdle Albani had been already secured for the second part of the oratorio, and her rendering of the trying air, "Hear ye, Israel," with its inspiring sequel, "Be not afraid," if anything could have consoled us for the absence of Mdle Tietjens, was just the thing to do it. Mdle Albani threw her whole soul into this impressive exhortation; nor was she less successful in the unaccompanied trio, associated with Mdle Sophie Löwe, and our unequalled contralto, Mdme Patey, or in the "Sanctus," "Holy, holy, holy, is God the Lord," the simple grandeur of which has never been surpassed. When it is added that the whole of the music of the Prophet was undertaken by Mr Santley, that the chief part of the contralto music was consigned to Mdme Patey, and that the tenor music was shared between Mr Cummings and Mr Edward Lloyd, enough has been said to show that the solo music was intrusted to thoroughly efficient hands. The choruses, into detailed particulars of which it is wholly unnecessary to enter, were given, as they are almost always given at these Three Choir Festivals, sometimes admirably, sometimes without that precision in the absence of which much of the intended effect is missed. The voices, however, are excellent, and with careful training might achieve great things.

The first evening concert at the Shire hall brought an immense audience. The programme comprised portions of the Paradise and Peri of Schumann, with a miscellaneous selection, including Mendelssohn's violin concerto, superbly executed by M. Sainton, and applauded with enthusiasm.

Wednesday, Sept. 5.

The new conductor, Mr C. Harford Lloyd, had imposed upon himself for to-day a task to accomplish which even indifferently well is by no means an easy matter. The first part of the programme was devoted, not to J. S. Bach's Passion according to Matthew, as was announced, but to a lengthy selection from that immortal composition. There could have been no harm in stating this frankly, inasmuch as every amateur is aware that the entire oratorio, as Sir Michael Costa some time ago presented it at one of the concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society, would occupy the day, to the exclusion of Beethoven's Engedi, the unwarrantably distorted version of Beethoven's Christus am Elberge (Mount of Olives) to which we have occasionally been accustomed at Exeter Hall and elsewhere. However, what was given in the Cathedral was ample enough. To name all the pieces—choruses, "chorales," recitatives, &c.—that were necessarily omitted would be wasting space to no purpose. It may be stated without further preamble that the execution of Bach's often abstruse and invariably difficult music was creditable to Mr C. H. Lloyd, and all, without exception, who worked under him—solo singers, chorus, and orchestra alike. Mr Lloyd, though young in his newly undertaken office, and therefore more or less inexperienced, seems to possess the right stuff for a conductor, combining those essential attributes of firmness, quietude, and self-control, in the absence of which any hope of reaching eminence as a ruler in this particular sphere of art-demonstration must be altogether illusory. The grand and elaborate double chorus, "Come, ye daughters, weep with me" (Zion's exhortation and the responses of the faithful), which, with its ingeniously interwoven choral prayer, "O Thou, begotten Son of God," opens the oratorio so magnificently, was for the most part rendered with a clearness and precision worthy unqualified praise. Here conductor, orchestra, and chorus were tested so severely that the satisfactory result may, with fairness, be recorded as a triumph. Without entering into minute details, it may be added that other choruses afforded no less convincing proofs that the singers had been most carefully and intelligently trained. Among special instances may be named the furious outburst of the multitude, "Have lightnings and thunders in clouds disappeared?"—sequel to the plaintive duet for soprano and contralto, "My Saviour, Jesus, now is taken," of which the abrupt exclamation of the chorus, "Leave Him! leave Him! bind Him not!" is so striking and characteristic a feature. The "chorales" chosen from the many comprised in the oratorio were "O blessed Jesus!" "My sin it was which bound Thee," "O Lord, Thy love's unbounded!" "O Father, let Thy will be done!" "O Lord, who dares to smite Thee?" (to the same tune, with slight modifications, as "My sin it was," &c.); and "O Thou whose head was wounded"—all well given and, as in such circumstances they could hardly fail to be, deeply impressive. The tunes of the greater number of these "chorales" were originally meant to be sung by the congregation, to whom they must naturally have been familiar; and the emotions engendered by them in the spirit of devout believers thus called upon to take part in the act of worship may be easily imagined. It is a fact of too much significance to be disregarded that the oratorios illustrating the passion of the Saviour, of which only two (the disputed St Luke being unpublished)—viz., St John and St Matthew—are now generally known, were, like other similar works of Bach, intended expressly for performance, not in a secular, but in a sacred building, where the lessons they teach might be more emphatically impressed upon the mind. That the congregation of to-day—for congregation, at least during the performance of the Passion music, it may strictly be termed—were earnestly attentive and apparently absorbed almost from beginning to end both in the text and in its sublime musical interpretation, it is satisfactory to note; but the word "almost" suggests some drawback to what would be otherwise an unqualified verdict of approval. The opening bars of the final chorus, "In tears of grief we here recline," one of the most touching and exquisite pieces that ever came, "like strong inspiration," to Bach, or to any other composer, were the signal for a general exodus—to lunch! Can we feel surprised that such unseemly occurrences give weapons of significance to those who conscientiously object to the festival performances being held in a cathedral?

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The "Classical Nights" given by the Messrs Gatti have proved very attractive. Wednesday evening was a "Mozart" night. The G minor Symphony, capably played, under the direction of Signor Arditì, was the pièce de résistance. It was listened to with great attention, and each movement was received with more or less applause. The other pieces were the overture to Le Nozze di Figaro, the andante and minuet from the Second Quartet (in D minor), played by all the stringed instruments (the minuet encored), and, for the first time in England, an andante (Op. 86) for the flute, capably played by Mr Oluf Svenaden. The vocal pieces were "Voi che sapete" and "Batti, batti," sung by Mdle Maria Derivia, and "Non più andrai," by Signor Medica. We should also have named a solo on the violoncello, played by M. Antoine Bouman.

The second part of the programme was, as usual, devoted to miscellaneous compositions. A selection from La Grande Duchesse, for orchestra and band of the Coldstream Guards, was well played. Mdle Debilemont was the pianist, and Mdle Pommereul the violinist. The first-named gave Liszt's "Fantaisie hongroise" (encored), and the last a fantasia on Gounod's Faust (also encored). Two quick marches, "The Leicester Square" (Mazzoni) and "I Bersaglieri" (Arditi), were effectively played by the orchestra and band of the Coldstreams. The vocalists were Mdles Rajmondi and Celega and Signor Medica. Signor Arditì's new bolero, "Il Gitano," sung by Signor Medica, so pleased the audience that they insisted on its repetition. The concert concluded with the "Bon soir" Galop, by Mr F. Godfrey.

A "Handel and Haydn" night is announced for next Wednesday, and Friday is to be a "Ballad" night.

LEIPSIC.—A new one-act opera, Prinzessin Rebenblüh, by Herr Mühlendorfer, is in preparation at the Stadttheater. One of the principal features in the programme of the Liszt concert, to be given at the Gewandhaus about the middle of the present month, will be the Abbate's "Faust Symphony."

III.

There now began a most diligent and ceaseless course of study for five whole years. It was the object of the careful master not so much to form an extraordinarily fine voice as a singer sure of herself, and in every respect a skilful musician. This object he perfectly achieved. Lessons in singing alternated with lessons on the piano; theoretical exercises, also, were prescribed and important works analysed—in a word, due attention was paid to every part of the pupil's musical training. Her voice attained singular volume and beauty. Without the slightest sharpness, it penetrated, with tremendous power, through chorus and orchestra, while, on the other hand, it could descend step by step to the lowest piano. Her execution surpassed everything previously known. She was able to sing one of Hasse's airs twelve times in succession, ornamenting it on each occasion extempore with different artistic figures which the best instrumental performer could not have excelled. For five entire years was she thus carefully taught, and in those years she became a really great singer. Father Hiller did not conceal from her, however, that she was deficient in almost everything requisite to form a dramatic artist. According to his statement, she was unable, after a five years' residence in his house, either to walk or stand properly, and he made no secret to her of what he thought. She had improved but little bodily. She was still the same ugly object she had been as a child. Hiller could wish for no more docile and obedient pupil as a singer, but in every other respect she manifested unparalleled obstinacy. All the unpolished, rough manners of her father, to whose society alone she had so long been exclusively accustomed, clung to her so tenaciously that most persons were painfully affected by them, and even forgot the singer on account of them. She perversely resisted every influence brought to bear upon her, directly it was not connected with music. Where the latter was concerned, she was as tractable as a lamb, but in everything else as "stubborn as a mule." She wanted to become a great singer and nothing more; what the world thought of her in other respects was, she declared, a matter of utter indifference. When Father Hiller often explained to her, with blank despair, that, if she did not alter, even as a singer she would be able to appear only in the concert-room and never on the stage, she laughed like an imp and assured him she was perfectly satisfied. But Fate had other views in store for her, and now stepped forward in the person of the Electress of Saxony.

IV.

The Electress had heard Gertrude sing in Leipzig, and, like a flash of lightning out of a clear sky, a sovereign mandate came one fine day from Dresden for "Miss Schmahling" ("die Jungfer Schmahling") to undertake the part of Queen Semiramis, there, in one of Hasse's operas. This was a thunder-clap both for master and pupil. But they had to conform themselves to the inevitable. It was the Dowager Electress herself who had arranged the matter. "Aye, but was the affair to be carried out off-hand?" the reader may inquire in astonishment—knowing that special studies, especially dramatic studies, were needed, and that the girl had never engaged in them. True—yet what was at that time expected from a singer on the stage? She was bound to sing differently, and certainly better than many artists we hear at the present day; in other respects, operatic writers themselves took care that profound dramatic studies were not unconditionally necessary. The command emanating from the Electress was, of course, forthwith obeyed at Leipzig, and thus Gertrude went to Dresden. Her august patroness immediately perceived in what the "Leipzig girl" ("Leipsigerin") was principally deficient. She directed that Gertrude should, with all possible haste, be taught to stand and walk, to hold her body and her head, so that she might in some degree understand how a Semiramis would move and deport herself, for the girl had not the slightest notion on the subject. As a matron, the famous artist frequently, with sparkling humour, acted to her friends the scenes in which she was then the principal personage. "They dressed her out," she said, "like a milliner's block; they tugged away at her, anyhow: they shoved her backwards and forwards upon the stage, till her anxiety knew no bounds. Yet it all vanished the moment she was able to open her mouth and sing; then she knew everything, and probably did it as it ought to be done." And it would really seem that her magnificent gifts as a vocalist disguised the ridiculous figure she must undoubtedly have cut as Queen Semiramis, for we hear nothing of a failure. The anxiety she had gone through, and the way in which she had been jostled about, so that, in obedience to the sovereign mandate, she might be set up properly, with all speed, had left behind them so unsatisfactory an impression, that she returned to Leipzig with the firm determination of never treading the stage again. Faithful to the precepts of Father Hiller, she resolved to devote all her energies exclusively to the concert room. She had come to see in what a step-motherly fashion she had been treated by Nature; and, having no desire herself to remedy by incessant observation and efforts the immense defects in her personal appearance, gave up all notion of competing on the stage with the then leading vocal celebrities, Todi and Gabriel, two artists who, by their vocal skill and their dazzling beauty, enjoyed the greatest celebrity throughout Europe. But it is a strange fact: the boards representing the world possess a mighty attraction for all who have once trodden their narrow domain. Everyone who has known the emotions of the world behind the scenes is drawn back again to that world as though by a thousand arms, and, despite all good resolutions to the contrary, will certainly embrace the first opportunity of satisfying his secret longings. This is what happened to young Gertrude. It is true that she had made up her mind never again to set her foot on the stage. With redoubled zeal she had plunged once more into her studies. "You were very right, Father Hiller," she said: "I am no good for opera, but I may become a great singer despite of that—may n't I?" And Father Hiller nodded approval, though, probably, it grieved him in the bottom of his heart to think that his pupil's extraordinary natural powers could never be measured with the brilliant stars in the operatic heavens. But, notwithstanding all Gertrude's good resolutions, the visit to Dresden recurred very frequently to her mind. As the days glided by in monotonous repose, the paler grew the disagreeable circumstances connected with Queen Semiramis; and all that remained was the recollection of the splendour and brightness bound up with them. What a life had been hers in Dresden, compared with the sameness of her existence in Leipzig! How different was everything when she appeared in the first-named city, compared to her experience of the Leipzig concerts. On the one hand were the quiet, devout burghers of the good trading town, all as plain and simple as they had been for years; on the other, the sparkling brilliancy of the Court, with the high, nay, the highest magnates of the land at her feet, while she—had she not felt that she stood above them, when she sent forth so triumphantly her magnificent notes, and all present broke out into enthusiastic applause of the "milliner's block"? The yearning after the world she had thus once seen took deeper and deeper root: and the question, "Is it then really not possible to remedy the defects which cling to me and bar my road?" kept rising with greater frequency in her heart, however little inclined she was to admit the fact. It needed only an impulse from without for all these dreams and secret wishes suddenly to find utterance. The opportunity soon arrived. When it did, she quickly made up her mind and did not recoil from the temptation. Even Father Hiller's anxious remark: "My child, you cannot do it; you really cannot do it!" elicited only the simple answer: "One must try." The following was the way in which this came about. Since the days of Augustus the Strong, the eyes of all Germany had been continuously directed to that true copy of the Court at Versailles, the Court at Dresden. The latter had, in a certain degree, come to give the tone to the Empire; for evil, however, rather than good. Everything which happened at Dresden was instantly reported on all sides. Things, too, had somewhat changed since the days of Augustus the Strong; and the young Prussian Eagle had, probably, new reasons why its Ambassador should invariably send to Berlin an exact report of everything that happened in Dresden. This, however, does not now concern us. It is sufficient for our purpose to know that the Ambassador's special reports extended to the Dresden Opera. The latter, in the days of Augustus the Strong, was the best in all Germany, and even for some time afterwards a model of Italian opera generally. Though it had not preserved this eminence, yet it was still of such excellence that Frederic the Great could take it as a guide to some extent in Berlin; and this he did, as far as such a course agreed with his own views on art. So the Prussian Ambassador at the Court of Saxony was strictly charged to send Count Zierotin, Frederic's Directeur des Spectacles in Berlin, early and exhaustive information of everything which took place at the Dresden Theatre. It was in this way that the fame of the young "Leipsic girl" flew to Berlin, without her entertaining a notion of the fact. Everyone was amazed. It was an utter impossibility! A female German singer in an Italian opera? And with great success? Who ever heard of such a thing! Italians were the only privileged artists! True; but the fact was not to be explained away. There it was in the report, in black and white, and the Ambassador absolutely seemed to wax quite warm on the subject. Yet it was incredible, or, at any rate, unexampled. It was so unexampled that, when his Director proposed the German girl as a singer at the Royal Opera, Frederic answered roughly, "Are you mad, Zierotin? A fine idea! I would rather hear an air neighed by a horse, than have a German as prima donna in my Opera company." Zierotin was in despair, but what could he do? At that precise moment, an eminent female artist was needed at the Berlin Opera, and it was incumbent on him, under all circumstances, to obtain such a one. But where was he to look for her? The incredible intelligence reached him from Dresden like a message from Heaven, but only for him to hear it thus received by the King. Zierotin, however, was not the man to be so easily put off, especially as he perceived no other means of escape from the dilemma in which he was placed. He followed the proverb: Continuous drops will wear away rocks, and kept cautiously reverting to the Leipsic girl. He did not miscalculate the effect of his plan. Having constantly to hear the praises of this German singer from Zierotin's lips, Frederic at last consented that she should be ordered to come "on trial" to Berlin. The trial, however, was to take place not on the stage but in a room, and before the King. And it was this very circumstance which decided Gertrude Schmahling's destiny. A trial on the stage—who knows how such a trial would have turned out? In this fashion, the summons to Berlin found its way to Father Hiller's house at Leipsic; and, despite all the representations of that sorely exercised professor, who foresaw no good result from the step, Gertrude resolved to obey it. "One must try," she observed; and with this observation put an end to all further remonstrances. Well, Gertrude Schmahling did try: and the trial, as far as the singer was concerned, proved no failure. The German entered the lists against her Italian sisters and came off victorious. For many years she was the undisputed prima donna of the Berlin Opera, the favourite of the King and of the public—despite all personal infirmities, which, however, concerned not the singer but only the woman. There can be no question that her partiality for defiance and contradiction was the principal cause why these personal infirmities eventually reached a pitch inevitably followed by a tremendous rupture. What Frederic the Great could bear less than aught else was the spirit of opposition; his will had to be obeyed in the slightest matters with which he was connected. But of this, more presently.

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

SEPTEMBER.*

We know that September is passing,
For changed are the leaves on the spray,
Bright leaves now all tinted, and shaded with gold,
Your glory will soon pass away.
We know that September is passing,
For the ploughman begins with the ground,
And the sower deposits the seed for the spring,
And the hop-pickers busy are found.

We know that September is passing,
By the rich mellow fruit on the tree,
When the swallows assemble and nurture their plans
For their flight o'er the wide-spreading sea.

We know that September is passing,
For the sportsman is heard on the moor,
And the days that are short'ning already foretell
That the reign of bright summer is o'er.

MUSIC AT THE ANTIPODES.

(From our own Correspondent.)

During the last month two new prime donne have appeared in Melbourne. On the 10th June Miss Jenny Sharpe, of Sydney, but some years ago known at popular entertainments given in this city and the suburbs, made her appearance at the Prince of Wales' Operahouse as Arline in The Bohemian Girl. There was a crowded house on the occasion, and Miss Sharpe was courteously and encouragingly received by the audience, but the young lady's means did not justify her appearing again. On the 30th June Mrs Howitz (Miss Staff), a young lady well and favourably known in the concert-hall, appeared for the first time in opera, at the Prince of Wales', as Maritana in the opera of that name. Her voice is a pure soprano, and her singing in the opera was very satisfactory, but she has much to learn as an actress.

On the 23rd June Mr Levey, the cornet player, concluded his engagement at the Operahouse, and then made visits to Geelong, Ballarat, Stawell, and Sandhurst, where he gave performances. Mr Levey was succeeded at the Operahouse by Mons. Léon Caron, an accomplished violinist, whose best performance has been his own concerto in D minor, a splendid work for the solo instrument, with accompaniment for full orchestra.

The other performances at the Operahouse have been Giroflé-Girofla, La Belle Hélène, La Périochole, and Trial by Jury. The part of Helen was sung by Miss Clara Thompson (sister of Miss Lydia Thompson). When La Belle Hélène was first produced in Melbourne the same part was sustained by Miss Emily Melville, now in the United States. Trial by Jury was produced as an afterpiece to La Belle Hélène.

On the 26th June the Melbourne Philharmonic Society performed Judas Maccabeus in the Town Hall. Mr. David Lee acted as conductor.

Offenbach's grotesque romantic opera, The Brigands, was produced for the first time at the Operahouse on the 7th inst., and is very successful.

TAMBERLIK.

It is generally supposed that Tamberlik was born at Rome. This is a mistake. Some interesting details supplied to M. Prével fix the celebrated singer's origin. His real name is Thomas Berlic (Berlic signifying, in Roumanian, the ace of clubs), and he was born in a small Roumanian village in the neighbourhood of Botouchani. The son of poor peasants, he entered when a boy the service of a rich farmer, whose coachman he became somewhat later. One day he had to drive his master to Botouchani, just as the Italian company performing at Jassy happened to be passing through the place. While rubbing down, in the courtyard of the hotel, the horses he had taken out of the carriage, he began singing some national Roumanian airs, which are pitched very high. As chance would have it, the tenor of the Italian company was also in the courtyard. Astonished at such singing, he went up to his room, took his tuning-fork, and verified the notes. Berlic already possessed the ut de poitrine which made his fortune. In ecstasy at his discovery, the Italian artist called his comrades. They asked Thomas to sing, and they asked him to drink. The end of the matter was that the manager offered to take the poor young coachman with him, and have him taught music and singing. He promised the youth 450 francs a month. Berlic, who earned 150 francs a year, with two pairs of boots and a "rain-cloak," according to the custom of the country, enthusiastically accepted the terms, and set out with the Italian company, accompanying them on their return to Italy, where he made his appearance shortly afterwards with a success which kept continually increasing. What a distance now separates him from Jassy!

BADEN.—Herr Hans von Bülow lately paid this town a visit, after making a stay of nine weeks at Kreuznach, where he met a medical friend who discovered what was really the matter with him, and told him what was the proper treatment for his case. Herr von Bülow leads a very retired life, and avoids all society. Whether, or when, he will resume his professional career is still very uncertain.

The place which Wagner assigns to the orchestra is utterly unworthy. The members of the orchestra become the pariahs of the Opera. Far superior in many ways, in knowledge, ability, industry, modesty and musical spirit to the not always musical artists, puffed up by their high salaries, who act upon the stage, and who are accustomed to being overwhelmed with applause, for most moderate achievements, by a crowd incapable of judging, here they are treated as mere machines. But now to consign the orchestra, however contemptuously the singers may look down on them from their Olympian height, to the glowing temperature of a cellar in July and August, is to forget that the best and most estimable interpreters of musical art sit in our orchestra. * * *

If we follow Wagner's peculiar course of development, we find that always the next work is a negation of the preceding. Has the poet-composer reached the end of his endeavours in the Nibelungen Trilogy? Who can know that? When the ripe Beethoven looked back upon the works of his youth, which still bloom to-day, did he deny them as misgrown, stunted children? Certainly not. The master who in his youth composed the three Piano Trios, Op. 1, is for us just as much a composer by the grace of God, as the old man, deeply bowed down and confused by sickness and by bitter life experiences, who wrote the Quartet Fugue, Op. 133, and the Quintet Fugue, Op. 137. He is lovable, deeply sympathetic, genial and imperishable in his earlier, as he is bold, worthy of admiration and of reverence even in the aberrations of his latest period.

Every great artist has certain sins and weaknesses to regret in his youthful works; but such an eager haste for ever new forms and effects, such an unquiet nervous striving continually to startle the world anew, to convince it of one's own greatness and importance and obtrude himself upon it as a redeeming Saviour, as we find in Wagner, the history of Art has never known before. We admire his extraordinary qualities, his many-sided talent, his energetic strength, his superhuman perseverance, yet he cannot convert us to the belief that he is the expected Messiah of Art. But the ball of his fame is at last rolling, and it is in no man's power to stop it. If one should speak with angels' tongues against the weaknesses, and the pernicious tendency of the new direction, it would be in vain; what good has it ever done to raise an instructing, warning or satirical voice against the exorcences of fashion? There is but one consolation to offset such experiences: after every intoxication follows awakening. It seems to us as if Mozart and Beethoven and their great forerunners and successors, in presence of these artistic aberrations, rose up before us mightier and more majestic every day, and spoke even a more impressive language than they ever did.

Will the Nibelungen Trilogy have a future, i.e., will it come into closer contact with the theatres so hateful to the composer? Will the future really do homage to the new Art doctrine? We might answer, No: but unaccountable and indefinable as the changes of fashion are the tastes and inclinations of the public. Minds continually thirsting for novelty may find a satisfaction in a speedy repetition of the Trilogy: and this may beget in turn all the livelier craving for the wholesome food of an earlier period. Nothing is more transitory than a musical creation. No work of any other Art fades, evaporates, dies away more rapidly. How little of what is best and noblest in what we now have has any prospect of eternal or of long duration? And what avails the applause of the moment? Many of the most excellent works have found an enthusiastic reception, admiring praise and eloquent homage, and the next decade has entirely forgotten them. Every artist strives for posthumous fame, sacrificing his best power to an empty fleeting phantom. Wagner's Trilogy might have some chance of longer life and general diffusion, if some good, enthusiastic friend of the composer could be found, an expert in the business, who by skilful cuttings should reduce the work for four evenings to a work for one evening and of moderate length. Were all the beauties of the colossal drama condensed into a single night; were all that is unnecessary, all that is lengthy and tiresome set aside, then one might listen to the Ring des Nibelungen with true pleasure.

* From Dwight's Journal of Music.

Wagner's endeavour to bring out his work in all possible perfection was exceedingly to his credit. But here, too, although extraordinary means were placed at his command, the insufficiency and limitation of human effort was most strikingly apparent. To build a house on purpose for the festival play, was an act of mad extravagance and measureless presumption; to place it away off in little Bayreuth was, mildly speaking, an inconsiderate way of doing business.

For Wagner himself the month of August of the year 1876 was a month of honour in the fullest meaning of the word; then he attained what no master of Art ever attained before. If among the audience at the Festival Play there were some dissenters and opponents, and if the general success of the work as a whole remained a very doubtful one, yet princely favour and the homage of the fair, generous friends and enthusiastic followers heaped upon him substantial proofs of devotion and esteem in almost overwhelming measure. On the other hand no one ever understood, as he does, how to stir up a fermentation, how to importune and set up great claims. May he enjoy what satisfaction he has had! He has not been spared also days of bitter trial and discouragement: he has been through the hardest struggles. The applause, perhaps intended less for the poem and the music than for Wagner personally, and for the fatalistic conviction so strongly stamped in him of his prophetic calling, was every evening tumultuous. On the conclusion of the last series it roared through the house for full ten minutes. In that moment the poet-composer stood at the zenith of his glory; he had reached what a mortal in his boldest dreams can only hope and long for; he too could tell of a parterre of princes; representatives of all cultivated nations brought him admiring homage.

It is generally known what a bad impression Wagner's short speech at the end of the first series made. Although he had given out through placards that neither he nor the performers would respond to a recall ("since they must not step out from the frame of the Art work in course of representation"), yet he did at last allow himself to be cheered and called before the curtain. Without any inward excitement, without a trace of joy and satisfaction, in that moment when the profoundest emotion, overflowing thankfulness would naturally have inspired him, he spoke only the cold words: "You have now seen what we can do; will you now!—And if you will, we will have an Art." He said it, bowed and disappeared. As if drenched by a shower bath, the astonished assembly went away. Even the most devoted friends of the great, but so imprudent man, who had given vent to his over-full artistic heart in this unexpected way, showed themselves confounded and put out of humour; the adversaries triumphed. Jest and bitter observations were upon all lips. In vain did the unfortunate orator, at the festival banquet of the next day, seek to weaken and wipe out the unfavourable impression of his words. And so the most magnificent and most pretentious artistic enterprise of modern times closed, very fitly, with a word of unexampled pretension. None the wiser for this experience, Wagner allowed himself again, at the close of the last series, to be drawn into a public expression of his views.

WÜRZBURG.—The second annual report of the Royal School of Music has been published. We learn from it that there are fifteen professors, including the Director, Dr Karl Kliebert, who teaches the two departments of musical theory and choral-singing. The School was attended during the past year by 387 pupils, who gave four concerts and four evening entertainments to which the public were admitted, besides four evening entertainments among themselves.

WIESBADEN.—After a short illness, Bernhard Hopffer, the composer, expired on the 21st ult., at the hunting-seat of Niederwald, near Rüdesheim. He received his musical education at Kullak's Academy, Berlin, studying composition under Herr Wüerst. In April, 1871, his opera of Frithjof was successfully produced at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin. A festal piece of his, entitled Barbarossa, was performed at the same theatre on the return of the army to the Prussian capital, after the war with France. "Pharao," a ballad by him, for chorus and orchestra, was publicly performed at Berlin in 1876, by Hollander and Stern's Vocal Association. Bernhard Hopffer suffered from disease of the lungs, which interfered greatly with his work. He survived his brother, Emil, who wrote the libretto of Frithjof, only six weeks, and is laid by his side in the new cemetery here.

THE NATIONAL OPERAHOUSE.

(To the Editor of the "Times.")

SIR,—Two years ago, Mr Gye, without any provocation on my part, attacked me in your columns on the ground that I had endeavoured to make engagements with singers under contract to him. I had done nothing of the kind. Now he pretends that I have made "covert attempts to depreciate his theatre," and founds upon that imaginary fact a right to indulge publicly in fanciful calculations as to the amount required for finishing the National Opera-house on the Victoria Embankment.

I did not seek to depreciate Mr Gye's Theatre. I said that "the London theatres now existing were situated in crowded and unhealthy neighbourhoods, so that to ventilate them was to let in bad air;" and it is not my fault if Mr Gye takes what was meant as a general observation as one particularly applicable to Covent Garden. I did not invite him to discuss my estimates—or rather, the estimates of the architect and contractor—for the National Opera-house; they were never intended to meet with his approbation. But, as I am about to issue £110,000 of preference shares for the purpose of completing and furnishing the building, I must beg you to allow me enough space, not to follow Mr Gye through his long array of figures, but to touch only on one or two items of the extravagant sum which he would like my economically, though liberally, planned enterprise to cost.

The outlay in building the Royal Italian Opera "very nearly doubled the original estimates," therefore, according to Mr Gye, no faith can be placed in any estimate; or rather every estimate must, according to Mr Gye, be multiplied by two. If the architect and contractor of the National Opera-house say, as they do, that £110,000 is required to complete and furnish the building, the sum really wanted is £220,000. If they had said £220,000, the amount needed would be £440,000, and so on.

Mr Gye would seem to forget that the foundations of the National Opera-house have been solidly established; that the works have been erected up to the first tier of the boxes; and that the cost of finishing the building can now be calculated with comparative precision.

Again, to give an idea of the wildness, or, at least, inaccuracy of the calculations which Mr Gye has taken the trouble to make for my enlightenment, allow me to call attention to the annual charge which he proposes should be levied on the National Opera-house for fire insurance. At Her Majesty's Theatre it amounts to about £900. Mr Gye, when I was his partner at the Royal Italian Opera, paid also about £900. Yet the amount that Mr Gye suggests that I should be charged at the National Opera-house is £5,250. Why this notable difference—especially when it is borne in mind that my theatre will be absolutely fire-proof? The floor of the pit at the National Opera-house is of concrete; the pit floor of Covent Garden is of wood.

But I can forgive Mr Gye his periodical onslaughts on my undertaking; for if he did not believe in its success he would not, as he in fact does, take every opportunity of undervaluing it. I remain, your obedient servant,

J. H. MAPLESON.

Her Majesty's Theatre, August 31.

M^{ME} ADELINA PATTI is engaged by Mr Pyatt, of Nottingham, for five concerts, to be given during the month of October, in Manchester, Nottingham, Liverpool, Birmingham, and Bradford. Mr Sims Reeves and Mr Santley will appear with M^{me} Patti at each concert.

Miss Minnie Hauk made her début on Tuesday, at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, as Marguerite, in Gounod's Faust. A correspondent informs us that the charming American prima donna "never acted better in her life. The house was crowded, and there was no end of applause. The audience called for her after each act till they were hoarse; but Minnie was not allowed to come forward, the directors saying that it was against the rules of the Institution."

MODERN ALBOHALUS (meditating).—Avicenna;—ass;—Pomperatious ass;—Cardanus assent. Goethe about genius! And Alghern! (reads aloud to himself):—

"That great genius is liable to great error the world has ever been willing, if not more than willing, to admit; that great genius not equally balanced by great intellect is not one half as liable to go one half as wrong as intellect unequally counterpoised by genius, is a truth less popular and less familiar, but neither less important nor less indisputable. . . . And from this point of difference, if from no other point here discernible, those who will or who can learn anything may learn a lesson in criticism which may perhaps be worth laying to heart: that genius, though it can put forth no better claim than intellect may assert for itself to share the papal gift of infallibility, is naturally the swifter of the two to perceive and to retrieve its errors. Where genius takes one false step in the twilight and draves back by instinct, intelligence once misguided will take a thousand without the slightest diffidence; will put its best foot foremost in the pitchy darkness, step out gallantly through all brakes and quagmires till stuck fast up to the middle, and higher yet, in some blind Serbonian bog of blundering presumption, and thence will not improbably strike up a psalm of hoarse thanksgiving or shrill self-gratulation, to be echoed from afar by the thousand marshy throats of a Motion or Emotion frog concert, for the grace here given it to have set a triumphant foot on the solid rock, and planted a steady flagstaff on the splendid summits of supreme and unsurpassable success."

Oh Pimini! Ambroise Thomas forbid that I should say "Rimini."

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

MDLLE TIETJENS was yesterday not so well. An unfavourable change took place on Saturday, and she was yesterday visited by her London physician.—Pall Mall Gazette, Tuesday, Sept. 4.

SEPTEMBER recalls the following facts:—the 1st, birth of Amicare Ponchielli, Paderno Fasolaro (Cremona), 1834; the 4th, Inauguration of the Mozart Monument at Salzburg, 1842;—the 5th, birth of Giacomo Meyerbeer, Berlin, 1791—death of Angelo Catelani, S. Martino di Mugnano, 1866; the 7th, birth of André Philidor, Dreux, 1726; the 8th, death of Jacopo Foroni, Stockholm, 1858—inauguration of the Conservatory of Music, St Petersburg, 1862—first performance in Italy of Spontini's Vestale, Naples, 1811—inauguration of the Royal Conservatory of Music, Milan, 1808; the 10th, birth of Nicola Jommelli, Aversa, 1714; the 11th, birth of Eduard Hanalick, Prague, 1825; the 12th, death of G. P. Rameau, Paris, 1764—birth of Theodor Kullak, Krotoczyn, 1818; the 13th, birth of Clara Wieck-Schumann, Leipsic, 1819; the 14th, birth of Luigi Cherubini, Florence, 1760—death of Philip Emmanuel Bach, Hamburg, 1788—death of Giuseppe Mosca, Messina, 1839; the 15th, death of Pierre Marie François Baillot, Paris, 1842—death of Alessandro Rolla, Milan, 1841: the 17th, birth of Saverio Mercadante, Altamura (?), 1795—death of Francesco Pollini, Milan, 1846—death of Giacomo Tritto, Naples, 1824—death of Francesco Geminiani, Dublin, 1762—birth of H. M. Berton, Paris, 1767; the 19th, first performance of Struensee, by Michel Beer, with music by his brother, Giacomo Meyerbeer, Berlin, 1846; the 20th, death of Daniel Steibelt, St Petersburg, 1823—death of Vincenzo Federici, Milan, 1827; the 21st, birth of August Wilhelmj, Usingen, 1845; the 23rd, death of Vincenzo Bellini, Puteaux, near Paris, 1835—death of Marie Garcia-Malibran, Manchester, 1836—first performance of Gluck's Armide, Paris, 1777; the 24th, death of André Grétry, Montmorency, 1813; the 25th, birth of G. P. Rameau, Dijon, 1683—death of Johann Strauss, Senr, Vienna, 1849; the 26th, first performance of Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor, San Carlo, Naples, 1835; the 30th, first performance of Mozart's Zauberflöte, Vienna, 1791.

SPEAKING at Weber's grave, Wagner thus apostrophised the composer of Der Freischütz:—"Never was there a German master like to thee! Wherever thy genius carried thee, to whatever boundless region of the imagination, thou wast ever knitted by the fibres of thy tenderness to the German heart, with which thou didst weep and laugh like a believing child, when it listens to the stories and legends of its home. As thou didst preserve virtue untarnished, thou didst not need to invent or think, but simply to feel, and the original was produced. Thou didst guard virtue till death, for thou couldst not sacrifice so fair an inheritance of German descent. Thou couldst not betray us. See how the Briton does thee justice! The Frenchman, too, admires thee. But to love thee is given only to the soul of a German. Thou art his; a beautiful day of his life; a warm drop of his blood; a portion of his very heart!"

On the organ at Halberstadt there are painted the portraits of three monks, who, according to tradition, sang themselves to death with sacred music, while Satan sat in a double-bass, disturbing them with his groans and growls.

SPEAKING of the composer of La Reine de Chypre, Gustave Planche observed:—"Halévy reminds me of a painter all whose original pictures look like copies."

CONCERT.

AGRICULTURAL HALL.—Mme Liebhart's concerts continue to be largely attended. On Saturday last 9,000 persons assembled to enjoy a thoroughly popular programme. The artists were Mme Liebhart, Miss Giulia Warwick, Mr Wilford Morgan, and Mr Maybrick, together with the grand orchestra, under the direction of Mr F. Kingsbury, and the band of the Royal Horse Guards, under the direction of Mr C. Godfrey. Mme Liebhart sang "Little bird so sweetly singing" with such charm as to call forth an enthusiastic demand for its repetition; Miss Giulia Warwick was successful in her rendering of "Rory O'More;" Mr Wilford Morgan gave his popular ballad "My sweetheart when a boy," with great effect, his voice being heard to much advantage throughout the vast space. In reply to an enthusiastic encore, he gave "My pretty Jane." In the second part of the concert he was called upon to repeat "La donna è mobile." Mr Maybrick sang "Non più andrai" in capital style, and afterwards "Nancy Lee" (encored, "True Blue" substituted). The British Army Quadrille, played by the combined orchestra and bands, was received with great cheering, and finished up the concert admirably. Mr Wilford Morgan, owing to his great success, has been engaged for every evening next week.

PROVINCIAL.

ABERDEEN.—THE KENNEDY FAMILY.—This accomplished family of Scotch vocalists gave an entertainment, on Saturday evening, Sept. 1st, in the Music Hall, which was filled by an appreciative audience. Songs "i' the braid Scottish tongue" have not lately received the attention they deserve, and it is, therefore, pleasant to find that the efforts of the "Kennedy Family" were received in the right spirit. The pieces given were chiefly Scotch, the exceptions being of such a character as to render their admission to the programme not only excusable but desirable. One of the most amusing features of the concert was the "pawkinsness" of Mr Kennedy, sen., displayed in the explanatory remarks with which he prefaced nearly every song. His story of Saunders M'Glashan was well received, the homely pathos and "auld-farrant" humour being keenly appreciated by his listeners. The programme contained amongst other pieces "The Four Maries," "My Nannie's awa," and "Rantin' Rovin' Robin." The "Cloud capt towers," glee, by six voices, was in itself an entertainment.

STEEPLE ASHTON.—With the exception of Salisbury Cathedral—says the Trowbridge Chronicle—we suppose there is no church in the county that has a better organ than the fine old church of St Mary's in this village, and it was thither a large number of the neighbouring gentry repaired on Thursday afternoon, August 30th, to hear its grand tones brought out under the fingers of Mr H. Millington organist of Trowbridge parish church, who "recited" the following pieces:—

March, Naaman (Costa); Motet, "Hear my prayer" (Mendelssohn); Offertoire, in G minor (Wely); Allegretto, in B flat (Lemmens); Trio, "La Carità" (Rossini); Air, "I know that my Redeemer" (Handel); Chorus, "How excellent" (Handel); Andante Pastorale, in B minor (Guilmant); Concerto, in F major (Rink); Andante, in G major (Batiste); Chorus, "We worship God" (Handel); Improvisation on Theme (Lemmens); Air, "O rest in the Lord" (Mendelssohn); Grand Chorus, "Hallelujah" (Handel).

The organ is the gift of Mrs Long and her family as a memorial to her husband, the late R. P. Long, Esq., of Rood Ashton House. Being in a church, there was, of course, no demonstration of applause, but we feel sure all must have felt grateful to Mr Millington for the high musical treat he had given them. After the recital the vicar and Mrs Hartley entertained a large party at the vicarage.

I have, in several reports addressed to your Lordships, and repeatedly on other occasions, expressed my scepticism in respect to the entire musical incapacity even of persons who have attained middle life without giving any attention to music; and my absolute disbelief in it, in the cases of what are called "young persons," a fortiori of children. Of adults this is not the place to speak. But two remarkable illustrations of "natural" inaptitude for music were presented to me at the close of one of my last examinations in the persons of two first-year students of the average age, both of whom were reported to me as voiceless and earless. A few minutes' encouraging investigation proved that they both possessed contralto voices, in as yet unformed conditions, and that, consequently, they had great difficulty in using their "second registers" at all, and greater in passing from one register to the other. They were able, though somewhat slowly, to reproduce correctly any sound sung or played which was within their as yet very limited compass.

In connection with "failures," entire or partial, I may mention that the number of "colds" has been also unprecedentedly small this year. On the occasion of my first inspection tour, colds were provokingly, if not astonishingly, numerous. Their number, I will venture to say, will for the future be in tolerably steady ratio with the preparedness of the mass of students, among whom it is now generally understood that the worst cold need never affect a student's "marks;" for it cannot possibly prevent his knowing the 4th of a scale from the 7th when both are sounded, nor even so thoroughly disguise his "style" as to prevent its recognition, for more than a few moments.

My scheme of examination remains essentially the same as in 1872. In one subject included in it, style, I find very general improvement. The solos "previously studied" have this year in many instances been sung with considerable taste, as well as with perfect accuracy of time and tune. Moreover, they have been chosen often, by those who have had to sing them, with far more judgment than formerly. The lists of songs to be sung presented to me in some of the colleges might have satisfied the most critical taste, including, as they often did, fairly representative compositions of the very best matters. An evidence of the indirect action of one of the new subjects of study on another was furnished by a female student at the Free Church Training College, Edinburgh. She sang me a French song, the first I had ever heard in a training college to foreign words.

I regret to have to notice still considerable, though assuredly diminished, unwillingness on the part of many students to sol-fa. The indulgence of this unwillingness is a great practical disadvantage to a student. Rarely do I hear a note correctly named and at the same time incorrectly sounded; and I find generally that the correctness of its intonation is in proportion to the readiness with which its name is applied to it. *Sol-fa*ing requires thought, and unwillingness or inability to sol-fa are results and proofs of unwillingness to think. The notion, once all but universal, that musical performance is a sort of trick, in no way connected with or dependent upon knowledge and the power of applying it, is not yet extinct, even among educationists who are non-musical, and it has still a mischievous influence on those who would willingly attain musical skill were it attainable without trouble.

I do not know how it is with other subjects, but in respect to music some teachers still show a sad inappreciation of method. Musical text-books are sometimes strangely used. Pieces are picked out from them and practised, apparently because they please the ear, without reference to their musical purpose, their illustration of a theoretical point or exemplification of a practical difficulty, and of course without reference to what, in the course of which they form part, precedes and should lead up to them. Method is no doubt a wretched tool in feeble and clumsy hands, but it is an efficient and beautiful instrument in strong and skilful ones. I find, too, that much practice still goes on apart from theory, and much theory apart from practice. Theory and practice, if not identical, are in music largely interdependent, and the occasions in which they are dealt with separately should be quite exceptional. Perhaps every teacher needs to be reminded occasionally that the course over which he is for the twentieth time guiding a class is being travelled by them for the first. I think, too, that in not a few instances it would be found on investigation that impatience of routine is more often and perhaps more severely felt by teachers than by learners, the most heedless of whom generally know, and rejoice in knowing, that he is improving in knowledge or skill.

The practice, once so common in male training colleges, of assigning the soprano parts of music for the perfect choir to students with tenor voices, who inevitably sing them at an octave below their real pitch, is, I rejoice to say, nearly extinct. I trust that my repeated and earnest remonstrances against this practice will, for the future, save students from the mischievous effects of producing and becoming used to the horrible cacophony sometimes resulting from it. At one or two colleges, eminently York and Peterboro', this evil is avoided by the occasional introduction of boys from the "practising schools." But this, of course, involves the teaching of such boys "to sing from notes," still, I fear, an exceptional proceeding in practising or any other elementary schools.

The objection, once so common in the female training schools, to "singing second" seems to have disappeared entirely. Indeed, I am told, the more intelligent and earnest students ask to be allowed to do it.

BERLIN.—The Royal Operahouse re-opened with Lohengrin. The first novelty will be Herr Brüll's Landfrieden, and the second, Herr Wüerst's Offiziere der Königin. Whether, in addition to the above, Die Walküre or Die Königin von Saba, will be given this season is at present quite undecided.—M. Ch. Leocq's Petite Mariée has, under the title of Graziella, been successfully produced at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater, though, with the exception of Herr Swoboda, as San Carlo, none of the artists did anything like justice to the music, however well they acquitted themselves histrionically. The band, under Herr Kleffeld, was good, but the chorus too noisy.

BRUNSWICK.—It will be twenty-five years in October since Herr Franz Abt commenced his official career here as substitute for the Capellmeister, Herr G. Müller, who had been granted a long leave of absence on account of ill-health. On the death of Herr Müller, in 1855, Herr Abt succeeded him as Court Conductor and Director of the Orchestra at the Ducal Theatre. With a view of properly celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary, the orchestra and several vocal associations have determined to give two concerts, one on the 29th and one on the 30th of the present month. Among the eminent artists who have promised their co-operation is Herr Niemann.

CARL LUDWIG FISCHER.

This artist, whose sudden death at Hanover we recently recorded, was born in 1816 at Kaiserlautern. He manifested at an early age a partiality for music, and played Rode's violin concertos when he was only eight. In 1832 he took lessons of Herr Fach-born, Capellmeister at Mannheim, in the theory of his art, and was then himself engaged in the above capacity at Trèves, Aix-la-Chapelle, Cologne, Nuremberg, Würzburg, and Mayence successively. From the last-named town he went, in 1852, to Hanover, where he was appointed first Capellmeister in 1850. In 1847 he received the diploma of the Royal Academy of Belgium and the large Belgian Medal for Science and Art. In 1858 the Saxe-Ernest House Order was conferred on him. He was, moreover, a member of the Guelph Order and of the Red Eagle Order of Prussia, both 4th class.

A REMINISCENCE.

A MORNING AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE. HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT. 1841.

I had lately published a second series of English Songs, a copy of which I had presented to my kind friend, Lord Burghersh,—afterwards the Earl of Westmoreland, an amateur composer of Italian operas, a Director of the once famous "Ancient Concerts," and the Founder of the Royal Academy of Music. His Lordship had, from my early boyhood, taken a kindly interest in my musical studies, and now sought a favourable opportunity to introduce me to His Royal Highness, Prince Albert, whose musical proclivities and acquirements were well known. To that end Lord Burghersh presented to the Prince not only my second, but my first set of songs, published in 1838, which included a Serenade which has since acquired celebrity,—viz., Shelley's "I arise from dreams of thee." His Lordship intimated to me that His Royal Highness had introduced them to the notice of the Queen; that they had been much admired; and that both Her Majesty and the Prince had graciously signified their wish to see me, and to hear me play. A time was appointed for my attendance at the Palace—at noon on Thursday, the 17th of February, 1841.

It was then the young Queen's almost invariable custom to take a morning drive in an open carriage, and, in going from and returning to Buckingham Palace, to pass and re-pass Baker Street, Portman Square, the street in which I resided. I awaited Her Majesty's return, and immediately followed in the same direction. On arriving at my destination I was conducted to an ante-chamber in the Prince's suites of apartments, and was soon joined by Captain Francis H. Seymour, now Major-General Sir Francis H. Seymour, Bart., who, as he incidentally remarked, was, by virtue of the office he held in the Prince Albert's household, "in attendance" upon me.

After an interval of about half-an-hour it was signified to me that His Royal Highness was prepared to receive me, and I was ushered into his presence. I found Prince Albert, attended by the Hon. Charles Augustus Murray, the Master of his Household, standing in an apartment of moderate dimensions, simply furnished, for a royal palace, and about which there was an unmistakable air of domestic comfort. I was introduced to the Prince, who received me so graciously, and in such a kind manner, that I felt at once at my ease. There was no condescension traceable in the Prince's manner, which was charming, and indeed fascinating by its exquisite delicacy and refinement. I was in the presence of a highly-bred gentleman. Despite the thirty-six years that have passed over my head since my memorable and most interesting interview with the then young Consort of Her Gracious Majesty, I retain a most vivid remembrance of his handsome, noble countenance and figure, of his graceful deportment, and truly Prince-like bearing.

My compositions were referred to by His Royal Highness in encouraging and complimentary terms, and I was asked to play "something." I noticed that against the wall stood a grand square pianoforte, by Broadwood, and that over the instrument hung a finely painted portrait of Her Majesty,—an excellent likeness. The pianoforte, which was closed, was opened by the Prince himself, who expressed his regret that, for my sake, it was not a "Grand," and he added, with considerate amiability, that he was sorry "the Queen," who had intended to be present, was unavoidably absent. The Prince took a chair, and seated himself close to the pianoforte on my right hand, and placing his right leg perpendicularly over his left knee, he nursed it, so to speak, while I played, from memory, Thalberg's Andante in D flat. After I had played, the Prince expressed admiration both of the composition and its performance. He spoke of Thalberg, his charming playing, and his works. I was an ardent admirer of Thalberg; he was my beau idéal of pianists;

I knew him well, and had been much with him at Vienna in the autumn of 1838, when he often played to me his new works, at the palace of his father, the Prince Dietrichstein. I was again requested to play, and one of my own compositions. I selected one, not then in print, a Romance Varié, entitled "La notte serena," which I had originally designed to dedicate to Thalberg. This piece, which has since become well known, pleased the Prince, who said many kind things about it. His Royal Highness then rose, and we four—the Prince, Captain Seymour, Mr Murray, and I—formed a standing group, while the Prince was delightfully conversational. He encouraged me to talk, by enquiring if I had been in Italy—probably struck by the Italian title of the pianoforte piece he had just heard. I replied that, in the autumn of the preceding year, (1840), I had passed three months in that country, dividing my time between Milan, Venice, Florence, and Rome. I spoke enthusiastically of Italy; and I soon discovered that my royal listener was no less an admirer of "La bella Italia," where, as I afterwards learned, he had passed some time. After speaking of the then condition of music in Italy, from his own personal experience, the Prince remarked that he would tell us an anecdote, and, with much humour and animation, he proceeded to narrate an occurrence which befel an old Italian musician, the recollection of which seemed to afford him amusement. The details of the story have faded from my memory; but I remember that it was about an old "Fanatico della Musica," who was engaged in the composition of an opera, when an inundation deluged the town, or city, in which he dwelt. I fail to recollect whether it was Pisa, Florence, or Rome. The poor old gentleman continued to compose and write while the waters were gradually rising higher and higher. Absorbed in his work, and heedless of the danger of being drowned, he would consent to retire only when the waters had almost reached the legs of the pianoforte, and his own! We laughed at the Prince's anecdote; but none appeared to enjoy it more than the narrator of it.

The interview, which had lasted an hour, terminated by His Royal Highness asking me if I had heard the Queen's private band. On my replying in the negative, I was asked if I would like to hear a performance. Captain Seymour was requested to accompany me to the Music Room, where, under Mr Anderson's direction, the Band were then practising. The Prince gracefully bowed when I retired from his presence. I met in the Music Room many gentlemen of the orchestra with whom I was acquainted, and listened with much pleasure to the performance of two or three pieces, admirably executed.

I recall with pleasurable sensations the agreeable hour I had the honour to pass in the company of the amiable and accomplished Prince Consort in 1841; but, mingled with my reflections, as in the majority of our pleasant remembrances, there is a dash of sadness and regret.

Onwards we carelessly wend in the calm of the summer eve sunset;
Up wells the cool blue tide, down sinks the hot red sun;
Narrower, narrower grow the grey sands, and we over the boulders,
Flit in a dream of life flashed from the argent sea.

II.

Now the gloom of the towering rockiness bars our passage;
Rest we unmindful, content, making a couch of the stones.
On her pale colour I gaze at the lines of the ripples reflected,
Wavery silver lines: clasped in a close embrace.

III.

Far off a cluster of long narrow clouds linger o'er the horizon,
Looking like corpses of clouds, mournfully linger, then fade.
Over the firmament other and sinister shadows are gathering;
Up wells the cold black tide, gleaming with devilish light.

IV.

Noisy the waters are splashing, and noisy the caverns are echoing;
Through the loud noise my ears swoon in the sound of her sighs:
Dark is the precipice, dark is the sky and the air and the ocean;
Through the thick darkness my eyes live in the light of her look.

V.

Cool is the rising tide, as it flows away restlessly over us,
Scarcely we notice its waves, rapt in each other's being.
Phosphorescent wavelets lighten her delicate loveliness;
Less do we feel them and less, lost in a vision of love.

ADELINA PATTI'S MARGHERITA.

Last night a densely crowded audience was attracted to Covent Garden by the announcement that Madame Adelina Patti would appear as Margherita in Gounod's Faust. Several years have passed since she last played this part, in which—with Mario as Faust—she made one of the greatest among her many successes. Since then she has become a superb actress; her voice has gained a large increase of power; and her impersonation of Margherita last night was so remarkable a display of histrionic genius, combined with unequalled vocal ability, that her resumption of the character will be one of the chief attractions of next season. An analysis of her performance would occupy more space than we can spare, but her execution of the "Jewel Song" deserves special mention. The long shake at the commencement, the ascending scale passage which follows, and the concluding shake on B and C sharp in alt. were specimens of faultless vocalisation. Here, as indeed throughout the opera, the genius of the actress enhanced the triumphs of the singer. Mad. Patti was enthusiastically applauded, and bouquet-throwing was indulged in to a preposterous extent.—Globe, July 20.

ALBANI'S OPHELIA.

Of the several representatives of Ophelia, no one has surpassed Mdle Albani in grace and charm of manner and vocal excellence. This artist added the character to her répertoire in 1873, when special success attended her performance, the merits of which have become even greater with the development of dramatic power that has been evident during last year and this. Again, on Wednesday, the gentle tenderness of Ophelia's share in the love scenes with Hamlet, the dreamy abstraction with which the music of the garden scene was rendered, the expression of grief and despair at Hamlet's rejection of her, in the trio with that character and the Queen; and, above all, the touching pathos of Ophelia's blighted hopes, and the expression of a love only extinguishable by death, were admirably realised.—Daily News, July 20.

ETHELKA GERSTER'S ELVIRA.

Considering the advanced period of the season the audience attracted by I Puritani was exceptionally numerous and brilliant. This cannot be ascribed to the opera itself, inasmuch as Bellini's last and most ambitious work, studded though it be with melodic gems, and associated with traditions of the greatest quartet that ever graced an Italian stage, has long since lost the favour of the public. Mr Mapleson's house was filled simply because Mdle Ethelka Gerster appeared for the first time in England as Elvira, and because a naturally strong desire was felt to witness her representation of another of the characters everywhere accepted as tests of light soprano greatness. With regard to the manner in which the new prima donna would sing Elvira's music, no doubt whatever could have been entertained. Her previous doings sufficed to establish her as a vocalist of the highest order—not a perfect vocalist, because liable, at times, to unaccountable fallings off, but still among the highest because far more often accomplishing feats impossible to talent of a lower kind. It was certain, therefore, that Bellini's strains, florid and sentimental, would have a notable rendering; and those who had formed sanguine anticipations with regard to the result were amply justified. We were more convinced than ever as to the high character of Mdle Gerster's singing. She not only made an exceptionally brilliant display, but satisfied critical judgment by intelligent and truthful expression, combined with a more obviously sympathetic quality of voice. In these important respects Mdle Gerster's latest effort was a distinct advance, and as such the audience applauded it, encoring the well known polacca, "Son vergin vezzosa," and marking their appreciation of "Qui la voce" by two genuine recalls. Elvira affording no higher test of dramatic power than Amina or Lucia—being perhaps, more unreal, and, therefore, more conventional than either—it is impossible yet to say in what measure Mdle Gerster is an actress. But, while leaving this for determination by her forthcoming embodiment of Gilda, we might point out numerous evidences, supplied by Elvira, that she brings to this branch of her art a rare intelligence and a thoughtfulness taking even small matters into account. It was satisfactory to note how she strove to be natural first of all, and gave but little heed to ad captandum effects. Thus, when Elvira first learned the flight of Arturo, instead of a demonstrative exhibition of feeling meant for the eye of the spectator, we saw a woman dazed by a sudden blow, confusedly retiring up the stage to look, vacantly, in the direction the fugitive had taken, and showing, by a frequent aimless lifting of the hand to the head, what sort of mischief had been done. In her Lucia, like touches of faithfulness to nature appeared, and the example just cited was only one of many tending to strengthen a conviction that in Mdle Gerster we have an artist who can act as well as sing, and, therefore, makes a double claim upon public regard. Her success as Elvira was all that she herself could have desired—a success which, like her embodiment of the character, may be described as real, and in no respect conventional.—Daily Telegraph, July 19.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR MR EDITOR,—With blushing shame and deep mortification, I confess that my Florentine name-sake has turned my quotation from The Critic (which I thought so very à propos) triumphantly against me. On reference (for the first time, I am ashamed to own) to the 139th Psalm, I find David exclaiming, if he soars to Heaven he there finds the Deity, and if he descends to the other place, do. ! Now as our line (I mean my Florentine name-sake's and my own) runs so, of course the above localities are both included; thus the idea must be credited to David, and I had acted wisely to let my Florentine name-sake alone, and not thrust my hand among nettles if I did not wish to be stung.

"THY GOD IS EVERYWHERE!"

Habet et musca splenem, et formica sua bilis inest.

Nevertheless, Mr Editor, entre nous, all things considered, I think I have the best of it; for, if the idea emanated with King David, I was, at all events, the second to make use of it, while my Florentine name-sake only comes in third.

I thank him, however, for putting our verses like

Hobson and Dobson,

Check by jowl, for obvious reasons, and above all for making me look into my Bible. Yours for ever,

JOHN BARNETT.

Andante from the First Symphony	Mozart.
Organ Sonata, No. 1, F minor	Mendelssohn.
Allegretto, C major	Alex. Guilmant.
Minuetto, G sharp minor, Op. 44	Dussek.
Marche aux Flambeaux, C minor	Meyerbeer.

SATURDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 8th:—

Marche Hongroise	H. A. Wollenhaupt.
Air, "For ever blessed"	Handel.
Prelude and Fugue, E flat major	Back.
Variations on an original air	S. S. Wesley.
Adagio from the Sonata Patetica	Beethoven.
Fantasia, "Hommage à Handel"	Moscheles.

CARLSRUHE.—Herr Dessoff has returned to this town after a few days' visit to Vienna. During his stay in the Austrian capital the negotiations were renewed for his return to the Imperial Operahouse, as first Capellmeister, with the same rights and privileges as Herr Hans Richter, and it is not unlikely that they may be brought to a satisfactory termination, provided Herr Dessoff can obtain his release from the obligations into which he has entered here.

HAMBURG.—Herr Hentschell, conductor at the Stadttheater, Bremen, and composer of Die Schöne Melusine, lately played some scenes from Lancelot, a new opera of his, to a select company of artists, literary men, and lovers of art, among whom were Herr Pollini, manager of the Stadttheater, Herr Seidel, the Capellmeister there, and various members of the press. The scenes, though executed only on a piano, which could not give them due effect, produced a most favourable impression. The work will be brought out next month in Bremen. It is also accepted at the Stadttheater here.

ARABELLA GODDARD'S RETURN TO ENGLAND.

For many seasons London has not known so genuine and legitimate a sensation as that produced by the re-appearance in public of Mme Arabella Goddard after an absence from England of four years. In these days, when the vaunted claims of herculean pianists form the attraction of each musical season—when no solo instrument is in such high repute as the pianoforte, and no executive musician more highly eulogised than the pianist—the absence of Mme Arabella Goddard from England would have been a positive calamity, for she alone can take up the gage so defiantly flung down by foreign artists. We have therefore the greater cause to be grateful to the talented lady who, from pure love of art, comes forward at a time when she had almost formed the resolution of abandoning her public career—at least so far as England was concerned—to bid us be of good cheer, for the "tight little island" still can proudly claim for her own the greatest and most perfect of modern pianists. Mme Arabella Goddard was, it will be remembered, a juvenile prodigy. At the age when most children are engaged in musical researches of a primitive nature through the medium of a drum, rattle, whistle, or any other thing of terror which will produce a noise, Arabella Goddard was pondering over the pages of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Moscheles, Hummel, Mozart, &c.; and at that period of maturity when the generality of the rising population commence their infantile struggles with the alphabet, Arabella Goddard was playing in public—and before crowned heads, too. Precocious talent is too apt, however, to degenerate; and early promise of as decided a nature, too frequently foretells a stage of exhaustion as soon as the juvenile grows to be an adult. As exceptions prove the rule, so does the case of Arabella Goddard tend to show that genius may assert itself in childhood without necessarily proving ephemeral; wonderful as an infant phenomenon, the English pianist is no less so in the period of her ripe womanhood, and art may well acknowledge her pre-eminence in that branch to the consideration of which she has devoted her entire life.

There are more qualifications demanded of a pianist than that of mere mechanical facility, brilliancy of touch, or retentiveness of memory. We have of late had many notable examples before us, showing that the qualities we have enumerated no more make a perfect pianist than one swallow does a summer. It is needless to enter into comparisons, however, nor is there any necessity for being personal. Mme Arabella Goddard is a player, sans peur et sans reproche. As far as mechanism is concerned, no machine could be more accurate, more unerring; while in that higher province of the pianist's art—the absolute revelation of the composer's ideas—Mme Arabella Goddard's genius is strikingly exhibited. No executive musician can hope to give clear and precise expression to the thoughts of the composer without, at the offset, being willing to merge his own individuality into that of the author he interprets. The written page is simply a list of indications of what the performer is to do; any departure from these instructions shows that the player has no respect for the writer, and possesses vanity sufficient to excuse—in his own eyes—the introduction of any specious innovation or improvement his wayward fancy may suggest. But with Mme Arabella Goddard this is not so; she adheres firmly and honourably to the text, disdains the meretricious employment of devices calculated to arouse public wonderment at the pianist's facility at the sacrifice of musical decorum, and rests content—which, after all, must be the higher satisfaction—with the knowledge that, to the best of her abilities, she has rendered the author's works in the manner he intended. We have heard certain sonatas of Beethoven played in such a manner by pianists who led the town as St Dunstan did the Evil One—by the nose—that they were hardly recognisable, and in many quarters this has been accepted as evidence of the individual originality of the pianist. Fancy imitating in marble the Venus de Milo, and indulging in "originality" at the expense of the outline; fancy copying Turner and paying no attention to his combination of colours! There would be a speedy outcry against such practices, though neither would be a greater act of vandalism than the attempt to distort Beethoven in outline or to load him with superfluous "colour." It is a gratification for us to know that in Mme Arabella Goddard we have a pianist whose love of art renders her superior to mere petty personal considerations; it is valuable to know where we may hear a pure and undefiled rendering of a classical work, given with all necessary warmth of tone and breadth of effect, while violating no single precept which teaches respect for the intentions of those who have "gone before;" and it is reassuring to know that the pianist at whose hands alone we can obtain these results is, in other provinces of art, as brilliant and inspiring as the strongest of pianoforte-tormentors who ever tampered with the classic masters.

But the loudest of Mme Arabella Goddard's praises must remain by us unsung; they are echoed in every true English heart, and proclaimed throughout the two hemispheres. That our leading pianist will be persuaded to give Londoners further opportunities of hearing her before the word "farewell" be spoken, is the unanimous wish.

..... Into the details of the performance it is not incumbent upon us to enter. Suffice it that the Queen-Pianist obtained a right royal welcome, and that her manifold efforts were greeted with the most signal marks of favour by the immense audience assembled.—Sunday Times, Oct, 15, 1876.

The report that Sig. Bottesini is engaged at Havannah appears to be incorrect.

Mdme Edith Wynne is to be the vocalist at the Brighton Aquarium Concert to-day.

Sig. Boito will visit Ancona to superintend the production there of his Mefistofele.

Ilma di Murska has married once again. Her present husband is a Professor Hiller.

Henri Vieuxtemps has resigned his professorship at the Royal Conservatory, Brussels.

Le Roi de Lahore is to be performed next winter at Turin, Rome, and perhaps Naples.

Sig. Muzio has returned to Paris after a visit of some weeks to Sig. Verdi at Busseto.

Herr Lauterbach has sufficiently recovered from his accident to be able to leave his bed.

Mdlle Smeroschi is announced to sing in Fra Diavolo at the Teatro Malibran, Venice.

After leaving Weimar, the Abbate Franz Liszt stopped a few days with the Grand-Duke at Wilhelmsthal.

A Conservatory of Music will, in consequence of a vote of the Corporation, be shortly established at Rouen.

A man fooled into buying a pinchbeck watch called it Faith, because it was without works, and, therefore, dead.

The Casino-Cadet, Paris, is being transformed into a theatre. It will be opened in October with a four-act buffo opera.

M. Melchissédec is engaged to sing the principal part in M. Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, at the San Carlo, Naples.

Les Charbonniers, first produced at the Variétés, Paris, will shortly be performed at Vienna, Hamburg, and Berlin.

Señor Pablo Sarasate is staying at Bonn, on a visit to Herr Max Bruch, who is writing a violin concerto especially for him.

Mr Wilford Morgan is engaged to sing every evening next week, at Mdme Liebhart's Concerts, at the Agricultural Hall.

An extraordinary concert, devoted entirely to the works of the Abbate Franz Liszt, will shortly be given at the Leipsic Gewandhaus.

In our notice of Mdme Liebhart's concerts, Mr Pollitzer should have been named as leader of the orchestra at the Agricultural Hall.

The Rhenish Singers' Festival will be celebrated in Cologne on the 7th October. Mad. Ethelka Gerster and Dr Krückel will take part in it.

A Quartet Society has been established at Ancona for the performance more especially of works by Beethoven, Schumann, and Mendelssohn.

Mdlle Eugénie Bénard, the juvenile pianist, gained the first prize and scholarship at the Royal Musical Training school. There were 500 competitors.

Signori Pedrotti, Mazzucato, and Bazzini have been appointed to examine the candidates for professorships in the Liceo Benedetto Marcello, Venice.

It is said that M. Maurice Strakosch intends giving a series of Patti Concerts in Italy. These concerts are already announced at Milan and Venice.

The Kellogg-Cary Opera Company were to open in San Francisco on the 10th inst. They are announced to appear at Boston (U.S.) on the 12th December.

Herr Theodor Wachtel commenced, on the 30th August, a starring engagement at Prague. In about a fortnight, he will sing at the Stadttheater, Leipsic.

La Teiganne, a buffo opera by Johann Strauss, words by MM. Delacour and Victor Wilder, has been put in rehearsal at the Théâtre de la Renaissance, Paris.

On the occasion of his silver wedding, Professor Julius Sachs, of Frankfort-on-the-Maine, received the Cross of the Ernest House Order from the Duke of Coburg-Gotha.

It is not Mdle Sangalli, as erroneously announced, but Mdle Lina, a Viennese "star," who will sustain the principal part in Léo Délibes' Sylvia, at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna.

Mr Langdon Colborne, Mus. Bac., Cantab., late organist of St Michael's College, Tenbury, has been appointed by the Dean and Chapter of Hereford to the vacancy created by the death of Mr George Townshend Smith.

An interesting concert of Old English Ballad Music (with synopsis selected from Mr Wm. Chappell's Music of the Olden Time) is announced for Sept. 12th, for the benefit of Mr Edgar Mowbray, one of the proprietors of the Mohawk Minstrels, at the Agricultural Hall.

CRYSTAL PALACE OPERAS.—Mendelssohn's Son and Stranger was performed on the 4th inst. by Miss Carina Clelland, Miss Palmer, Messrs. Bernard Lane, F. Cook, and Henry Corri. The conductor of the series is Mr Solla. The opera was well mounted, and the principals efficient.

The sum already subscribed for a monument to Félicien David amounts to 20,700 francs. The monument was to have been inaugurated on the 29th August, the first anniversary of the composer's death. But the sculptor, M. Millet, was not ready, so the ceremony has been adjourned to some future day.

Miss Alice May is engaged to open the new Opera House, at Leicester, on Monday next. The work selected for the opening night is Faust. Miss May's impersonation of Marguerite was highly extolled by the "Antipodeans," consequently her début in that character in England will be watched with interest.

At the second concert given by Mme Liebhart at the Agricultural Hall, a very large audience was present. Mme Edith Wynne appeared on the occasion, and sang with excellent effect; the orchestra played selections from Rossini, Wagner, &c.; and Miss Lillie Albrecht played Ketterer's octave "Galop de Concert" with refinement of style and brilliancy of execution.

Les Surprises de l'amour, music by M. F. Poise, words by M. C. Monselet, is in rehearsal at the Paris Opéra-Comique. There are only four parts in it, and no chorus. The artists will be Mesdcs. Galli-Marie, Irma Marié, MM. Engel and Dauphin. The subject is taken from a comedy by Merivaux, and has nothing in common with that of the opera by Rameau, which bears the same title.

Miss Blanche Lucas sang at the "Ballad Night," given by the Messrs Gatti at their Promenade concerts on Friday, August 31st, Mr Hatton's "Bird sang in a hawthorn tree," and "The last rose of summer," so much to the satisfaction of the audience, that she was "recalled" after Mr Hatton's ballad and called upon to repeat "The last rose of summer," but substituted "Comin' through the rye."

A fire, which caused a terrible loss of life, occurred on Monday in New York. It began at 9.45 a.m. in Hales' pianoforte factory, Thirty-fifth Street, near Eleventh Avenue, a large five-story building, in which 200 persons were employed. In a few minutes the flames enveloped the entire building, and many of the occupants jumped from the upper windows to escape. From twenty to thirty were injured, and the loss of life was heavy.

Mr Brinley Richards is now on a tour in South Wales. On Wednesday, August 30, he gave a lecture with musical "Illustrations" at Newport, Monmouthshire. There was a large audience. Misses Mary Davies, Lizzie Evans, and Mr Gwilym were the vocalists, assisted by an efficient choir. Mr Richards contributed a solo on the pianoforte, introducing "The Men of Harlech," which was immensely applauded. The concert concluded with the National Anthem.

Mr Weist Hill and his orchestra have resigned their engagement at the Alexandra Palace. The last concert took place on Saturday, September 1st, when the gentlemen of the orchestra presented Mr Weist Hill with a very handsome silver cup, bearing the following inscription:—"Presented to Henry Weist Hill, Esq., by the members of the Alexandra Palace Orchestral Band, in recognition of his great ability as their conductor, and as a mark of their esteem and regard."

"Is this the place," she asked, as she wandered down on the barren sands, "where a young lady—a beautiful young lady—fell into the water last season, and was rescued by a gallant young man, whom she afterwards married?" He looked at her carefully, estimated her at a square forty-seven, with false teeth, and said: "Yes, ma'am. But I don't know how to swim." He could stand fat, fair, and forty, but this case was altogether too loud, so he let down the pegs that made that music.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 672 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From the "Times.")

Gloucester, Sept. 7.

The leading vocalists in the Passion of St Matthew on Wednesday were fully prepared, and sang the trying solos as if they had been Germans and to the manner born. The Grosse Passions-Musik was evidently familiar to them. The soprano was Mdle Sophie Löwe, the contralto Madame Patey, the tenor Mr Edward Lloyd, the bass Mr Santley. A more efficient vocal quartet it would be hard to find. Then, too, in the subordinate parts, Miss Bertha Griffiths, a young contralto of decided promise, and Mr. Maybrick, the baritone bass, who, with excellent discrimination, looks up to Mr. Santley as his model, did real service. Thus the execution of so much as was vouchsafed to us of Bach's sacred masterpiece was more or less complete in each particular department. Into minute particulars it is needless to enter, but it may without hesitation be added in conclusion that this performance will be pointed to with marked distinction in future records of the Three Choir Festivals. The principal singers in Beethoven's Mount of Olives, which, after the interval of an hour, followed the Passion of St Matthew, were Mdle Albani (who seems to be as much at home in Beethoven's as in Handel and Mendelssohn's music), Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Maybrick. The performance was generally effective; but this early effort in the sacred style of the Giant of the Orchestra, despite its many and unquestionable beauties, appeared somewhat dramatic, occasionally even operatic, after that which had preceded it. At night the first part of Mendelssohn's St Paul and the second part of Haydn's Creation were given in the Cathedral. But of the evening performances generally it will be more convenient to speak in an article apart.

Yesterday's programme, one of unusual variety and interest, opened with Mr. Arthur Sullivan's overture, In Memoriam—if "overture" that may be termed which is purely elegiac. The merits of this beautiful composition, which, originally written for the Norwich Festival, has on more than one occasion been heard at the Crystal Palace and elsewhere, are widely known and appreciated. It is a genuine poem in music, and its essentially religious character, enhanced by the happy use of the organ in the peroration, being strictly in keeping with the theme to which it is dedicated—the remembrance of a beloved parent—justly entitled it to the place it occupied in the selection of this morning. Every pains was taken by the conductor and his fine orchestra to ensure an efficient performance, and the result would have satisfied the author himself.

Next to In Memoriam came a "Kyrie Eleison" for solo voices and chorus, with orchestral accompaniments—part of a mass by Mr B. Luard-Selby, a musician of considerable promise. The entire movement is tuneful, smoothly written for voices and instruments, and everywhere marked by appropriate devotional feeling. The quartet of leading singers—Miss (not Mrs) Adela Vernon, Miss Griffiths, Mdme Patey, and Mr Cummings—were all that could be wished; and the "Kyrie" left a generally favourable impression. It was followed by a colossus, in the shape of Johannes Brahms' "German Requiem," which immediately absorbed attention, and kept it undisturbed until the very last chord. This magnificent piece was composed to a German text, instead of to the familiar Latin, there being, as Professor Macfarren reminds us in his exhaustive and interesting analysis, certain tenets in the Roman Mass for the Dead at "variance with the principles of the Reformed Church." "Hence," he adds, "the 'German Requiem' is not a Missa pro defunctis, but an exhortation to the living," like our English Burial Service. We at present only know it through an English version. As Mr Arthur Sullivan's "Overture," which began yesterday's performance, was composed as a tribute to the memory of his father, so is the "German Requiem" a tribute to the memory of a no less beloved mother. It would be hard indeed to conceive one more earnestly felt or more eloquently expressed; and Herr Brahms has not only reason to be proud of his Requiem because it is a truly noble example of art workmanship, but because of its admirable fitness for the object that suggested it. To its general merits testimony has already been given, and a word about the performance is all that will be looked for. The singers in the "German Requiem" had almost as difficult a task—here and there quite as difficult—as some of the most trying passages in the Passion of St Matthew; and the fact that they came out from the ordeal with equal success is no little to their credit. The chorus and orchestra are taxed to the utmost by Brahms' independent writing, which not unfrequently recalls the still more uncompromising Beethoven in his grand Missa Solennis—to say nothing of J. S. Bach, who, judging by his music for the Church (motets included), was even less prone to study the convenience of voices. Nevertheless, several numbers in which shortcomings might have been looked for, and even readily excused, were among those rendered with the greatest fluency and precision. As a striking instance may be named the extraordinarily wrought-out fugue, set to the text, "But the righteous souls are in the hand of God, nor pain nor grief shall come them nigh"—a bold and original feature of which is the tonic pedal bass kept on incessantly from the opening bar to the end; and, again, the powerfully solemn illustration of the words, "When the last awful trumpet soundeth," the climax to which, "Grave, where is thy triumph! Death, oh! where is thy sting?" can never fail to be impressive, if the singers enter into the spirit of the music, as they certainly did on the present occasion. The solo passages were intrusted to Mdle Sophie Löwe and Mr Santley, who, it need scarcely be added, made them as effective as they could well be made. A few defects allowed for, indeed the admirers of Brahms must, unless terribly exacting, have been more than gratified by this performance of what may be regarded not simply as his most ambitious, but as his most entirely successful achievement.

The Requiem of Brahms was succeeded, and worthily succeeded, by one of the most familiar, scholarly, and melodious anthems of the late Dr. Samuel Sebastian Wesley, the production of which on this occasion was another appropriate tribute to the great organist and composer whom Gloucester held in such high and deserved esteem. Every amateur of pure and solid English Church music knows, or ought to know, the anthems of Samuel Wesley. A better choice could not possibly have been made, and it is agreeable to add that for the greater part a better or more carefully-balanced performance could not have been desired. More or less fatigued as the chorus singers naturally were by their spirited and arduous endeavours to do what was expected from them in the Requiem of Brahms, they nevertheless brought to the anthem of their gifted countryman an energy and vigour that seemed indomitable. The opening quartet and chorus must have persuaded every attentive listener how zealously all were intent upon the work before them, and how much, in honour of the regretted musician, it was to them a labour of love. From beginning to end there was scarcely a weak or faltering passage to be noted. That after so imposing and elaborate an effort as that of Brahms, the simpler but in no way less earnest work of the English organist should have come out so brightly, is an incontestable sign of its genuine quality. The solos were assigned to Miss Adela Vernon, Madame Patey, Messrs Cummings and Santley, Mr Done, of Worcester Cathedral, (who on this occasion undertakes the duties which were to have devolved upon the late Mr. Townshend Smith), being at the organ. About the glorious Lobgesang of Mendelssohn, which brought this long but never uninteresting programme to a conclusion, it must suffice to state that the orchestral movements were played with remarkable spirit, and that the choral parts offered but few occasions for criticism. The solos were allotted to Mdle Sophie Löwe, Miss Vernon, and Mr Edward Lloyd. The duet, with chorus, "I waited for the Lord," and the air, "The sorrows of death," with its impressive sequel, "Watchman, will the night soon pass?" by Mr Lloyd, were among the most noticeable points. To the sublime chorale, "Let all men praise the Lord," the entire congregation rose.

The Messiah to-day, with Mozart's additional accompaniments—of all "additional accompaniments" the most to be commended, or at any rate the least to be discountenanced—was, as it has ever been, the crowning achievement of the Festival. No fewer than 2,468 people were present. That the chorus, the orchestra, the soloists, and the new conductor, Mr Harford Lloyd, knew every note of it by heart may readily be understood. One of the causes of the almost invariably good performance of the great "Sacred Oratorio" lies in the fact that the voice parts, both for chorus and leading singers, are so uniformly well written. In this respect Handel stands side by side with Mozart, his illustrious successor, and possesses an incalculable advantage over his contemporary and now acknowledged rival, Bach. Examine the solo airs, for soprano, contralto, tenor, or bass, and not a single one can be pointed to that lies otherwise than easily and gracefully for the voice. The musical hero of the present time, Johannes Brahms, might derive a suggestive lesson from this. To-day, in accordance with ordinary custom, the solo recitatives and airs were distributed more or less equally among the leading artists. To Mdle Albani, now a practised Handelian singer, and intelligent as she is practised, was assigned the lion's share of the soprano music, from the recitative, "There were shepherds," and "Rejoice greatly," in the first part, to the most truly devotional of songs, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," in the second; Mdle Sophie Löwe, also an experienced adept in oratorio, undertaking "How beautiful are the feet," and the air, "If God be with us," the last of which is not unfrequently omitted, on account of its being placed immediately before the final chorus. The tenor music was divided between Messrs W. H. Cummings and Mr Edward Lloyd, the former's share being limited to the opening recitative and air, "Comfort ye, my people," with its sequel, "Every valley," which comes directly after the Overture—an introduction, by the way, like other orchestral preludes of Handel, having little in common with the spirit of what is to follow. Mr Lloyd gave the Passion music, from "Thy rebuke" to "But Thou didst not leave His soul in hell" (Part I.), and the furious denunciation, "Thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel" (Part II.). How competent are both these gentlemen to their respective tasks, the lovers of Handel are aware. Mdme Patey was charged, appropriately enough, with the most important airs assigned to the contralto: "O thou that tellest glad tidings," the pathetic "He was despised," and the touchingly simple "He shall feed His flock" (the pendant to which, "Come unto Him," was allotted to Mdle Albani). Nevertheless, Miss Bertha Griffiths, who created so favourable an impression on the opening day, by her delivery of "Woe unto them," in Elijah, joined Mdle Löwe, Messrs E. Lloyd and Santley, in the two quartets, "Since by man came death" and "For as in Adam all die," and Mr Lloyd in the duet, "O! death, where is thy sting?" The bass music of Part I.—comprising "But who may abide" (so often given to a contralto), and "The people that walked in darkness," were confided to Mr Maybrick, Mr Santley taking "Why do the nations so furiously rage together?" and "The trumpet shall sound" (accompanied by Mr T. Harper), in the sequel. As usual, at certain choruses, such as "Hallelujah" and "Worthy is the Lamb, Amen," the entire audience rose to their feet, as if by electric sympathy; and it is not overmuch to believe that the great majority would gladly have joined their voices to those of the chorus in the oft-reiterated "Hallelujah," and in the final chorus of the multitudinous "Amen," which brings the oratorio to so grand a climax. Thus, once again, the sublime strains of the Messiah have been reverentially listened to within the sacred walls of a cathedral, where a fitting performance is regarded by very many earnest people in no other light than that of a solemn act of worship. And, after all, in this unequalled work, the music so devoutly reflects the text that such a conclusion, in the minds of those who think music never so well employed as when thus employed by Handel, is not altogether unworthy consideration. Moreover, it should be remembered that the Messiah is not a musical drama built upon some Scriptural theme, like Samson, Judas, Solomon, &c., but a sacred oratorio in the purest significance of the term. The oratorio commenced at half-past 11 and terminated at 4 p.m.

(By TELEGRAPH).

Night.

The special free service to-night proved an unqualified success, the Cathedral being crammed to the doors. It was difficult to find even standing room. The musical part of the service began with Dr S. S. Wesley's arrangement of the "Old Hundredth." The psalm of the day was sung to a chant by Dr Goas (in E), the "Gloria" being strengthened by the orchestra. The Canticles, Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, were by Mr. H. Gadsby. The anthem was Purcell's "O sing unto the Lord." The prominent solos were undertaken by Messrs Cummings and Santley. In the hymn during the offertory, sung by full chorus with orchestral accompaniments, a majority of the congregation heartily joined. Then came Handel's "Hallelujah" from the Messiah. The Blessing was pronounced by the Bishop of the diocese, and as voluntary the March of the Priests, from Mendelssohn's Athalie, was performed by the orchestra. Mr S. G. Hayward presided at the organ, M. Sinton being principal violin, and Mr C. Harford Lloyd conductor. The congregation was not less attentive and evidently impressed than it was numerous.

Monday, Sept. 10.

A summary of the evening performances at the Shire Hall and Cathedral included in the programme of what has been in certain respects the most successful Three Choir meeting ever held in Gloucester may be briefly presented. The selection from Schumann's Paradise and the Peri at the first concert failed to excite any remarkable degree of interest; nor was the execution of this by no means easy music up to the general average of excellence achieved in other instances. The C minor symphony of Beethoven, however, and Wagner's Tannhäuser overture were both played with spirit by the orchestra, and a concert overture in E flat by Mr Montague Smith, a young composer, who already shows that he has studied his art to excellent purpose, was heard with satisfaction and received with applause, not only because it was a novelty, but on account of its own unquestionable merit. Mr Smith's first overture, in fact (if his first it be), is good enough to encourage a well-founded hope that his second will be still better. The remainder of the programme—excepting M. Sinton's admirable performance of Mendelssohn's concerto, to which reference has already been made—consisted almost exclusively of familiar vocal pieces, requiring no special comment. The evening of Wednesday was devoted to a performance of oratorio music in the Cathedral, as substitute for the customary miscellaneous concert in the Shire Hall, going far to prove how steadily the conviction of those who desire to perpetuate the Festivals takes root, that sacred rather than secular compositions should form the staple object of attraction. This, it will be admitted, tends more and more to conciliate opponents and disarm objection. Some have complained that, instead of the entire St Paul and the entire Creation, only the first part of each was given; yet, bearing in mind the fact that Elijah and the Hymn of Praise were both included in the programme of the week, even the most enthusiastic admirers of Mendelssohn must have felt satisfied. Moreover, an occasion thus permitted of listening to the bright and cheerful strains of Haydn was difficult to ignore; and, as according to the general scheme, this could not otherwise have been obtained, Mr Harford Lloyd is provided with a reasonable excuse. The first part in its integrity, from any great work, is surely preferable to "selections," no matter with what excellent judgment contrived. Bach's Passion (St Matthew) was shortened of its colossal proportions in order that Beethoven's only oratorio might follow, while Schumann's Paradise and the Peri was curtailed of seven numbers for the sake of a miscellaneous series of pieces, vocal and instrumental, in which some leading artists might be heard. On the other hand, the oratorios of Mendelssohn and Haydn, although only one division of each was vouchsafed, came to us, at all events, according to the fashion in which their respective authors had imagined them. Herr Niels Gade's cantata, The Crusaders, received with such favour at the last Birmingham Festival, when given under the direction of its composer, was the feature of the second and last miscellaneous concert in the Shire

Hall. This cantata, into the character and merits of which it is unnecessary again to enter, hardly came up to expectation; nor was the performance commensurate with the just claims of the music, a certain want of preparation, not to be remarked in other far more trying works included in the week's programme, being evident throughout. That the leading singers, M^{me} Sophie Löwe, Messrs E. Lloyd and Santley, one and all, were competent to their tasks need hardly be said; the general effect, however, was spiritless, and the impression created anything but vivid. The Crusaders is by no means difficult, but its adequate execution demands a nicety of gradation and detail, the absence of which is the more to be regretted, inasmuch as (like Schumann's Paradise and the Peri) it was new to the Gloucester public. The second part commenced with an overture in B flat, by Mr C. V. Stanford, of Trinity College, Cambridge, a musician of recognised ability. Spirited, symmetrically constructed, and scored for the orchestra with excellent effect, this new overture was well given under the direction of its composer, and liberally applauded. Another feature worth mentioning was Weber's Concertstück for pianoforte, with orchestral accompaniments, played by Miss Agnes Zimmermann with the neatness and brilliancy for which that highly talented lady is noted. Mr W. H. Cummings introduced an air by Handel, "La bella Pastorella," of which the autograph manuscript was at one time possessed by Dragonetti, the renowned contrabassist. The air is pleasing, and would have been welcome as a curiosity, even had it been less well sung than by its present owner. The rest of the programme consisted chiefly of familiar vocal pieces, operatic and otherwise, sung by M^{lle} Albani, M^{me} Patey, Miss Griffiths, Messrs Santley and Maybrick. The notice of the German Requiem credits Mr Edward Lloyd with a share in a performance to which he did not contribute. As every one acquainted with the great work of Herr Brahms is aware, the solo passages are written for soprano and baritone; and these, as stated further down in the notice, "were entrusted to M^{me} Sophie Löwe and Mr Santley." The praise inadvertently awarded to Mr Lloyd was due, as the context shows, to the singers in the Requiem generally. Dr Wesley's anthem, given on the same occasion, was "The Wilderness" (to the text of Isaiah), regarded by many competent judges as his finest effort of the kind.

The early cathedral services every morning during the week—which naturally stand high among the "quiet and salutary changes" admitted by Bishop Ellicott "in the arrangement and conduct of the Festivals"—were for the most part well attended. In the choice of music due regard was paid to the late Dr Wesley, whose service in F, and anthem, "Blessed be the God and Father," have both been included. Thus respect was shown where respect was manifestly due. About the general success of the Festival there cannot be the slightest doubt. The prevalent fine weather was greatly in its favour, as were also the excellence and variety of the programme—in the selection of which Mr Harford Lloyd, for reasons easy enough to appreciate, showed not only musical judgment, but extreme tact. There were other reasons, however. The Gloucester authorities had, in fact, clearly made up their minds that this 154th meeting of the Choirs should be a demonstration. Hereford took the same ground last year, but Gloucester has gone further than Hereford; and the earnest desire that Worcester should once again become one of the Festival brotherhood, in accordance, more or less, with the old traditional custom, was strongly, if indirectly, evidenced by the proceedings of the week. It is, indeed, more than likely that conciliation on both sides may lead to a renewed fellowship. Not to sacrifice space to figures, it may be stated briefly that the Gloucester Journal gives the sum total of donations for the charity received at the doors of the Cathedral as £882 2s. 11½d., to which, it says, "have to be added the stewards' contributions, which, if estimated at £5 each, would amount to £885. The grand total in that case realised for the benefit of the Charity would amount to no less than £1,767. To this it is just possible there may have to be added some surplus from the sale of tickets, unabsorbed by the expenses." Respecting the attendance, it will suffice to add that Elijah attracted a larger number (1,981) than on any previous first day, while the crowd that flocked to The Messiah (2,468), on the last, was without precedent in Gloucester.

* This is not likely, if it be true, as reported in some papers, that there is a deficit of £161 on the balance of receipts and expenditure.

John Hullah Speaks.

My representations made for the fifth time last year, respecting the occasional meeting of students of both sexes in colleges under the same direction for the performance of choral music, have been effectual in one instance. The experiment made by the British and Foreign School Society, of which I spoke last year, not having been attended with any results other than the improvement and gratification of those concerned in it, has been several times repeated, and the more advanced students of Stockwell and the Borough Road have, during this year, met several times for the performance in its complete form of music already studied in detail in their several institutions. The result, as manifested at the last "teacher's meeting" at Stockwell, which I had the pleasure to attend, proved most gratifying to the many friends of the society who were present, and was certainly most creditable in every way to all concerned in its production.

During the past year several of the colleges have been placed at a disadvantage in their musical examinations by a change of teacher or of method, in some instances of both. These changes will, I believe, eventually be productive of good, one of the recent consequences of them having been further additions to the number of musical instructors in training colleges from the ranks of musical professors of the highest class.

I return now to the subject of musical instruction in elementary schools.

In the course of the five years during which I have had the honour to fill my present office, I have examined individually nearly 9,000 students, the great majority of whom are now schoolmasters and mistresses. Of every student who, prior to 1872, left a training college in which he had remained two years it may be said that he left it possessed of some musical skill and science, in many instances, as I know, of very considerable. A very large number of acting teachers not educated in training colleges were, as I have also reason to know, fair musicians before they entered their profession, and a still larger number have become such since they have done so. It is, therefore, certain that the list of masters and mistresses in schools receiving grants from your Lordships must contain a very large number who could more or less efficiently "teach children to sing from notes." It is as certain too that this number increases annually.

As yet, however, it is equally certain that "singing from notes" is altogether an exceptional subject in elementary schools, and that the amount of musical accomplishment on which I have already been able to report to your Lordships year by year, has hardly yet been brought to bear on the elementary school. Every class of the community has directly or indirectly profited by the impulse given to musical instruction by my Lords in 1840-1, except that particular class which it was hoped and believed would profit most largely from it. Indeed, what has latterly been done for music in schools has rather impeded than furthered its improvement. The "songs" for the last few years required of scholars are not merely worthless as means of musical culture, but they take up time that might be given to the real study of the subject, and thus, so I have been repeatedly told by schoolmasters whom I know to be competent to teach, prevent their turning their knowledge to account in teaching their pupils—not half-a-dozen songs, but—music.

Music is the single subject in which our future school teachers are prepared, at a considerable expenditure of time and money, the results of the teaching of which are neither ascertained with any precision nor recorded.

In elementary schools, perhaps in all schools, teaching and examination act and re-act upon one another. As that which is not taught cannot be examined in, so that which it is known will not be examined in is not likely to be taught.

Musical examination in elementary schools would seem to be the natural sequence of musical examination in training schools. Of the value of musical instruction in both, your Lordships have repeatedly shown your recognition. To put within reach of the people innocent and cheap recreation is an object confessedly worthy of the attention of an enlightened government. Music, at the lowest estimation, is one among the most innocent of recreations, and of all recreations assuredly the cheapest to those who can make it for themselves.

The difficulties of musical examination in elementary schools are, no doubt, considerable. I forward to your Lordships' Secretary together with this report a scheme whereby I hope to have proved that those difficulties are not insuperable. I have the honour to be, &c.,

JOHN HULLAH.

To the Right Honourable
The Lords of the Committee of Council on Education,

A Festival Sermon.

(Preached in Gloucester Cathedral by BISHOP ELLICOTT.—Sept. 4.)

The weather on Tuesday morning presented an agreeable change to the boisterous November wind and drenching rain which prevailed throughout the previous day. The sun shone brilliantly, and flags suspended from the Corn Exchange, from the tower of St Nicholas church, and at other places, gave an appearance of animation to the streets. The bells of the Cathedral rang a merry peal, and large numbers of visitors hurried into the city from all directions. The spectacle of three Mayors, two Recorders, and three Corporations walking in procession through our streets is, we believe, unparalleled in the annals of the city. Shortly after nine o'clock the Blue Coat boys drew up outside the Tolsey, the rendezvous, and waited until the civic authorities of the three cities were ready to start for church. A move was made about ten o'clock, and with "funeral pace and slow" the Corporations walked to the Cathedral, Gloucester leading, then Worcester, and Hereford bringing up the rear. The showy scarlet gowns of the aldermen of Worcester and Hereford put their gownless councillors quite in the shade. Each of the civic bodies was preceded by an officer bearing a sword of state, and other officers with gold or silver maces. Mr Granville Somerset wore his full wig and silk robes as one of her Majesty's counsel learned in the law; Mr Francis Guise, recorder of Hereford, wore his wig and gown; and Mr Francis Jones, town clerk, was similarly attired. As soon as the Cathedral doors were opened the choir was crowded, and when the service commenced every seat except that of the Dean, and every inch of standing room, was occupied. Numbers crowded into the north transept, where they could hear little and see less; but when the sermon was commenced the gates of the ambulatory were opened, and people crowded therein anxious to hear the Bishop. Among the congregation were the Mayor of Bristol, Mr A. M. Skinner, Q.C., Dr Stainer, Mr Gambier Parry, Mr B. St John Ackers, Mr Charles Sumner, Mr Dearman Birchall, Mr Graham-Clarke, and many of the stewards. As the procession entered Mr S. G. Hayward played the National Anthem, and the congregation remained standing until the choristers and clergy had taken their places. It is difficult to understand why the service was not held in the nave. A slight temporary alteration of the seats would, we imagine, have rendered this feasible; and it would have prevented disappointment to great numbers who were desirous of being present, but were driven away, unable to obtain even standing room. The first part of the prayers was intoned by the Rev. Precentor Clark, and the remainder by the Rev. A. S. Loxley. The service was Croft in A, and the anthem was Sir F. Osseley's "O sing unto God." The singing was certainly not creditable to the united choirs. The anthem was indifferently sung, except the bass solo by one of the Worcester choir; and the responses (Tallis's) were hurried, and altogether wanting in impressiveness. Before the sermon the hymn, "The Church's one foundation," was sung to Dr Wesley's "Aurelia," a tune first heard publicly in Gloucester Cathedral about twenty years ago, but which has since become so popular that it is known and sung everywhere, even, as we happen to know, in Western Canada, whenever a few members of the English Church assemble for public worship. On Tuesday it was given with much heartiness by the whole of the great congregation; and, as the sun poured in through the south windows at the moment and lit up the whole of the building, the scene presented was one which will not soon be forgotten.

The Bishop gave as his text, "That, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations" (St Luke xvi., 9), and proceeded to deliver the following sermon:—

The grave fact, that the permanent interests of the Charity connected with this Triennial Festival must be considered to be in some degree endangered at the present time, is the reason why I am now here; and why, with others, I am anxious to do all that can be done to keep up in its full efficiency a Charity of long standing in our own and the two neighbouring counties.

With regard to the particular form of sustaining it, which, it is right to say, has come down to us in an unbroken sequence from a period as distant as a century and a half ago, and rests upon what we may almost call local traditions, little need be said. Most of you know my general views and opinions, and to these it is quite unnecessary for me to allude on the present occasion. This, however, I may properly and rightly say—First, that so great do I deem the good effected by this Charity, so serious and indeed seriously increasing are the needs which it is designed to supply, that I should feel myself acting with something more than unkindness to the silent and uncomplaining recipients of our Christian bounty if, at a critical period in the sequence of these Festivals, I failed to put private opinions somewhat in the background, and to appear in this place to press upon you to aid a cause which, as I will show to you in the sequel, even more than ever requires our earnest and benevolent support. Yes, the widows and orphans of our local clergy, those left behind, and bequeathed, as it were, to our sympathies by good and true servants of our common Lord, men who bravely bore the heat and burden of the day and are now resting in Paradise—these widows and orphans of many we may have familiarly known are now silently appealing to the charitable hearts of the worshippers in this ancient House of God during the present Festival. To stand apart now, now when their interests seems more than usually at stake, would be, for me at least, to fail in a vow made before God to be merciful for Christ's sake to the poor and the needy; and so I now stand before you, asking you—most earnestly asking you—to help the helpless, and to do all that can be done on this side the grave in alleviating not want only, but often, with that want, patiently borne and abiding sorrow. Secondly, not to look back to those strange days when races and balls formed a part of the week's arrangements, but simply to confine myself to the time during which I have been connected with this city and diocese, it is right that I should notice that many a quiet and salutary change has taken place in the arrangement and conduct of these Festivals. I should be much wanting in gratitude to the stewards and to the guardians of this noble Cathedral if I did not thus publicly recognise the distinct efforts on their parts to make all that enter these venerable and historic walls feel verily that they are entering into the presence of the Lord of Sabaoth, and that they come here to take part in soul and spirit in a great series of the noblest and most heart-moving forms of praise wherewith it has entered into the heart of man to adore and glorify his Maker. These efforts on the part of the Dean and Chapter and the stewards I most joyfully recognise, and I feel with thankfulness that they have removed from before me some privately-felt hindrances, and also some real stumbling-blocks.

But let us now turn to the suggestive words from Holy Scripture which I have chosen as the general introduction and guide to the one subject that alone deserves prominence in our present thoughts—not the Festival, but the touching and holy cause which it is the design of the Festival to support. Few words, perhaps, in Holy Scripture are better calculated to touch our best sensibilities, or to give to the whole subject that tinge of pensive mystery which, perhaps, on occasions like the present really more effectually and more profitably influences the soul than what is too often considered the oft-told tale of prosaic want, and homely, but believe me only too commonly, biting and saddening poverty. The words of the text are, no doubt, difficult of interpretation. Several who now hear me will know this well and will remember with me that the true reading of the passage is other than that which appears in our authorised version. Still it will not be incorrect to say that the general meaning, and that which now may be taken as the leading thought for our present meditations, does certainly seem to involve a reference to the blessed future which may be the permitted issue of a timely and benevolent use of those worldly means that God in His providence may have assigned to us. The uses to which earthly wealth may be put, aye mammon, wealth in its worst and most material aspects—mammon, too often allied with covetousness and unrighteousness, are not, (so the mysterious words seem to tell us) wholly confined to this side of the grave and the visible realm of the things that perish. No, friends may be made by it, unseen, unknown friends, who may never be able to make their gratitude known here, but who, in the mystery of an unfolding future, may yet disclose hereafter all the blessings that timely beneficence bore with it; its power, not only to relieve want, but to avert want's worst temptations, hopelessness, and bitterness, and that dull sense of misery which so often deadens the whole spiritual life and flings forward its shadows into the unrevealed future. Bounty can do all this; every offering that will be placed on yonder table may bear its part in procuring to the giver the mysterious yet blessed welcome in the world beyond, when many a relieved and rescued one will be among the first to acknowledge and receive the loving and believing benefactor, and to tell the whole story of timely aid, and of all the spiritual blessings it bore with it, amid the rest and peace of the everlasting habitations.

Such a view as this many and many a deep thinker has taken of the passage before us. I press it not as the only meaning which the dark and difficult words may bear, but certainly as one that may be taken by the sober interpreter, and which, under the circumstances of our present meeting, seems perhaps more than commonly applicable. For who are they whom we are here met together to aid? Those who have the strongest claims, even on our ordinary human feelings and sensibilities—the widow and the orphan; those who, an inspired writer has said, silently call forth the manifestation of religion in its purest and truest form. And not the orphan and the widow under the general aspects of sorrow and struggling, which, in this restless nineteenth century, the very words seem in themselves to imply, but the orphan and the widow under circumstances which a very little consideration will show to be more than usually sad, and more than commonly appealing to our sympathy and aid. I am now pleading for the widows and orphans of our clergy—for those whose really touching case it will do us all good a little more carefully to consider. Few, perhaps, even among the practically-benevolent and tender-hearted, have completely realised what a sad picture of utter heart-suffering is presented by the great majority of those for whom these Festivals were charitably called into existence.

We may add that the collections made for the Charity at the last three Festivals have been as follows:—

GLoucester, 1874.

Collections, £585 8s. 3d.; stewards' contributions and dividends, £570; total, £1,155 8s. 3d.

Worcester, 1875.

Amount collected at the doors on the two days, £702 13s. 7d. (including about £90 dividend on money invested for the Charity); contributions promised as a guarantee fund, £578; total, £1,280 16s. 7d.

Hereford, 1876.

Collected at the doors and stewards' contributions, £1150 1s. 6d.; subsequent donation, £5; total, £1155 1s. 6d.

BADEN.—Mlle Adèle Hippus, of St Petersburg, where she enjoys a high reputation as a pianist, gave a concert at the Conversationhaus on the 28th August, and more than confirmed the favourable impression she had previously produced here. She was much applauded in her solo pieces as well as in the "Variations, Fugue, and Scherzo, on a Theme of Beethoven's, for two Pianos," by M. Saint-Saëns, the other performer being Herr Hans von Bülow, who acted also as conductor. Herr C. von Kottbus, of Dresden, was the vocalist. He sang two German songs, one by A. Jensen, and one by Johannes Brahms, and two Russian songs, "Kroschka," by Bulachow, and "Hutorotschek," by Klimovsky.

Bishop Ellcott's Speech at the Mayor of Gloucester's Lunch.*

"It is with very great pleasure that I rise to return my best thanks in behalf of the venerable Dean and the Chapter and of my brethren of this diocese, whom you are here present so kindly and so charitably to support. I did not like to miss the opportunity, though I had friends elsewhere, of supporting our worthy chief citizen on this very interesting occasion. And so, my dear friends, I will, with the warning hand of the clock before me, very simply and very heartily thank you all for your very kind recognition of the poor services that I have tendered to the Charity this morning. I can only say that I have myself made one humble offering to the Charity, and I feel, though a little tired at present, still quite sure that I shall never regret it. The humble offering which I have made is a walking tour I had projected on the snows of Switzerland. I find myself called, whether rightly or wrongly I do not know, 'an episcopal mountaineer.' I was going to the snows of that fair land this year, but circumstances to which I slightly adverted in my sermon reminded me that I had better steer clear of them, and send my son there instead out of honour to Switzerland; and now I am here rejoicing in the support that you are all tendering to the Festival. Really there is nothing more to be said than this: if my words in the sermon did presage some anxiety as to the future Festivals, such a loyal, kindly, and hearty gathering as the present, under our worthy chief citizen, gives me the greatest possible hopes that the great and noble Charity will remain unimpaired. Nothing now remains, my dear friends, except to say that the many clergy of this diocese—the hard-worked, the faithful, the patient, the earnest—are now in their hearts solemnly thanking you. These are times in which there is much pressure, and a nobler and more charitable work I am persuaded than that in which you are about to engage cannot be named by any one. I thank you, then, in the name of all mentioned, and I beg to wish you all happiness and real Christian enjoyment in this our triennial Festival."

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

On Saturday night M. Henri Ketten made his first appearance this season, and was cordially received. He played Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto with delicacy and finish. M. Ketten was applauded, and, at the conclusion, "re-called," when he played, in acknowledgment, Mendelssohn's Presto in E minor. In the second part of the concert he introduced three of his own compositions, which served to display his facility of execution. The remainder of the concert was composed of a march by Lachner, the "Dance of Almas," from Mr F. H. Cowen's cantata, The Corsair, and the "Airs Hongrois," by Ernst, played by Mlle Pommereul. The vocalists were Mlles Rajmondi and Cristino and Signor Medica. On Wednesday night the first part of the programme was devoted to compositions by Handel and Haydn, the pièce de résistance being "The Farewell" Symphony by Haydn, written for a special occasion, and well known to musicians and amateurs. The Symphony was remarkably well played, under the direction of Signor Arditì, and the concluding bars of the finale, as the musicians one by one left their desks and extinguished the light, created evidently great amusement, which culminated at the point when the conductor finds himself alone. The astonishment of Signor Arditì was so comically expressed that his first appearance as an actor must be pronounced "a decided success," and the audience applauded him so vehemently at the conclusion that the maestro was obliged to come forward and bow his acknowledgments. During the week several new songs have been introduced successfully; Signor Arditì's "Il Gitano," sung by Signor Medica, notably so. Some of last season's successes were also brought forward, Signor Arditì's "The Page's Song," naively sung by Mlle Derivis, and the same composer's valse song, "L'Incontro," sung by Mlle Ida Cristino, winning, as usual, hearty applause.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1877.

MOST of our readers are aware that the letters which Chopin wrote home from Paris were destroyed at Warsaw. But the details connected with the deplorable fact are not generally known. We make no apology, therefore, for condensing from the pages of friend Dwight the following graphic account contained in the new Life of Chopin, by Moritz Karasowski, who says:—

"After Chopin's death, the articles in his rooms in Paris were put up at public auction. Miss J. W. Stirling, a Scotch lady, his pupil and enthusiastic admirer, bought the furniture of his two saloons, with the mementos found there. She took it all with her to her home and with it formed a sort of Chopin-museum. In this collection was a portrait of the genial artist, painted by his friend, Ary Schaffer: a Pleyel grand piano, on which Chopin usually played; a service of Sèvres porcelain, with the inscription: 'Offert par Louis Philippe à Frédéric Chopin 1839;' a costly, and sumptuously inlaid casket (a gift from Rothschild); finally, carpets, and covers for tables and fauteuils, nearly all wrought by the hands of the artist's fair pupils. Miss Stirling provided in her will that after her death all these mementos should fall to the mother of the artist, she so revered. Accordingly they were carried, in 1858, to Warsaw. After the mother's death, in 1861, they came into the hands of Chopin's sister, Mme Isabella Barcinska. This lady occupied the second story of two contiguous houses which form the boundary line between the 'Neue Welt' and the 'Krakauer Vorstadt,' and belonged to Count Andreas Zamoyaki. At the very beginning of the political disturbances, preceding the insurrection in January, 1863, some young men (quite contrary to the general feeling), resolved to threaten the life of every governor. . . . On the 19th of September, 1863, at 6 o'clock in the evening, Count von Berg was returning in his carriage, surrounded by an escort, from the Belvedere to the royal palace. When the carriage came to the place where the 'Neue Welt' and the 'Krakauer Vorstadt' meet, there was a loud report from the fourth story of Count Zamoyaki's house, followed by some Orsini bombs. A few minutes afterwards soldiers surrounded the two houses; all the women found in them, whether dressed or undressed, were dragged into the street, and then set at liberty; the men, on the contrary, were taken to the citadel. Like a stream of lava, bearing all before it, the infuriated soldiery rushed from one story to another. Furniture, pianos, books, manuscripts, in a word all they found in the house, was thrown into the street. Pieces of furniture too large were first hacked up with axes, the legs hewn from the pianofortes, etc. On the second story, which Chopin's sister occupied, all the mementos of the great artist, that had been preserved with the greatest piety, were destroyed. The piano on which he had learnt to play (from the manufactory of Buchholtz), the first confidant and reproducer of his youthful works, was hurled by the vandals into the street." When night came on, the soldiers built a wood-pile of these articles upon the square, at the foot of the monument to Copernicus, and brought forth from their barracks kettles which were filled with wine, rum, alcohol and sugar from the plundered shops. They brewed some punch, which they drank to the sound of merry songs. To keep the fire up, they finally threw into the flames all the pictures, books, and papers, among which were also Chopin's letters to his family written eighteen years before. Eye-witnesses assure us, that an officer gazed for a long time at Chopin's portrait painted by the hand of his friend, before he ruthlessly consigned it to the flames.

"The loss of all the other memorials is not so painful as the annihilation of the letters, in which Chopin had poured out his whole soul, full of love for his family, of patriotism for the land of his birth, of enthusiasm for his Art, and admiration for all that is beautiful and noble. Extremely interesting, and of value for the historian of culture, would have been the letters which he wrote from Paris at the time he was daily receiving laurel wreaths as an artist, and came into close contact with the highest persons, as well as with the Coryphæi of Art in the French capital; for he described all those experiences most vividly and truly. It is also to be lamented that the lively spirit and sparkling wit of these communications are lost to the world. In fact, a single stroke of Chopin's pen often depicted the most interesting and important of his contemporaries, more strikingly than the long, elaborate descriptions of many other writers."

We cannot help thinking that the Governor, Count von Berg himself, who, by the way, was not hurt, would, had he known what was going on, have hastened to save from destruction the relics of one of Poland's most distinguished sons.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

In his Briefe an eine Ungenannte, Ferdinand Hiller says: "There are times and epochs when nearly all sense of beauty seems to have deserted the producers in Art, and, I fear, we live in one of these periods. The persons to whom I have alluded strive after the new, the exciting, the piquant, and the effective; they desire to surprise, and even dumbfounder; at any cost, they are determined to be deep, original, and clever; they confound the beautiful with the conventional, with what has superficial polish, and despise the beautiful, simply because they scarcely comprehend it. True, it has been given only to the rarest geniuses in art and poetry to be at the same time deep and beautiful—but why not at least strive to be so? The beautiful, after all, is, and always will be, more beautiful than aught else."

ONE of the principal innovations at the Palace of the Tuileries during the reign of Louis XIV. was the "Salle des Machines," situated in the north wing, between the Pavillon de l'Horloge and the Pavillon de Marsan. Built in 1662, after Vigan's design, it was the largest theatre in Europe. It contained about 8,000 persons, and occupied the entire breadth of the north wing of the palace. The stage was 41 metres in depth, while the proscenium opening measured 11 metres in height. The auditorium was 50 metres deep, 16 broad, and 16 high. The machinery was something extraordinary. The Marquis de Sourdeac invented a lift which carried up 100 persons at once. It was in this theatre that Ercole amante was first performed, and that the King, the Queen, and the principal members of the Court, male and female, took part in the fairy ballets given between the acts; it was in this theatre that Molière's Psyche was represented, and—irony of Fate—that, a century later, the most bitter foe of kings, the National Convention, held its sittings.

COMPOSERS were formerly not so particular about the novelty of their librettos as they now are. During the last century, at least 25 took as a subject Adriano in Siria, without counting 3 others at the commencement of the present century, namely, Migliarucci, who brought out an Adriano in Siria in 1811; Portogallo and Farinelli, who did the same in 1815; while Mambelli followed suit for the opening of the theatre at Como. The first Adriano in Siria was set by Pergolesi, 1734; then came those by Caldara, 1785; Duni, Mysliveczar, and Ferandini, 1787; Graun, 1745; Ciampi, Francesco, 1748; Ciampi, Legrenzio Vincenzo, and Abos, 1750; Adalfati, 1751; Perez and Scarlatti, 1752; Hasse, 1753; Bernasconi, 1755; Galuppi, 1760; Bach, Christian, 1764; Guglielmi and Majo, 1766; Sacchini, 1770; Holzbauer and Schwau-berg, 1772; Cabalone, 1773; Cherubini, 1782; Nasolini, 1790; and Mayer, 1798. But even more popular with composers than Adriano in Siria was Alessandro in India, which was set by Leo, 1727; Porpora and Vinci, 1730; Hasse and Mancini, 1732; Bioni, 1733; Schiassi, 1734; Pescetti, 1740; Graun, 1744; Gluck, 1745; Latilla, 1753; Perez and Galuppi, 1755; Jomelli, 1757; Scolari and Piccirini, 1758; Holzbauer, 1759; Cocchi, 1761; Majo, 1767; Naumann and Sacchini, 1768; Bertoni and Cabalone, 1770; Paiesiello, 1773; Corri, 1774; Rust, 1775; Mortellari, 1779; Cimarosa, 1781; Cherubini, 1784; Gressnick, 1785; Chiavacci, 1786; Caruso, 1787; Bianchi, 1788; Tarchi, 1793; and Pacini, 1824.

PROVINCIAL.

DUBLIN.—Miss Elena Norton, composer of the comic opera The Rose and the Ring, has just completed an operetta in one act, entitled Don Giovanni Thompson; or, Too many Strings to his Bow, the libretto by Miss Mary Heyne, a performance of which is to be given in a few days at the Royal Irish Academy of Music, and to which the admission will be by invitation. Miss Elena Norton, who is a native of this city, is to appear here as Arline in The Bohemian Girl, with Mr Carl Rosa's company next April.—Express.

BRADFORD.—Madame Rose Hersee's Opera Company at the Prince's Theatre have given for the first time Meyerbeer's Huguenots, with success. There was a capital house, and applause was frequent. Especial interest was attached to the performance on account of Mme Rose Hersee herself impersonating Valentine. She proved fully equal to the occasion, singing with spirit and displaying to advantage the fine voice which she possesses. She was, on the whole, very well supported. Mme Cave-Ashton was especially successful as Margarit de Valois, her remarkably clear voice being heard to great advantage. Miss Florence St John deserves a special word of commendation for her performance of Urbano, the Page.

RAMSGATE.—The new Marina has been fully appreciated by those who have availed themselves of its advantages. The promenade and buildings, being under cover, have been constantly crowded, independent of the weather. The chief evening attraction, during this month, is a grand concert held at the "Etablissement," a handsome and spacious edifice after the style of those so common on the Continent. The programme consists of well-known vocal and instrumental music effectively rendered by Messrs Gerard Coventry, F. Penna, Mme San Martino, and Miss Frytherch. On the top of the cliff are the Victoria Gardens, where a military band performs a good selection of music on the promenade to a numerous and select assembly of residents and visitors.—W. A. J.

MARGATE.—At Mr Lott's sixth and last recital, on Monday evening, Sept. 10th, on the splendid new organ at St John's Church, built by Messrs Gray & Davison, the following pieces made up the programme:—

Allegretto, in G minor, and "I waited for the Lord," Lobgesang (Mendelssohn); Adagio, in A (Onslow); March, from Ode to St Cecilia (Handel); "My heart ever faithful," and Prelude and Fugue (Bach); Andante, in E minor (Silas); Allegro Moderato, in B flat (Handel); Andante in F, varied (Calkin); Adagio, in D, and "Evening Prayer" (Smart); Wedding March (Mendelssohn).

WEIMAR.—The chief of the police has issued orders that no one is to be allowed to play the piano with open windows; yet Weimar is reputed one of the most musical cities in Germany. Perhaps that is the reason of the new regulation.

PALERMO.—The marble bust which Sig. Rosario was commissioned by the Municipality to execute of Sig. Petrella has been set up in the Villa Giulia, not far from the bust of Donizetti. It is an admirable likeness. On the bass-relief a laurel wreath is twined round a lyre without strings, and on the ribbon binding the wreath are inscribed in gold letters the names of Petrella's principal scores.

MILAN.—Mme Adelina Patti will sing ten evenings next November at the Scala, the operas selected being La Traviata, Faust, Il Trovatore, Il Barbiere, and Dinorah. The only other artists at present engaged are Nicolini and Maini.—The following works are promised during October and November at the Teatro Dal Verme: La Forza del Destino, Gabriella Candiano (a new opera by Sig. Augusto Moroder, with words by Sig. E. Golisciani), Norma, Un Ballo in Maschera, and Lina, the last opera by Sig. Ponchielli.

A MODEL OPERAHOUSE.

(Communicated.)

The new Operahouse at Leicester, which has just been completed, was opened on the 6th inst. with a grand full dress concert, commencing with the National Anthem, performed by a full band and chorus, the solos being sung by Mdlles Carina Clelland and Enriquez, Messrs Shelley and George Fox. Mdlle Cronin was the solo pianist, and Mrs Priscilla Frost the solo harpist. Miss Carina Clelland, who is a great favourite here, had an enthusiastic reception, and received the first encore of the evening for her splendid rendering of "Casta Diva." Miss Enriquez was recalled for her fine singing of "Kathleen Mavourneen," and Mr George Fox for "The Village Blacksmith." During this month the enterprising lessee and manager, Mr Elliot Galer, devotes the new theatre to operas in English. The principal artists engaged are: Prime donne—Miss Carina Clelland, Miss Alice May, Miss Edith Percy, and Mme Tonneller; contralti—Miss E. Collins and Mrs Elliot Galer; tenori, Messrs Shelley, Traverner, Grantham, and Galer; bassi—Messrs Norman, Kirby, Pope, and Durand. The band will be led by Mr H. C. Cooper, and the conductors are Mr G. B. Allen, Mus. Bac., and Mr T. Melling. The band and chorus number about 60 selected London professionals. The operas announced for performance are Faust, Don Giovanni, Il Trovatore, La Traviata, The Lily of Kil-larney, Rose of Castille, Satanella, Maritana, and The Bohemian Girl. This new theatre, of which Mr Phipps is the architect, rises to an elevation of three storeys, the ground storey consisting of a series of stone arches leading to the different portions of the auditorium, the box-office being at the extreme end of the series. Next to this is the pit entrance, a spacious vestibule, capable of holding a large portion of intending playgoers under cover before the opening of the doors. The remaining series of arches lead through another spacious vestibule, with tessellated pavements, handsome lamps, and artistic decorations, to a well-lighted and spacious staircase of stone. On the first landing the means of egress are most ample. From the pit there are no less than three outlets available, the same number from the gallery, and equal accommodation from the high-priced parts of the house; so that it is believed the entire building can be emptied in less than five minutes. The entrances to the gallery are quite distinct from the others, and at least 600 persons can stand under cover before the doors are opened. To reduce the risk of fire, which in 95 per cent. of cases arises in the workshops, the carpenter's and property-master's workshops are built in a yard at the side of the theatre, entirely away from the main building. Two large cisterns, holding each 15,000 gallons of water, are placed at the top of the building; while, still further to reduce the risk of fire, it is Mr Galer's intention to render fireproof every bit of canvas used in the borders. The building is divided into three distinct sections by means of thick party walls; thus the dressing-rooms are shut off from the stage, the stage from the auditorium, and the latter from the front entrance.

VENICE.—Auber's Fra Diavolo was recently given at the Teatro Malibran, for the first time here. The local critics are very angry that the public received it coldly; but perhaps the unsatisfactory manner of its performance may account for this last fact.

After the audience of the Götterdämmerung, on the evening of Aug. 30, had behaved like a pack of crazy people, and by screams, calls, clapping of hands, pounding, stamping, and all sorts of boisterous noises, had gone regularly mad, but had finally moved the most named man of his time to step forward, a preliminary gentle cooling off in any way was very salutary; for on the outside a cold, cutting wind blew about the temple, and the way to the town was muddy, wet, and long. The abrupt transition out of the boiling heat of enthusiasm into the prosaic evening shower of the outer world must to many a one have been quite suggestive of reflection. Wagner came forward to hold once more one of those discourses, which afford so deep an insight into the most secret thought and feeling of the so talented, yet so bewildered man. First he alluded cursorily, with formal thanks, to his royal benefactor; then he turned at once to the self-sacrificing troop of artists suddenly made visible behind a parting curtain, who had rendered the success of his work possible, and he took just this occasion (!) to express his bitter animosity against all those who had stood against his enterprise, whether as doubters, as opponents, or as neutrals. His words were ice to the crowd dripping with the sweat of enthusiasm. * * * This time also he received every mark of homage coldly, inwardly unmoved and with a certain misanthropical contempt, as a tribute due to him; and even now, when he had finally reached the long sought goal, we saw him filled only with anger and disdain towards all who were not blind worshippers, and with an intolerance, worthy of the Vatican, for every free expression of opinion, to which in fact an angry stamping of the right foot lent a heightened emphasis.

We willingly recognize that Wagner is the most important, the most richly gifted, and the most conspicuous among the opera composers of recent times; but even he will not escape the experience, that nothing passes away more swiftly than the intoxication of enthusiasm, and that applause leaves no visible traces behind it.

Through four evenings we sat before a remarkable work, which it was certainly very interesting to hear for once, but which could in no way satisfy a cultivated sense and taste for Art; which seemed unworthy of the prodigious stir that was made about it, and did not answer to the expectations that had been cherished concerning it.

Beautiful form is one with beautiful soul in Art. Form and substance must appear identical in an Art-work; the imperishable principle in it must come before us in a perfect outward shape, involuntarily holding all our senses in sweet bonds. But the work, which Wagner brings us as the Art-work of the Future, in spite of certain single traits of grandeur and significance, is a thing which undervalues all law and tradition, a thing formless, absurd, wrought by pattern. In its dreary song-speech, so opposed to singing, it is an unbeautiful mongrel between opera and drama, which can have only a negative meaning for the present and for the history of Art. Let us guard, then, the precious Art possession of our German people, won amid hot toil and conflict; let us spread protecting hands over the noblest legacy that has come down from our fathers. Should these modern musical theories and strivings, to which they built a temple and offered up hecatombs in Bayreuth, seize hold of the nation, then indeed a Götterdämmerung (Twilight of the gods) for our beloved Art of Tones would be inevitable. Let us leave it in serene trust to the future to pass judgment on the new Art style preached by Wagner and upon his Music-Drama. Its judgment on this "most magnificent hallucination of a musical subjectivity arrived at its last height," † cannot be doubtful.

LEIPZIG.—There were twenty-seven competitors for the prize offered by Herren Siegesmund and Volkening for the best Pianoforte Method for beginners. The judges, Herr Reinecke, of Leipzig, Herr Seiss, of Cologne, and Professor Kullak, of Berlin, decided unanimously in favour of Herr Urbach, Cantor at Egeln. The prize work will be published almost directly. The first thousand music-masters who make application will each receive a copy gratis, and post-free.

TREASURE TROVE.

Through the recent death of a German nobleman, a collection of autographic documents of celebrated composers has come into the possession of Dr Joseph Müller, formerly editor of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung. It derives additional value from the fact of its having hitherto remained perfectly unknown. Its whilom owner preserved it jealously from curious eyes, and even left injunctions by will that the letters and works included in it should not be published till after the lapse of several years. There are 37 original letters, namely:—J. S. Bach, 3; C. Ph. Bach, 2; Beethoven, 4; Couperin, 2; Gluck, 4; Grétry, 2; Handel, 7; Haydn, 3; Di Lasso, 1; Lully, 3; Morley, 1; Mozart, 4; and H. Schütz, 1. They are nearly all of importance. In addition to the above, the collection contains unpublished compositions by Bach, Couperin; Handel (a complete opera), Haydn, Lully, Mozart, and H. Schütz (fragment of an opera).

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From our Correspondent.)

A grand concert took place at the Etablissement des Bains, the hour for the commencement being 9 p.m., while the price of entrance was fixed at 8 fr. In spite of this, there was a fair audience to listen to M^{me}. E. Engally, "première chanteuse du Théâtre-Lyrique de Paris," and Signor Del Puente, well known in London. Instrumental music was represented by M. F. Lalliet, "premier hautbois du Grand-Opéra, Paris," and the orchestra of the Casino. M. Brunet fils acted as "pianiste-accompagnateur." The programme consisted of the overtures to Der Freischütz, Les joyesses Commères de Windsor, L'Echo des Bois, and Martha, and two fantasias for hautbois by M. Lalliet. An air from Le Prophète and "Romance Russe" were sung by M^{me} Engally, who also joined Sig. Del Puente in a duet from Paul et Virginie. Signor Del Puente's solos were "In un Boschetto" (Scuderi), "Dio possente" (Faust), and the grand scena ed aria from Don Carlos (Verdi). M^{me} Engally and Signor Del Puente met with deserved applause. At the matinée musicale which took place on Friday, August 31, at the same place, besides the overture to L'Etoile du Nord, a fantasia on Romeo and Juliet, &c., there was a special attraction in the shape of two romances given by a young baritone, M. Isidore de Lara, who has taken the first prize at the Conservatoire of Milan quite lately, and who displayed his capability in Durand's "Comme à vingt ans," and his talent as composer in a romance of his own, entitled "Ricordi." M. de Lara was well received, and "recalled" after each piece.

At the Theatre there has been no change since I last wrote. La Favorite, La Dame blanche, Le Trouvère, La Reine de Chypre, &c., have been the attractions.

RETURNED.

I.	II.
All welcome to my heart,	The simple little flower,
My own sweet bird,	I loved so well,
Thou'll ne'er again depart,	In some far distant bower
My first preferred!	Is gone to dwell;
I bade, through all thy flight,	I could not trace thy track,
Love's beacon burn,	But prayed a prayer
And called the weary night—	Some breeze might waft thee back,
Return! return!	My flower, my fair!
'Twas gloomy all the day,	Now thou again art home,
While thou wast flown,	My own blue bell,
And voiceless things would say—	My own sweet bird is come,
Alone! alone!	I loved so well;
When sad I op'd the door	And long the day shall be
And gazed around,	Ere thou wilt part,
Where cheerily before	To roam again so free.
I thee had found.	From my fond heart.

For WELLINGTON GUERNSEY from CAROLINE NORTON.

DRESDEN.—Das Thal von Andorra (Le Val d'Andorre) has been performed at the Theatre Royal. It was the last work got up by the General Director of Music, Herr Riets, before he resigned the post of conductor. The opera of Armin is in preparation. M^{me} Otto-Alvleben has joined the company.

SHAVER SILVER ACROSS THE AGRICULTURAL HALL CONCERTS.

At the Agricultural Hall—or Horticultural Hall, as it might now be called—the attractions of a promenade concert are combined with those of a flower show. The connection, however, of the building with agriculture properly so-called is not lost sight of; meanwhile, the popular concert-singer, Mdme Liebhart (who, by the way, is known in her own country chiefly as an operatic artist), with Mr F. Kingsbury as musical director, has arranged a very interesting series of entertainments, described as “vocal, orchestral, and military.” The general programme comprises the names of a remarkably large number of distinguished artists. Among the sopranis are Mdme Anna Bishop, Mdme Edith Wynne, Miss Frances Brooke, Miss Giulia Warwick, Miss Annie Sinclair, Miss Rhoda Temple, and Mdme Liebhart; among the contraltis, Mdme Antoinette Sterling and Miss Julia Elton. The principal tenors, baritones, and basses engaged are Mr Vernon Rigby, Mr W. H. Cummings, Mr George Perren, Mr Maybrick, and Mr Lewis Thomas.

Mdme Anna Bishop's performances, apart from their artistic merit, are particularly interesting as proofs of the immortality of the human voice. Scarcely more than thirty years have elapsed since Mdme Anna Bishop, after a long and brilliant foreign career, came to London in the character of an operatic singer, and gave a series of highly successful representations at Drury Lane, then under the management of Mr Alfred Bunn. After going once or twice round the world, she again returned to her native land, and, appearing this time at concerts only, renewed the very favourable impression that she had made some dozen years before. Some say that Mdme Anna Bishop then retired, and that the lady who now calls herself by that name is not the one who delighted London by the charm of her ballad-singing some twenty years ago. That, however, must be a mistake. The Mdme Anna Bishop of twenty and of thirty years since may be recognised by the quality of her voice, by her expression, and by her general style, in the Mdme Bishop who sang the other night as artistically as ever “Let the bright Seraphim” in the first part of the concert, and “Home, sweet home” in the second.

To no singer were more than two pieces assigned; a limitation due no doubt to the fashion which prevails equally at Mdme Liebhart's and at Signor Arditi's of causing each piece to be repeated. This custom seems to deprive an encore of whatever value may at one time have belonged to it, and the next step should be to do away with encores altogether. The present system—borrowed, we believe, from the music halls—must obviously have the effect of limiting unduly the number of pieces in each programme. The best plan, under existing circumstances and as long as the present fashion in respect to encores endures, would be for each singer to come provided with two songs for every one set down in the programme. This would at least introduce a little more variety into the performances. But before long something worse than encores may be expected. Already it is no compliment to call for the repetition of a song, though it would be a marked slight not to do so. Soon the only mark of attention it will be possible to offer to an exceptionally successful vocalist will be a double encore. Mdme Liebhart's own contributions to the concert of the opening night were—“Sweet spirit, hear my prayer” and a new ballad by Mr G. B. Allen, called “Far from home.” The other singers were Mdme Antoinette Sterling, who was heard in Sullivan's “Lost Chord” and “Caller Herrin”; Miss Frances Brooke in “Thy Face,” and “Tell me, my heart,” Mr Vernon Rigby, and Mr Maybrick. With the exception of one overture (Masaniello), the instrumental music was all of the lightest kind; and the one pianoforte solo of the evening was a prelude and waltz composed and executed, with orchestral accompaniment, by Signor Tito Mattei. It must be added that Mr Kingsbury's band is excellent.

The whole of the third part of the concert was devoted to a sort of symphonic quadrille, the composition of the late M. Jullien, entitled the “British Army.” As originally designed, this so-called quadrille included music deemed specially appropriate for infantry, cavalry, and artillery; with national airs suggestive of English, Scotch, and Irish troops. The French, German, Russian, and Turkish national anthems have now been added; and the “British Army Quadrille,” which begins in the Spanish peninsula with war between France and England, ends in the peninsula of the Balkans with war between Russia and Turkey. The introduction of the German national anthem cannot be satisfactorily accounted for in connection with either of these contests. But the public are pleased to hear it, and the re-arrangers of this remarkable specimen of programme music may have wished to suggest that the events of 1870 and 1871 have led more or less directly, to those which are now taking place in Turkey. The performance of the Russian and Turkish anthems, and the exhibition of persons in Russian and Turkish uniforms, furnish the public with opportunities for proclaiming their sentiments in reference to the Russo-Turkish war. What was once put forward as merely military quadrilles has now acquired a political character.

THE NATIONAL ANTHEMS OF ENGLAND AND PRUSSIA (5TH S. VIII. 168).

(To the Editor of the “Musical World.”)

SIR,—I have been asked by a correspondent of Notes and Queries “whether Dr John Bull copied from the Prussians, or whether the Prussians ‘annexed’ Dr John Bull.” The history of the German national anthem, “Heil dir im Siegerkranz,” which is sung to the tune of “God save the King,” was copied into the Musical World from the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, on Feb. 29th, 1868.

“None of our readers,” says the Berlin editor, “are probably ignorant that neither the music nor the text belong to us, but that both are of foreign origin. We may, perhaps, mention that the tune is taken from the English ‘God save the King,’ composed by Henry Carey. Any one desirous of a very detailed account of this should refer to vol. i. of Chrysander's Jahrbücher der musikalischen Wissenschaft (Leipsic, 1863). But the text, also, was not originally German, having been written by a Danish subject for his king, Christian. It is first to be found in the Flensburger Wochenblatt for the year 1790 as a ‘song’ in eight strophes, ‘to be sung by Danish subjects on the birthday of their king,’ its author being Heinrich Harries, then editor of the paper. Cut down to five strophes, it was published some years afterwards (if I am not mistaken) in the Spener'sche Zeitung as a ‘Berliner Volkslied,’ arranged by Schumacher, a native of Holstein, and gradually became more and more widely diffused. Thus, therefore, an English melody and a Danish song—these constitute our so-called national anthem. . . . It is generally accepted as the national anthem, and not in Prussia alone, for most of the States belonging to the (old) Bund have also appropriated it.”

Dr John Bull was the author of a “God save the King,” but not of the one adopted by the nation. Dr Bull's is on four notes, intended to represent the four words, “God save the King,” as rung upon the church bells to the popular exclamation. That is the oldest kind of “God save the King,” it being derived from the Old Testament. When Solomon, Adonijah, and other kings were proclaimed with the sound of a trumpet, the people said, “God save the King.” Dr John Bull's “God save the King” is printed in Dr Kitchener's Loyal and National Songs of England. A claim has been set up for Dr Bull to the authorship of the National Anthem upon the strength of an “ayre” in a Dutch MS. copy of his compositions. The rhythm suits the words, but the tune is not the same. It would have been gratifying to us all to have been able to trace back our National Anthem to the typical John Bull, but it cannot be done without the help of imagination. There is not a trace of any “God save the King” as a National Anthem in the time of the Stuarts or before it. The MS. of Dr Bull's compositions was garbled by a late possessor to make the resemblance of the “ayre” somewhat greater. He added three sharps at the signature, to change the key to A major—an anachronism easily detected by a musician, because only two sharps would have been at the signature, and the third would have been marked as an accidental where it occurred, even if the eye could fail to note the much darker colour of the ink, under the varnish with which he had then covered the page. I had the advantage of having known the manuscript before it passed into his possession. Having been consulted as to its value, the manuscript was left with me to examine its contents, and I was too ardent a collector of old English tunes to fail to do so. I exposed the garbling of the Bull manuscript in 1856, after which it was withdrawn from inspection, and remains so to this day. Even the late Dr Rimbault was not allowed to see it, and a false copy in the key of G was sent to him. I have a transcript of that version in his handwriting, made for me.

The national songs for the Stuarts were two—“Vive le Roy” and “When the King enjoys his own again.” These are published in my collection of Popular Music of the Olden Time, with many quotations from contemporary writers to prove their adoption. The only passage I have seen which could be construed into “singing” “God save the King” is negated by the direction to sing the ballad to the tune of “Vive le Roy.” When Charles II. was proclaimed king, a ballad was written upon the event, which has the following burden or chorus:—

“Then let us sing, boyes,
God save the King, boyes,
Drink a good health, and sing Vive le Roy.”

See more in Popular Music, p. 430.

A third tune was employed for the laudation of James II., called "King James's Jigg," but still no "God save the King." Thus, after the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion had been suppressed, James made a progress through the west of England, and the ever-ready ballad-writer celebrated it in "The Western Triumph; or, The Royal Progress of our Gracious King James II. into the West of England"—

"Our gracious King, where e'er he came,
Was entertained with joy;
His presence did much comfort bring,
All crys Vive le Roy—" to the tune of "King James's Jigg." A copy of this is in Pepys' Collection of Ballads, ii. 246. The earliest version of the words and music of our "God save the King" is included in Harmonia Anglicana, to which Henry Carey was a contributor. He is so named on the title-page, and, as Carey died in 1743, by his own hand, the publication of Harmonia Anglicana must have been before 1745, when this song, hymn, or anthem, became nationalised through the rebellion of that year. Moreover, the original copy begins "God save our Lord the King," which was changed to "God save great George our King," in 1745.

The authorship was claimed for Henry Carey by his son, George Savile Carey, when he arrived at manhood, and, in my judgment, no evidence has yet been adduced which can rebut his claim.

UNIVERSITY INTELLIGENCE.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY, SEPT. 10.

The Syndics of the Fitzwilliam Museum, in their last annual report, which was circulated at the end of the Easter Term, publish the following report of Mr Otto Goldschmidt, member of the Royal Swedish Academy of Music, upon the manuscript music in the Fitzwilliam Library. Mr Goldschmidt says:

"By desire of the Syndicate of the Fitzwilliam Museum, I have examined the contents of the Musical Library, the bequest of the late Lord Fitzwilliam. I have given more particular attention to the manuscripts, as forming by far the greater and more important part. These may be divided into two classes—those which are copies, or most probably copies only, and the several volumes of autographs. The former contains in many volumes a number of compositions, sacred, secular, and instrumental, deserving serious attention and identification. Without entering unduly into details, I would observe that, although the great Italian school, with which Palestrina and his contemporaries' names are connected, is represented in the Library, yet it is far richer in later Italian compositions, and it is among the latter that Mr Vincent Novello has chosen the specimens contained in the 'Fitzwilliam Music' volumes published about fifty years ago. Of the early Flemish school I found Orlando di Lasso's 'Cantiones sacrae,' four large volumes, while of German music there is but little, saving works by Hasse and Handel and instrumental fragments of various composers. Of English music, sacred, madrigalian, and instrumental, there is much well worth close examination; and there is a great deal of instrumental music and secular cantatas of different countries, partly bound up in miscellaneous volumes, and partly scattered among the ten parcels of unsorted music, which must be sorted and identified before an opinion can be pronounced.

"Reverting now to the autographs, assuming their genuineness, and putting aside for the present Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book and the Handel Autographs, I would first call attention to Dr Blow's Autograph Volume (two parts bound in one) of Services and Anthems, and next to that ascribed to Henry Purcell (much less rich as to contents and calligraphic beauty than Dr Blow's). Blow's two volumes (800 pages) would, in my opinion, contain many services almost unknown, and of rare beauty probably, while their traditional reading and correctness must make this copy very valuable indeed. Then next in importance is Dr Croft's autograph copy of a selection from Henry Purcell's works, and Dr Boyce's selection of Italian and other music (two volumes), from which V. Novello has selected several numbers for his 'Fitzwilliam Music' publication. Considering the period at which these four very eminent musicians (all composers themselves) lived—viz., Dr Blow (1648—1708), Dr Croft (1677—1727), H. Purcell (1658—1696), Dr Boyce (1710—1779)—we have in these compilations of their own selection and penmanship a musical succession such as few libraries of music possess. Adding to them Queen Elizabeth's 'Virginal Book,' which contains a great number of original and adapted pieces for the virginal (an infant harpsichord), dating from the latter portion of the 16th century, the development of English music during a period of two and a half centuries is thus illustrated by a series of original productions contained within the Library.

"I do not consider the Handel Autograph Volumes very important, although they are all more or less interesting; one or two have served the great composer as sketch books, and others have been put together from scraps. Vol. X. 3. 33 contains a fine autograph score of a Chandos anthem. X. 3. 29 contains three tunes for three hymns by Charles Wesley, which might be published along with a fine 'Musette' (in the same volume, I think) and one or two other detached pieces. X. 3. 42 contains an important and beautiful version of the famous chorus in Acis and Galatea, 'Happy, happy,' and an air from a 'Te Deum.' Allusion is made to your collection in the publication of Acis by the German Handel Society, vol. III., p. iv., as the source whence this chorus, reprinted there as an appendix, is taken. I shall not dwell on the printed portion of the collection, because I consider it as of little importance compared with the other, and as far surpassed by more modern collections. Before I proceed, however, to the second part of my Report, I would beg leave to mention that the foregoing remarks are open to correction, as being the result of a three days' inspection, while the task, in order to be decisive and final, would require very much more time. Should the opinion of the Syndicate as to the value of the collection be strengthened by the foregoing remarks, then, with a view to its being made useful, I would beg leave to urge the absolute necessity of a proper and detailed arrangement (i.e., cataloguing) of its contents. This would comprise the classification, identification, and verification of the manuscripts—that is, of every composition, great or small. And it stands to reason that every composition must separately appear by name in a catalogue if it is to be of any use, and many volumes will require re-arranging, re-binding, &c. Under identification I understand the making sure of the authorship of the composers to whom the various compositions are attributed; while by verification I mean the correctness of the reading of compositions, upon which many different copyists in various countries have been engaged. In order to effect a proper comparison, collections of ancient musical masterpieces will have to be acquired, such as have been compiled and published in considerable number during the present century, both on the Continent and in England; and a competent musician, who is experienced and also a scholar, will have to take the work in hand, and devote to it many months. This done—and then only—the Syndicate will be in a position to determine upon the usefulness of publishing (and such publication would probably take a continuous form) selections from the general body of the MS. music. There are, however, portions of the contents of Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book and of the Handel Manuscripts which, if the Syndicate thought proper, might be published (the latter probably in facsimile) without waiting for the general classification and re-arrangement above recommended, and such publication would be of great interest to students."

A CHILD'S SONG.

That little girl among the flowers, How happy does she seem,
So pretty that she is more like A sweet and heavenly dream.
But where are all her playmates gone? They were not kind to leave her so;

A dog or horse might frighten her, And hurt her very much.
Then her mamma would be so vexed That she had gone alone.

If I'm a good and loving child, I hope to go to Heaven,
And play about the bright fields there, And sing the whole day long.
I never shall be left alone, For there is where the angels live;
And father, mother, brothers, sisters, All shall meet in joy,
To sing and praise for evermore The Power and Love of God.

HANOVER.—The two principal novelties during the forthcoming season at the Theatre Royal will be Verdi's Aida and Ignaz Brüll's Goldene Kreuz.

MUNICH.—Herr Kéler-Béla has brought his very popular concerts in the Gardens of the Englisches Café to a close, after a prosperous season of three months.

COPENHAGEN.—Herr Ullmann is announced to visit this capital about the middle of October with a concert company, including Mme Artôt-Padilla, MM. Padilla, Jaëll, and Jules de Swert.—The Trebelli Concert Company, consisting of Mme Trebelli, Mlle Valleria, MM. Behrens, Talbo, and Cowen (the last-named gentleman as accompanist on the piano), gave their final concert in the Tivoli concert-room, on the 25th August. It is now settled that Mme Trebelli and Herr Behrens will sing early next year at the Theatre Royal, which was to re-open this month with Le Roi l'a dit, by Léo Delibes.

FUNERAL OF MDME BOULAN.

At the French Chapel, King Street, Portman Square, a requiem mass was celebrated on the 7th inst., by Canon Tournel and the clergy and choir, previous to the interment, at St Mary's Cemetery, Kensal Green, of the lamented Mdme Boulan, youngest daughter of Sir Julius Benedict. Public sympathy and respect for a man of eminence in his artistic profession, as well as private sorrow for the loss of an estimable lady, induced many persons outside the immediate circle by whom this bereavement is felt to enter with the friends and mourners, and to fill the little chapel, as afterwards to crowd around the grave. Shortly before eleven o'clock, the coffin, of polished oak, with silver mounts, was carried from the house in Manchester Square, and placed in an open hearse-car of new design, with violet hangings. This catafalque, drawn by four plumed horses, was followed by the mourning coaches, four in number, containing the family and other mourners. At the entrance to the chapel Canon Tournel, with whom was one of the ecclesiastics of the Madeleine, in Paris, received the remains, and led the short procession up the centre aisle to the draped bier, round which were tall lighted candles. Sir Julius and his son-in-law, M. Boulan, walked together as chief mourners. Just before the reading of the Gospel, lighted tapers were handed to the friends, and the "credo-pall" was afterwards removed from the coffin, on which wreaths and crosses, formed of choice white flowers, were heaped in profusion. The music, consisting exclusively of the Gregorian chants, was, in obedience to the Cardinal-Archbishop's strict injunction, unaccompanied by the organ or any instruments. On the conclusion of the mass, at noon, the cortege was re-formed by Messrs Garstin & Sons, the undertakers, and proceeded to Kensal Green, where the body was deposited in a new brick vault, and the short remaining service brought the obsequies to a close.

WAIFS.

MDLLE TIETJENS.—We are glad to be able to announce that Mdle Tietjens was much better on Sunday, and able to take a walk in her garden. On Wednesday last she underwent another operation, which gave her much relief, and she now has every hope of being able to bear the journey back to London to-morrow.—Times, September 11. [Mdle Tietjens left Worthing on Thursday, by special train, and arrived at her town residence without suffering any ill effects from the journey.]

MDME PATTI.—We are happy to be able to announce that Mdme Adelina Patti, about whose retirement from the operatic stage many unfounded rumours have been circulated, will next season resume her position as prima donna assoluta at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden. The contract was signed on Friday.—Observer, September 9.

Mad. Marie Sass has been stopping at Biarritz.

The Baron Dervies has given up his famous orchestra at Valcuze. There will be no more Italian opera at Cairo; at least, not for the present.

Kiel's oratorio of Christus will be performed at the third Silesian Musical Festival.

It is said that Herr Hans von Bülow will direct a concert-tour in Scotland this winter.

Sig. Botteaini has been giving concerts at Leghorn, whence he was to proceed to Treviso.

Mad. Carvalho chose the part of Marguerite in Gounod's Faust for her re-appearance at the Grand Opera, Paris.

Mdlle Luigini, a daughter of a former conductor at the Grand-Théâtre, Lyons, is engaged at the Paris Opéra-Comique.

Herr Kretschmer, the composer of Die Folkunger, has completed a new opera, Heinrich der Löwe, having written both text and music.

There are hopes that L'Africaine will be ready at the Grand Opera, Paris, by November. It will be put on the stage with great magnificence.

Among the singers at the inauguration of the new synagogue in the Rue de Buffault, Paris, was M. J. Dias de Soria, who came from Bordeaux expressly.

The buffo opera, with words and music by MM. Ferrier and Serpette respectively, for the Bouffes-Parisiens, which was to have been called La Lectrice de l'Infante, will now be entitled La Petite Muette.

Roger's pupil, Mdle Richard, who carried off the first prize this year at the Paris Conservatory, will appear ere long at the Grand Opera in La Favorite.

Signor Bevignani left London, via Brussels and Berlin, on Monday evening, en route for Moscow, to fulfil his engagement as conductor of the Imperial Operahouse.

The four leading danseuses, Mdles Ricci, Viale, Mauri, and Zuliani, engaged for the forthcoming season at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, are Italian.

Efforts are being made to establish a private Conservatory of Music in Milan. The Minister of Public Instruction has promised his support to the new institution.

Negotiations are pending between Mdme Lucca, of Milan, and Sig. Schira for a new grand opera, to be written by the accomplished maestro to a book by Sig. L. Fortis.

The choral society known as "Les Enfants de Paris" have chosen for their director M. Emile Pessard, in place of M. Lesecq, struck a short time since with mental alienation.

Señor Padilla and Mad. Artôt-Padilla contemplate giving a series of concerts in Sweden. Señor Padilla is, moreover, engaged next spring at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna.

On the 26th ult. Dr Harrar presented to Herr R. Wagner, in the name of the Germans of London, a magnificent album, containing the photographs of all Michael Angelo's frescoes.

There is a report that Salvini and Ernest Rossi will appear together at Florence. Othello is named as the opening piece, and it is said they will alternate the characters of Othello and Iago.

The number of Italian singers seeking engagements—"ancora disponibili"—comprised, a week back, 132 sopranos, 54 contraltos, 145 tenors, 98 baritones, and 37 basses, making 457 in all.

Mr Brinley Richards has been giving his lectures on National Music with success at Abergavenny and Newport (Monmouthshire), assisted by Miss Mary Davies and Miss Lizzie Evans as "illustrators" of the vocal portion.

Berlin possesses twelve theatres; five of the first class—namely, the Royal Operahouse, the Theatre Royal, Wallner's Theatre, the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater, and the Victoria; three of the second class; and two of the third.

They asked him—he was not averse to games of chance—if trente-et-quarante was played at Wiesbaden. "I heard it was," he replied, "but to reach the room you had to pass three others where there were roulette lay-outs. I never was able to penetrate that far."

The Lord Mayor has accepted the offer of Mdme Liebhart to set aside the proceeds of one night's performance at the successful concerts now being held at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, in aid of the Indian Famine Fund. His lordship has signified his intention of being present on the occasion.

Karl Georg Lickl, the first to introduce and popularise the harmonium in Germany, died on the 3rd ult. at Vienna, where he was born in 1801. He composed a great number of pieces for his favourite instrument, as well as for the piano, besides several operas, the title of one of the latter being Faust.

Mr Carl Rosa's Opera Company have been playing, with success, at Newcastle-on-Tyne. On the opening night the Trovatore attracted a large audience. Mdme Blanche Cole was the heroine, and Mr Packard, Manrico. The orchestra and chorus were everything that could be wished, under the experienced guidance of Mr Carl Rosa, who conducted.

The Philadelphia Permanent Exhibition was open for the first time upon a Sunday, on the 19th of August, when upwards of 10,000 of the working classes and business men, for whom it was opened, entered the building. There was a grand sacred concert given in the great music hall, which was crowded. Everything was conducted in an orderly manner; no machinery was at work, and no sales were allowed.

THE EVIL EYE.—The models employed for the picture which Mr Holman Hunt has in hand at Jerusalem took it into their heads that they suffered from effects of the "evil eye," and, pending recovery, declined to sit again. A new set of models has been engaged, and so the work goes on without much delay. Mr Hunt has suffered from attacks of fever. These incidents have delayed his return to England for a few weeks.—Athenæum.

THE NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD.—The surplus arising out of the National Eisteddfod at Carnarvon last month is upwards of £1,000, a pecuniary success said to be without precedent in Eisteddfodic annals. According to previous arrangement, the moiety goes to the University College of Wales, probably for the foundation of a Carnarvon scholarship, and the balance will be devoted towards local objects, the selection of which has yet to be made. As next year's National Eisteddfod is to be held out of Wales—at Birkenhead—the Principality rests content with a Provincial Eisteddfod upon a large scale, and Menai Bridge has been selected as its locale.

The observations of Mr Brinley Richards on National Music in his lectures and concerts are instructive from many points of view. They will do much towards preserving the vitality of our ancient music, enabling us to perceive what is most graceful, beautiful and elevating in it. They will contribute to silence throughout the country the echoes of that low, tasteless, sensational music emanating from the atmosphere of music halls. They will prove conclusively the high claims of Wales to a national music of the greatest antiquity. It is in connection with this branch of his subject that Mr Richards best displays his learning and critical judgment. If his audiences were composed of musicians only he could establish the truth of his assertions in favour of our music and musical instruments from the nature of the earliest Welsh compositions themselves; but, as every one is not able to understand evidence of that description, Mr Richards shows himself prepared to decide the question by an appeal to history, from which standpoint his case is unanswerable. The great disadvantage under which Welshmen labour, in treating of ancient Celtic questions, is that, whether they speak of Gaelic or Cymric, they hardly ever prove themselves possessed of special knowledge from other than Cymric sources. This applies even to the late Thomas Stephens, of Merthyr. If we except Mr Rhys, Celtic Professor at Oxford, perhaps Mr Richards is the only Welshman who can look at Irish and Scottish antiquities as intelligently and impartially as at those of Wales, and the result is apparent in the spirit and tone which pervade his remarks. How rationally he accounts for the characteristics which distinguish Irish and Scotch music from Welsh, by showing us the very different principle on which the Gaelic and Cymric bards respectively strung and played their harps! Mr Stephens, whose learning on some subjects we all admire, made a clumsy job of this in his Literature of the Cymry by speaking of Irish tunes as being composed for bagpipes,—just as if the harp had been in remote ages the national instrument of the Cymry rather than of the Gael! Other races besides the various families of the Celtic stock, and more especially the people of England, owe gratitude to Mr Richards for the justice which has at length been done to their old National Music.—Cardiff Journal.

NAPLES.—The artists engaged for the San Carlo are Signore Teresina Singer, Giovannoni-Zacchi, De Giuli-Borsi; Signori Capponi, Patierno, Aramburo, tenors; Signori Medica, Belletti, M. Melchissédec, barytones; Signori Gasparini and Padovani, basses.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 6d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

" DEC. 1st, 8th, 15th.	" APRIL 6th, 13th, 20th, 27th.
1878. FEB. 9th, 16th, 23rd.	" MAY 4th, 11th.

Mr MANN'S BENEFIT CONCERT will take place on the 18th May. The Band and Oboes will be of the same strength and efficiency as in former Seasons.

Conductor... Mr AUGUST MANN.

Transferable Stalls for the Twenty-five Concerts, Two Guineas; Numbered Stall for a Single Concert, Half-a-Crown; Gallery Seats, unnumbered, One Shilling—all exclusive of admission to the Palace.

In announcing the Twenty-second Series of the Saturday Concerts the Directors beg to state that the programmes will be selected, as before, with the desire to present the old-established and ever-fresh favourites of the orchestra with all attainable excellence of performance, and also to bring forward such novelties as from their known merit or from the reputation of the composer, may claim to be introduced or repeated to an English audience. The experience of many years has shown that Beethoven's works possess an inexhaustible attraction for all classes of concert-goers; the greater number of his Symphonies will therefore be again performed during the series, together with Overtures, Concertos, and other pieces of that immortal composer. Of Mozart, two Symphonies are proposed, the well-known and favourite E flat, and that in D—styled the "Hafner"—which would be equally favourite if it were equally well known, and which has not been played at these concerts since 1865; also a set of Variations for Strings and Horns, recently revived by the Vienna Philharmonic with great success. Of Haydn, the Grand Symphony in B flat, No. 9 of the Salomon set, and that in G, quaintly known as Letter V, last played here in 1872. Of Schubert, it is intended again to have recourse to those MS. treasures which were acquired by the Crystal Palace Company in 1868, and have not yet been exhausted; to repeat the Tragic Symphony, last played in 1871, and to perform that in B flat (No. 2), which has not yet been given in public. Of Mendelssohn, the ever-fresh Italian Symphony, the Lobgesang, the music to Shakspeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, and a Fugue for Strings from a MS. Symphony, not before performed. Of Schumann, the Symphonies in E flat and D minor. Of Rossini, the Ballet Music from Mosé in Egitto, a novelty to most English ears. Of Sterndale Bennett, the music to Ajazz (his last work), the May Queen, and one of the Piano-forte Concertos. Of Berlioz, the Sinfonie caractéristique, Harold en Italie, founded on Byron's Childe Harold—for the first time at these Concerts.

Reverting to the older classics, it is intended to bring forward a Concerto by Sebastian Bach, for solo Violin, two Flutes, and Orchestra, probably never before performed in this country; and by Handel, a Grand Concerto (the Symphony of Handel's day), No. 12, for full Orchestra, and the Concerto, No. 2, for solo Oboe and Orchestra, both of which are virtually novelties in the modern concert-room. Also, by Purcell, "The Yorkshire Feast Song," for Solos, Chorus, and Orchestra, as published by the Purcell Society—the production of which last season, though announced, was unavoidably postponed, owing to the parts not being ready.

Of the composers of our own day, we hope to include a new Cantata by Professor Macfarren, entitled The Lady of the Lake; by Mr HATTON, the Sacred Drama (in other words, the Oratorio) of Hezekiah (for the first time); by Sir Julius Benedict, a Concerto for Piano-forte and Orchestra, and the Overture to the Prince of Homburg; by Mr Prout, a new MS. Symphony in G minor; and by Mr Arthur Sullivan (for the first in London), his new Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Henry VIII.

Also a new Concert Overture by Mr C. V. Stanford; Mr Gadsby's Overture to Andromeda, and Oboes from Alceste, &c., &c.

Brahms' Symphony, which was produced in MS. with so much favour at the close of last season, and is now printed, will be repeated; also his "Song of Destiny," and his Variations on a Theme of Haydn's, neither of which has been given here since 1875. Of Raff, the "Waldsinfonie" ("In the forest") has been selected, a work not yet produced at these Concerts. Of Liszt, a Rhapsodie (No. 4) for full Orchestra, equally new to this country. Of Rubinstein, we shall repeat the Ocean Symphony; and of Wagner, the Walkürenritt, and the Death Music from the Ring of the Nibelung, and also, for the first time, the Introduction to the Third Act of the Meistersinger. Of Reinecke, an orchestral "In Memoriam," as yet new to England; and of Hoffman and Goldmark, two rising stars of Germany, specimens will be given, including the "Ländliche Hochzeit," or "Country Wedding," of the latter, an orchestral work of great interest.

Of Saint-Saëns, it is intended to produce La Rouet d'Omphale and La Jeunesse d'Hercule, two orchestral works of which report speaks highly. Of Gounod, the Ballet and other pieces from Cinq-Mars. Of Verdi, the Requiem; and of Costa, "The Dream," a Serenata, not performed here since 1858, &c., &c. The Subscribers are respectfully informed that, in addition to the Compositions named in the above résumé, many others—both established favourites and novelties—will be inserted as opportunity offers.

The ORCHESTRA will be maintained at its well-known standard of efficiency, under the following able Principals, several of whom will perform Solos during the series of Concerts:—

First Violins—J. WATSON; Second Violins—A. REYNOLDS; Violas—VAN HAMME; Cello—R. REED; Contra-Bass—PROGATZKY; Flute—ALFRED WELLS; Oboe—DUBBUCC; Clarinet—CLINTON; Bassoon—WOTTON; Horn—WENDLANDT; Trumpet—WILMORE; Trombones—CHATTAWAY and PHASEY; Drums—J. SMITH.

Engagements will, as in former years, be made with the most eminent Artists of London and the Continent, and the Subscribers may rest assured that every effort will be made to maintain the Concerts at the same point of interest and efficiency which has commanded their favour in former seasons.

By order,
S. FLOOD PAGE, Secretary and Manager.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From the Times.)

Leeds, Wednesday, Sept. 19.

The success of the Festival three years ago—first since the not-forgotten meeting of 1858, when the new Town Hall was solemnly opened in the presence of Her Majesty the Queen, and the conductor was the late Sterndale Bennett, who composed his universally popular May Queen for the occasion—led to a proposition that it should be constituted triennial. This being unanimously approved, the second “Leeds Triennial Musical Festival” was announced in due time, and the rehearsals for most of the principal works included in the programme, occupying the whole of Monday morning and evening and Tuesday up to 3 p.m., have already been held.

Besides the attraction belonging to performances for the greater part of unsurpassed excellence, the fact that the profits go to the aid of the medical charities of the town—the General Infirmary, the Public Dispensary, the House of Recovery or Fever Hospital, and the Hospital for Women and Children—gives to the Leeds Festival a special claim to consideration. In 1874, £1,000 was divided among them, and it is hoped that the issue of this fresh experiment may lead to equally advantageous results. With a fund of £11,000, guaranteed by between 300 and 400 gentlemen, the “Executive Committee”—themselves all guarantors—have solid ground to work upon, and it is believed that their arrangements have afforded general satisfaction. They have engaged an orchestra of more than 100 performers, nearly all well-known artists, with Sir Michael Costa (which means experienced generalship) as conductor in chief, the direction of two new works composed expressly for the Festival, for reasons that have been more than once explained, being confided to other hands. The leading “vocalists,” comprising Mdle Albani, Mdmes Edith Wynne, Osgood, and Sinico (sopranos); Mdme Patey, Mdle Redeker, and Mrs Mudie-Bolingbroke (contraltos); Messrs E. Lloyd and W. Shakespeare (tenors); Signor Foli, Messrs C. Tovey and Santley (basses), make up as strong and as efficient a force as could be desired. Last, and by no means least, we have the chorus of Yorkshire voices, the effect of whose singing in 1874 is still vividly remembered, and who will enjoy chances enough this week of maintaining their acknowledged supremacy. They now consist of 78 sopranos, 41 contraltos, 39 altos, 76 tenors, and 68 basses—in all 300 and upwards, among them being some 40 or 50 “amateurs,” who, in these parts, where choral singing, especially of sacred music, is studied with such persistent love and ardour, are not a bit the worse for being only amateurs. They will have to be proved in Mendelssohn’s Elijah and Walpurgis Night, Handel’s Solomon, J. S. Bach’s Magnificat in D, Mozart’s Requiem, and Beethoven’s Mount of Olives, besides Mr Walter Austin’s dramatic cantata, The Fire King, and Professor Macfarren’s new oratorio, Joseph, even a greater trial of their strength than his John the Baptist, with which, at the last Festival, they so fairly won distinction. That they will again come forth with honour from the ordeal, few are inclined to doubt. Noblesse oblige, and the Yorkshire chorus singers have earned a repute that cannot afford to be trifled with.

All the works above named have been rehearsed in whole or in part, and more than ordinary care was bestowed by Sir Michael Costa on the Magnificat of Bach and the Requiem of Mozart. The rehearsal of Mr Austin’s cantata was directed by Mr Wingham, of the Royal Academy of Music, and that of Professor Macfarren’s oratorio—to which also the utmost attention has been naturally given, as to the chief novelty of the Festival—by Mr Walter Cecil Macfarren, who did so much last year at Birmingham towards the adequate performance and genuine success of his eminent brother’s second oratorio, The Resurrection.

As a brief outline of the leading features announced in the week’s programme has already appeared in The Times, recapitulation now is uncalled for; but it is fair to add that the selections for the two miscellaneous evening concerts offer both variety and interest. While the entertainment of those who chiefly delight in operatic airs and ballads indiscriminate is well looked after, and good opportunities of winning applause are vouchsafed to the principal vocalists, there is also some more substantial matter for the consideration of amateurs who care not much more greatly for such things than did Othello for music “that might be heard.” Joachim Raff’s symphony in G minor (decidedly his best), with such a magnificent orchestra as that under Sir Michael Costa’s control, will be heard with more than curiosity, and so will the late Sir Sterndale Bennett’s poetic and beautiful overture, Die Walknymph—both included in Friday’s programme. Up to this time we are promised, as far as the weather is concerned, another Gloucester week. If the promise holds out, so much the better for the second “Leeds Triennial Festival.”

A worthier commencement of the Festival than to-day’s Elijah could not possibly have been desired. Two performances of this most popular of modern oratorios can alone in our remembrance be compared with it—that of 1846, when Elijah was first produced at Birmingham under the direction of Mendelssohn himself, and that of 1855, at another Birmingham Festival, with Mr Costa, now Sir Michael Costa, as conductor. That any one fortunate enough to have been present on these memorable occasions can have forgotten the impression created is not likely; and when it is added that the performance of to-day was in most respects on a par with either of them, it may be readily understood that nothing short of first-rate excellence distinguished it from beginning to end. All that had been predicated of the Leeds chorus was fully carried out. But to speak in general terms—from the opening of the impressive and masterly orchestral interlude, separating the prophecy of the three years’ drought, “As God the Lord of Israel liveth,” from the chorus of the distressed and supplicating multitude, “Help, Lord!—wilt Thou quite destroy us?” the conviction that a performance of more than ordinary merit would ensue seemed to be regarded as a matter of course. Sir Michael Costa was in his happiest mood; and this was manifested, over and over again, by the uniform adherence to Mendelssohn’s own tempi in chorus after chorus, air after air, and so forth. More strictly followed they could not have been. The tranquil choruses, to which a subdued utterance and rigid attention to light and shade are indispensable, were not less satisfactory than those fiercer outbursts which call imperatively for precision of attack, boldness of delivery, and marked accentuation. The result throughout was a choral interpretation of Mendelssohn’s noblest composition, not less congenial in a poetic than satisfactory in a mechanical sense. When the glorious climax to Part I, “Thanks be to God! He laveth the thirsty land,” was over, a burst of applause (up to this point applause having been judiciously dispensed with) testified to the unqualified delight of an audience little short of 2,000 in number—an audience crowding the vast hall in every part. Here one might have thought the climax had been reached. Not so, however. The choral singing in the second part was in no way inferior to that which uniformly marked the first; and from “Be not afraid” to “Then shall your light shine forth,” the emphatic peroration, there was scarcely a point open to unfavourable criticism. Sopranos, contraltos, altos, tenors, and basses vied with other, not so much in friendly rivalry as in a determined resolve to produce a perfectly harmonious combination, so as to render the text of Mendelssohn just as Mendelssohn would have rejoiced to hear it. And they succeeded—higher praise than which could hardly be accorded to these enthusiastic Yorkshire singers. The leading vocal parts in Elijah were one and all assigned to artists who knew how to appreciate and interpret them. Mr Santley, who sang the music of the Prophet from the introductory recitative to the final air which precedes the chorus describing Elijah’s ascent to Heaven in a fiery chariot, has seldom exhibited his remarkable declamatory powers and his mastery over all the gradations of expression to more signal advantage. Mr Edward Lloyd undertook all the most important music allotted to the tenor voice, and was equally fortunate in the two airs which give deep significance to a part otherwise comparatively subordinate. In the first part of the oratorio—if oratorio this Bible musical drama may justly be styled—Mdme Edith Wynne was soprano, and that rising young singer Mrs Mudie-Bolingbroke, contralto. The former created her strongest impression in the duet between the Widow and Elijah, the introductory solo of which, "What have I to do with thee, O man of God?" was rendered with truly impassioned feeling. The latter showed genuine taste in her delivery of her plaintive air, "Woe unto them who forsake Him," which comes immediately after the furious denunciation of the Prophet, "Is not His word like a fire?" In the second part the soprano was Mdle Albani, who gave the superb admonition, "Hear ye, Israel," better, if possible, with more resolute expression, more careful observance of detail, than at Gloucester a fortnight since, and in the magnificent Sanctus, "Holy, holy, holy!" created the same impression as before. Mdme Patey, the contralto, among other things, sang the consoling and truly devotional air, "O rest in the Lord," so well that there was an unmistakable desire on the part of the audience to hear it again, but Sir Michael Costa, with the judgment for which he is deservedly noted, lent an unwilling ear to the demand, and went on directly with the exquisitely melodious chorus, "He that shall endure to the end shall be saved," which is as legitimately its sequel as the chorus, "He watching over Israel," is the sequel to the unaccompanied trio, "Lift thine eyes to the mountains." For disregard to unreasonable demands Sir Michael is not to be blamed, but to be praised, and it would be well if other conductors imitated his example. The oratorio was preceded, as usual on such occasions, by the National Anthem. To night The Fire King, a new cantata by Mr Walter Austin, was performed, and much applauded.

(BY TELEGRAPH.)

Thursday, Sept. 20.

The performance to-night was exclusively devoted to Handel's Solomon. This magnificent composition, although produced at the age of sixty-three, immediately before Theodora, the great Saxon musician's antepenultimate effort of the kind, deserves beyond question the first place among what are most appropriately denominated the "Sacred Musical Dramas" of its author. The text furnished by Dr Morell, or whoever it may happen to have been, is mediocre stuff at the best. Nevertheless, Handel, inspired by his theme, breathed life into the spiritless words, thus immortalising that which but for him would have scarcely outlived a day. But now is not the time to speak of Solomon, the merits of which are familiar to all possessing a taste for the special branch of art manifestation to which it belongs. What calls for immediate notice is the performance of to-night—such a performance as Handel himself could never by any chance have heard, and, to speak plainly, such a performance as neither London nor Birmingham has the means of providing. If the reason for such marked excellence is demanded, the answer is not far to seek. It is only requisite to point to the chorus, unquestionably the finest in Great Britain, and it may be added, without much fear of contradiction, in Europe. The Elijah of Mendelssohn did much to warrant this opinion. The Walpurgis Night, of the same composer, to-day went far to confirm it, but Solomon this evening placed it beyond the possibility of a doubt.

The opportunities afforded in Solomon for the exhibition of choral singing in all the varieties of shade and colour are abundant. The oratorio, divided into three parts, is stamped in each section with a strong individuality; and how Handel has made this subservient to his purpose it is needless to say. Like a consummate artist, he has seized each characteristic, reflecting it in his music with graphic truth and elaborating it with masterly skill. To the Leeds singers every chorus came like some old and loved acquaintance; not merely was the execution in every instance as nearly perfect as could be wished, but the spirit of each was clearly felt and as emphatically conveyed. The triumphal choruses, such as "Your harps and cymbals," "From the censer," and "Praise the Lord with harp and tongue," were not more remarkable for precision of accent and truly harmonious combination than the softer ones, like "May no rash intruder" and "Music, spread thy voice around," for delicacy and nice gradation, or those of deeper import, of which "Draw the tear from hopeless love" is an incomparable example for real earnestness of expression. When, in addition to all this, it is stated for almost invariable correctness of intonation the choir was just as noticeable as for other essential qualities, enough has been said to justify the praise ungrudgingly and unanimously bestowed. The effect produced upon the audience was unmistakable, and Sir Michael Costa, who must have been proud to direct the performance of singers so exceptionally endowed and so admirably trained for his use by Mr Broughton, the indefatigable Leeds Chorus-master, was compelled against his usual custom to repeat "May no rash intruder" and "Shake the dome," in obedience to an irresistible demand from the audience. It must at present suffice to add that the leading solo vocalists were Mdmes Edith Wynne, Osgood, and Patey, and Messrs Shakespeare and Foli, who, it will be understood, were thoroughly competent to the task assigned to them, and helped to give additional interest to a performance with which little, if any, fault could reasonably be found. The orchestra was, from the overture to the end, all that could be wished, and Sir Michael Costa never conducted with more energy and hearty goodwill. Professor Macfarren's new oratorio, Joseph, is to be given to-morrow.

DEATH OF MR HENRY COMPTON.

The long suffering of this excellent comedian from an incurable malady has been so widely known that few will be surprised at the announcement of his decease. For some months past all hope of his recovery had ceased to be entertained, and, after a short period of unconsciousness, he passed peacefully away on Saturday night, at the age of 72, dying from internal cancer. Mr Henry Mackenzie, who adopted the name of Compton when he entered the theatrical profession, was born in 1805, and went through a long probation in the provinces before he came direct from the York circuit to the Lyceum Theatre, where he made his first appearance as Robin in the musical farce of The Waterman, in July, 1837. He joined Mr W. J. Hammond at Drury Lane in the succeeding year, and was afterwards engaged by Mr Macready for the same establishment. He was a great favourite at the Princess's Theatre under the management of Mr J. M. Maddox, and at the Olympic when the elder Mr William Farren was lessee. Subsequently he became a member of the Haymarket company, and so remained for a long period, but finally severed his connection with that theatre to support Mr H. J. Montague in his managerial speculation at the Globe. Mr Compton's last engagement in London was at the Lyceum, where he played the Gravedigger in Hamlet during the long run of the play two seasons ago. The complimentary benefit he received at Drury Lane Theatre on the 1st of last March realised a very large sum, and was a strong proof of his professional popularity, and the high esteem in which he was personally held. As an actor perfectly original in his style, and possessing a fund of dry, quiet humour that never failed to minister to the amusement of the playgoing public, Mr Compton will be long remembered as among the prominent comedians of the modern stage. In Touchstone, and as the representative of other comic characters in the plays of Shakespeare, he attained marked distinction.

On Wednesday the funeral of Mr Compton was solemnised at Brompton Cemetery before a large assembly of the relatives and professional friends of the deceased. The funeral procession left 12, Stanford Road, Kensington, between eleven and twelve. Among the mourners were the four sons of the deceased. Among other friends present at the cemetery there were Mr Gaston Murray, Mr W. Tinsley, Mr H. Cox, Mr Maclean, Mr D. Rignold, Mr A. Thompson, Mr Ryder, Mr and Mrs Alfred Bishop, Mr J. Dewar, Mr W. S. Gilbert, Mr T. Swinburne, Mr H. Ashley, Mr F. Strange, Mrs W. H. Liston, Mr Billington, Mr Howe, Mr Clifford Cooper, Mr Swanborough, and Mr E. Terry. When the coffin was about to be lowered into the grave, many persons pressed forward to look at and throw wreaths of flowers on it. The nameplate bore the following inscription:—"Charles Mackenzie, professionally known as Henry Compton, died 15th Sept., 1877, aged 72 years."

DUSSELDORF.—The Stadttheater was opened on the 12th inst. with Gounod's Faust.

A Festival Sermon.

The obvious and very natural aspect which our present appeal commonly assumes is that of the deep necessity of those in whom we are now interested. And this I should be the very last to leave unnoticed in a sermon such as the present. Poverty and necessity are perhaps now more sharply trying the widows and orphans of our clergy than in the early days of these Festivals. None but those who have the sad duty of reading each fully-authenticated story of the scanty means of subsistence, a subsistence sometimes wholly made up of charities, that is brought up before the dispensers of funds such as the present, can form any real conception of the struggles of the clergyman's widow, especially when left with only partially-educated and dependent children. It has often been to me a subject of wonder when analysing, as it is often my duty, these saddening facts, and reading the outward stories of these lives of suffering and privation, how the barest necessities of life could possibly be secured. Often the sad story, dark enough in its ordinary outlines, is made still more dark by that which only too commonly finds a place in these homely annals—sickness and declining health. I believe if it were not for the generosity of the greater part of our medical men, a generosity not always known but not less constantly manifested, and a generosity which I am rejoiced to have this opportunity of publicly acknowledging on behalf of the poorer members of my own profession—were it not for this, I verily believe that in many and many a case life itself could not be maintained without the interposition of the cold hand, the necessarily cold hand, of public relief.

These sad details we commonly are glad to pass over. There is a pain in specifying them; there is a pain in hearing them. But let no one for a moment suppose either that they are only to be observed in exceptional cases, or that they have any tendency to diminish in number and frequency. Believe me when I simply say, from my own experience, that many as are the charitable institutions, many as are the funds, general and local, which are available for the widows and orphans of our clergy, the cases of suffering and pressure are distinctly increasing, and increasing too at a rate which often fills me with the gravest anxiety.

A moment's thought will remind anyone why it is so. Pluralities have been done away with; poorly-endowed and populous district parishes have been largely called into existence; curates have become more urgently needed; money has declined in value, and the scanty professional income has become less and less able to bear any deduction for a provision for those left behind when the hard-worked life may have ended. It is, I fear, certainly true that the utter inability to commence or maintain a life assurance in any degree sufficient to shelter the family in the case of contingency, or to provide for the education of children, is more and more felt in our clerical profession. The scanty income, especially if there be a family, will not bear the deduction: and so it only too often happens that the married clergyman carries about with him a bitter load of care and anxiety as to the future of those nearest and dearest to him, if his own life should not be spared to them. Yes, my dear friends, many a parting scene has been rendered more bitter and agonising from the sad knowledge that those weeping round the dying bed will soon have to rest entirely on charities such as our own, or on that generous local effort which our liberal laity are ever ready to make, in any case of real necessity, for the helpless ones thus left as it were to the general fatherhood of God. Such cases are not unknown to me. I am drawing no ideal pictures; I am speaking, alas, from the sad experiences of an official position, and from a knowledge which, from time to time, has been most painfully brought home to me. So let no one think or believe that the necessity is not as real as it has ever been in the hundred and fifty years that have come and gone since this beneficent Charity first came into existence. Nay, the necessity is greater, and greater in some respects—thank God that I can say it—from a noble and even heart-touching reason. Our clergy work more bravely and self-devotedly; and, in the crowded city or large straggling village, many a true life is shortened by the earnestness with which that life is given up to Christ and His Gospel. I see men sometimes fading under my very eyes, and, when I look into the wistful careworn face of the wife or of the elder children, I read a tale of simple and bitter sorrow that wants no romance or idealism to bring it home to any true or sympathising heart. Want, then, there is, deep and increasing want, want which our charitable offerings may in some degree remove. But it is well to remember that this is not all. There is something in the case of widows and orphans, especially of our country clergy, that seems to add to the force of our present appeal, and to move us to do all that it may be possible for us to do to make a sad lot in some degree more endurable. All who know much of clerical life know that to the widows and orphans of our faithful clergy there are sorrows sharper, and shadows deeper, than are to be found perhaps, in other professions. It is not only the broken-up home, and such a home, such a truly ideal Christian home, as that of the country rectory, nestling beneath the church tower in one of those sweet valleys not unknown to some of those whom I am now addressing; it is not only the broken-up home and the soon scattered family, parting and separately struggling for a livelihood, and never to meet in the old home again, that add the most sombre tints to the sad picture we are now contemplating. Alas, all poor mortal life in every profession has its examples of these forms of sorrow. But over and above these there is, as it seems to me, the still deeper sorrow of the happiest and holiest work in which a Christian family can be united being broken off, and by the nature of the case broken off irrevocably. All the happily-moulding influences, especially on the younger members of the family, that are elements and factors in the home life of the English parsonage—the happy work with the village choir, the night school, the Scripture class, the sympathising visit to the sick and suffering—all these most happy aspects of Christian life, this gentle united labour for Christ's sake, all brought to their close, and with them that Christian sunshine which, if rightly welcomed and appreciated, exercises such a powerful influence on the households and families of our clergy. It is the breaking-up of this common work for God, carried on under such happy circumstances, that seems to me to commend the case of those for whom I am pleading still more cogently to the generous supporters of these charitable Festivals.

We are met together under circumstances of gladness and joyfulness, some of us to drink deeply of those æsthetic pleasures to which the sacred sounds that will soon be heard in this noble Cathedral will so largely minister—all of us to take some pleasant part in our triennial Festival. Let us, at a time like this, not put away from us such thoughts as those which I have last suggested to you. True it is, that nothing we can do can bring back again all those happy influences for good which it has pleased a Father of love and mercy should, in this case and that case, cease in the particular forms under which we have been regarding them. Our offerings cannot re-unite, under the circumstances of the happy past, the members of the sundered family; we cannot give back to them the happiness and the blessings of the common work for God in the parish from which now they are separated. But we can help, and mightily help, the permanence of the good influences of those bygone days. We can help the boy to bare bravely his part in the struggle of life, and, either in the public school or in the University, to gain for himself that future of usefulness and independence which, as one of the best boasts of our country ever reminds us, lies freely open before each earnest lad who will faithfully use the good powers which God in His mercy has vouchsafed to him. We can help the girl by timely grants which may secure to her that best of gifts and dowries, a good Christian education. We can help the widow, and verily bring back to her something of past sunshine by aiding her in her efforts for those dependent on her; we can encourage and gladden middle life, and largely minister—perhaps this is the most popularly-known of the aspects of our Charity—to the needs and cares of declining days, and, through the blessings of the Holy Ghost, make a life tried by many a sorrow in its closing years peaceful and thankful. And we can thus cast one look forward into the mysterious future which our text has suggested to us, and perhaps be permitted to realise that great thought which it seems to shadow out, that thought which connects us and those we aid by some bond more enduring than that of earthly sympathy and earthly benevolence. It is one of those thoughts which will not bear to be very sharply formulated; it is one of those half-veiled messages that nevertheless seem to give to every true and generous heart some fresh impulse to deeds of love and mercy; it is a call to act generously, not only for what now is, but for what may be—that so at length when all things fail, but when also all shadows shall be removed, aiders and aided may meet in that fair land where reigns the King in His beauty, and be received by Him in His blessed and everlasting habitations.

And now I again and lastly commend to you this great and—may I not now say it—solemnly-interesting cause. Much more might have been said, but this is one of the cases in which the Christian preacher will do well to suggest rather than amplify. Every one of you knows well that out of the experiences which one such as your present preacher must have largely acquired many a sad story might have been brought forward, many a painful trial might have been specified. But this I have not cared to do. I know well that I am addressing, not only old friends but ready and helpful sympathisers, and I feel persuaded that the bounty of this week will be worthy of the praise with which it will be associated. Our wise Hooker tells us that there are three elements that are to be looked for in every Festival. One of these, the rest that belongs to the true ecclesiastical Festival, cannot by the nature of the case form an element in this busy, but still I trust innocently busy, week. But the other two elements which I have mentioned, the bounty that freely gives for Christ's sake, even as it has received, and the Praise that ascribes all to the dear God and Father who gave us all things, even His own beloved Son—these two elements, I trust, will be present largely and abounding, and will make this festival one more fruitful in good works and charitable offerings, and, let me not fail to pray, better remembered for the religious emotions it may awaken and deepen in the soul, than any which have preceded it.

It would be sad indeed if the songs of praise which will soon be heard, with all the solemn influences which this noble building so largely ministers, were to be heard only to please the outward ear, and not to raise the soul nearer to God, and to evoke from it its unuttered but no less deeply-felt adoration. No; my earnest prayer is that to you, and to all who come within these venerable walls, this week may bear its spiritual blessings; that the emotions of the hour may permanently influence the sentiments of the life; that reverence may become deeper, and love warmer and truer. This Festival week, rightly used, offers great spiritual opportunities. May you and all that come into this House of God be made truly and vividly to realise His adorable presence! May you listen as feeling that He is very nigh; may you be permitted inwardly to adore as seeing Him that is invisible!

While the stewards passed round the Cathedral and made the collection the well-known offertory hymn, "O Lord of Heaven and earth and sea," was sung to Dr Dykes's popular tune "Almsgiving," and the Bishop then pronounced the benediction. As the congregation left, Mr S. G. Hayward played one of Bach's famous fugues in a masterly manner.

Appointment by Favour.

(From the "Norfolk Chronicle.")

The announcement that the Dean had appointed Mr Thomas Craddock, Mus. Bac., Oxford, at present organist of the parish church of Torquay, and formerly organist of St John's, Paddington, where Dr Goulburn was vicar, to the position of organist and choir-master of Norwich Cathedral, was received with surprise and regret throughout the city and county. It was supposed that the long services of Dr Bunnett—twenty-eight years—as assistant organist, irrespective of his qualifications as a musician, amongst the first of his class, would have commanded his appointment to a post to which he has no doubt for many years looked forward, and the intimation conveyed to him by the Dean that he should no longer require his services, came with as much surprise upon the public as upon Dr Bunnett. The appointment of organist to the cathedral is vested in the Dean; but it is one in which the public who attend the cathedral have a great concern, that we should have thought Dr Goulburn would have hesitated ere he set aside the wishes of the Mayor, magistrates, leading citizens of Norwich, and county residents, who signed a strong memorial in favour of Dr Bunnett's appointment. It may be that the appointment of Mr Craddock was a fulfilment of a pledge given when Dr Goulburn left the vicarage of St John's, Paddington. If so, however we may respect the Dean's observance of his word, we cannot exculpate him from blame in not having informed Dr Bunnett that it was his intention, on Dr Buck's retirement, to appoint Mr Craddock. He has laid himself open to the charge of suffering Dr Bunnett for eleven years to go on as assistant organist, with the expectation of getting the higher office when a vacancy occurred, when a word as to his future intentions would have enabled Dr Bunnett to seek that promotion in another place to which his talents entitle him. As it is, he has sacrificed the best part of his life in probation for a post now refused him, but which he was entitled to expect not only on account of gratuitous services for twenty-eight years as deputy, and practically chief, organist—for during that time he has never received a farthing for his services either from Dr Buck or the Dean—but from the confidence earned amongst his fellow citizens. We do not presume to enter into the motives which led the Dean to ignore Dr Bunnett's services and the memorial of the Mayor and citizens of Norwich and inhabitants of the county; they rest with himself. If he from the first contemplated giving the appointment to Mr Craddock he has been guilty of great cruelty to Dr Bunnett; whereas, if his decision is of recent date, it shows a disregard for the opinion of the Norwich citizens and county residents, which not even a Dean can afford to indulge with impunity. Of Dr Bunnett's qualifications for the post it is hardly necessary to speak. He has obtained the degree of Mus. Doc. at Cambridge—not by favour, but by good work—and it is not too much to say that he is the equal if not superior of any who have occupied the post before him. It is unnecessary to say more on this point than that for twenty-eight years he has virtually been organist of the cathedral. We do not suppose there ever was a case in which undisputed claims were so thoroughly ignored, and Dean Goulburn has much to answer for. This is not the case of a petty appointment of parochial organist—vested, possibly, in the incumbent—but is one of a public character, and the Dean had no right to ignore the expressed wish of the public signified in the memorial presented to him. It is said that, even up to a recent period after Dr Buck had resigned, the Dean invited Dr Bunnett's opinion as to the specifications of a new organ for the cathedral. We can scarcely believe this, as it puts the Dean in a worse light than at present. He is, we believe, at Malvern enjoying his holidays, but we cannot think his pleasure will be enhanced by the reflection that he has done an injustice to a worthy and talented Norwich citizen, even while serving a former friend and protégé.

BROOKLYN (U.S.).—A series of Garden Concerts, on the model of Thomas's Central Garden Concerts in New York, was inaugurated on the 11th August, under the direction of the editor of the New York Kunst-Kritik, Herr Emil Seifert, of Berlin. The orchestra, forty strong, consists of members of the New York Philharmonic Society and ex-members of Thomas's Orchestra. The opening concert attracted a very numerous audience, in which the German element largely predominated. Herr Seifert was loudly applauded.

VIENNA.—The prospectus for the next season at the Imperial Operahouse is not yet settled, though the contrary may be the case before these lines are published. Sig. Merelli is shortly expected here to arrange with Herr Jauner the details of the Italian season. The only thing at present definitely fixed is the engagement of Mad. Christine Nilsson, who will appear in various operas during the month of February, and sing one or two characters, besides Elsa, in German. With regard to Mad. Adelina Patti, that gifted lady, it is reported, being about to make a starring tour through Germany, will accept an engagement here. Sig. Merelli has come to a provisional agreement on this point with Herr Strakosch, who is acting for Mad. Patti. Mad. Trebelli, Signori Masini and Zucchini, will, probably, be included in Sig. Merelli's company. Negotiations, also, have been opened with Mad. Ethelka Gerster, Mdle Albani, and M. Faure.—The Komische Oper is not to be demolished, after all. Herr A. Swoboda has become its manager, having occupied the same position for the limited liability company which built and first opened it. He will not commence his season immediately, however, as he requires some time to form his company and arrange the plan of his campaign. It is to be hoped that he will be more successful on his own account than he was on that of the unfortunate shareholders.—The Society of the Friends of Music have issued their report for the last year on the Conservatory of Music and Representative Art. From this report we take the annexed facts. The board of management of the society consists of 18 members, among whom may be mentioned the chairman, Baron von Hofmann, Imperial Minister of Finance, two Imperial Capellmeister, Herren Herbeck and Hellmesberger, Dr Aug. Schmidt, Dr Standhartner, and Herr L. A. Zellner, the General Secretary. The course of instruction is conducted by a school committee of 11 members, with 47 ordinary, and 6 extraordinary teachers, to whom is added a teacher-substitute. 674 pupils attended the musical, and 42 the dramatic classes, making together 716. Lower Austria (including Vienna) sends 409 pupils; Hungary, 54; Bohemia, 45; Moravia, 38; Transylvania, 20; Galicia, 13; Upper Austria, 10; Carinthia and Styria, 8 each; the Tyrol, 6; Silesia, 4; the Military Frontier and Sclavonia, 3 each; Trieste, 2; and Dalmatia, 1; making a total of 624 subjects of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. The musical classes were attended also by 50 foreign pupils, of whom Russia sent 12; Wallachia, 10; Germany, 9; Italy, 6; Roumania, 5; Wurtemberg and Turkey, 2 each; America, Greece, Sweden, and Switzerland, 1 each. The number of pupils attending respectively the separate classes, were: solo singing, 94; pianoforte as principal subject, 377; as secondary subject, 159; organ, 5; harp, 14; violin, 75; violoncello, 15; double-bass, 10; flute, 11; oboe, 8; clarinet, 6; bassoon, 6; horn, 9; trumpet, 11; trombone, 8; harmony as principal subject, 8; as secondary subject, 134; counterpoint, as principal subject, 1; as secondary subject, 30; composition, as principal subject, 16; as secondary subject, 8; choral singing, as secondary subject, 111. The total number of hours devoted to instruction in the course of the year was 21,054, in addition to the time consumed in extraordinary exercises, pupils' concerts, &c.

Musical Cricket Matches.

THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE LIBRARIES v. HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

This match was played on the Crystal Palace grounds, the Libraries proving the strongest, winning on the first innings by 57 runs; R. Russell, for the Libraries, playing in capital style, carrying his bat out with 62 runs. The following is the score:—

THE REASON WHY.

The result of due enquiries being the certainty that the tenor, M. Capoul, will not be at liberty next spring, the production of M. Ambroise Thomas's Françoise de Rimini has been adjourned. The authors, concurring with M. Halanzier, could not make up their minds to break off, after only the second month, the run of the piece, which will wait for a Paolo who is a free man. It has been calculated that so important a work as Françoise de Rimini could not be ready earlier than the end of next February, and Capoul is due in London on the 1st April. It was not easy to find another tenor, for people in France like to see the characters of a new work created by artists who can really represent them, and Paolo requires, it would appear, a lover who can act as well as sing. The same is true of Francesca. All the other characters might have been most satisfactorily cast, and we believe we may assert that for Mdle Richard was destined the good fortune of creating a most interesting and dramatic page.—L'Entr'acte.

WEIMAR.—During the summer season just passed, the Abbate Franz Liszt gave twelve Musical Matinées at his residence. The following were the more important compositions included in the programmes: "Siegmond's Hämmerlied," and "Siegmond's Liebesgesang" (Herr Ferenczy); "Funeral March" from Die Götterdämmerung, eight-handed pianoforte arrangement by Rupp (the Abbate Franz Liszt, Herren Pöhl, Cönen, and Mdle aus der Ohe); Prize Trio by Napravnik (the Abbate, Herren Kumpel and De Munck); one of Petrarch's Sonnets, Liszt (Mdle Först); "Die drei Zigeuner," Liszt (Mad. Merian); "Walkürenritt," Wagner-Tausig (Mdle Wenzel and Herr Zarebski); Concerto for two Pianos, Rubinstein (Mdle Timanoff and the Abbate); "Islamah," Characteristic Piece for the Piano, by Balakireff (Mdle Timanoff); "Tarantelle" Wieniawski (Herr Sauret and the Abbate); "Walhall-Paraphrase," Wagner-Liszt (Mdle Arends); "Siegfried und der Waldvogel," Wagner-Liszt (Herr Lutter); "Geisterschiff," Tausig (Mdle aus der Ohe); and "Symphoniesatz," Borodin (the Abbate, Herr Zarebski).

MARGATE.

The following is a description of the organ in St John's Church, Margate, built by Gray & Davison. It is the largest organ in the county of Kent, and is larger than the instrument in Canterbury Cathedral, where Mr Lott was formerly assistant organist.

It consists of three manuals, CC to G, the swell throughout; and pedal organ with radiating and concave pedals, CCC to F, two octaves and a fourth.

GREAT ORGAN.
Double Diapason	16 feet.	Twelfth	3 feet.
Open Diapason	8 "	Fifteenth	2 "
Gamba	8 "	Sesquialtra, III. ranks.	"
Clarinet Flute	8 "	Mixture, II. ranks.	"
Principal	4 "	Trumpet	8 "
Harmonic Flute	4 "	Clarion	4 "

SWELL ORGAN.
Lieblich Bourdon	16 feet.	Fifteenth	2 feet.
Keraulophon	8 "	Mixture, III. ranks.	"
Open Diapason	8 "	Oboe	8 "
Stopped Diapason	8 "	Cornopean	8 "
Principal	4 "	Clarion	4 "

CHOIR ORGAN.
Open Diapason	8 feet.	Flute	4 feet.
Dulciana	8 "	Flageolet	2 "
Lieblich Gedacht	8 "	Clarinet and Bassoon	8 "
Gemshorn	4 "

PEDAL ORGAN.
Open Diapason	16 feet.	Violoncello	8 feet.

Seven composition pedals, viz.: 4 to Great Organ, and 3 to Swell.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.—A large audience assembled at the Tyne Theatre, Newcastle, on Friday evening, September 14th, to witness the production of Macfarren's Robin Hood. The opera is one of Mr Macfarren's best, the English character of its dance-music being one of its striking features. As the work was unfolded—writes a local journal—the audience became more and more favourably impressed with its merits, and were unstinting in their praise of the whole production. Mr Packard was Robin Hood, Mdme Blanche Cole, Maid Marian, Mr Ludwig, the Sheriff, and Mr Aynsley Cook, the Sompnour. The parts of Alice, Allandale, Little John, and Much were ably filled by Miss Yorke, and Messrs Lyall, Muller, and Snazelle. The season terminates on Saturday evening with Balfe's Bohemian Girl.

THE NEW NATIONAL OPERA HOUSE.

We believe that many of the promoters no longer expect that the partially erected structure on the Thames Embankment will ever be completed as a National Operahouse, and there is some probability that it will eventually fall into the hands of others and be converted into a grand hotel, for which the site is considered to be exceptionally well adapted. Whatever its ultimate fate may be, it is certain that within the last week or two the unfinished building has been closely examined by surveyors and other experts on behalf of a body of capitalists whose object is to complete it as an hotel. We understand that their opinion is that without disturbing either the external walls of the building or several of those inside, the shell of the building could be adapted to hotel purposes without difficulty, while among other features of the original design the grand and other staircases could be retained. In consequence of this the promoters of the new project are prepared to make an offer to the Opera-house representatives to take over the building in its present condition at a valuation, and then to complete it without further delay as an hotel.—Architect.

MARRIAGE.

On September 13th, at St Peters, Brighton, WILLIAM, son of the late Mr Edwin Ransford, to ELEANOR, daughter of the late Mr Robert Macklin, of Maida Vale.

DEATH.

On the 15th inst, at midnight, at his residence, Dudley House, Ladbroke Road, Redhill, CHARLES POPE HUTCHINGS, Esq., for many years of the Marine Hotel, Hastings, in the seventy-third year of his age. Friends are requested to accept this intimation.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.'s, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyll Street (First Floor). It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1877.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—All is vanity, says the preacher. So it is, and the assertion holds equally good if we assign to the word: Vanity, a meaning different to that originally intended, and use it to imply a quality supposed to be an especial characteristic of the peacock. Even if not prepared to admit that the assertion is unexceptionally true, with the word taken in the above sense, we must conscientiously do so in the majority of sublunary matters. Men's actions have mostly a spice of vanity in them, as surely as a disagreeable number of the articles in a German Conditorei proclaim the presence of vanilla. Vanity, like Proteus, assumes all kinds of forms. It is vanity which causes a New Zealander to undergo with cheerful resignation the scarifying process of tattooing: it is vanity which induces weak-minded beings among ourselves to rival the endurance of their tattooed brother, by submitting to the torture of pinching up their feet so that the latter may appear a trifle less than they really are, and undergoing agony almost equal to that occasioned by the famous boot so celebrated in connection with the visit to Edinburgh of that amiable and enlightened prince, James, Duke of York, afterwards King of England; vanity induces an African potentate to dispose of his blood relations for a few glass beads; vanity has pulled and tugged away at the staylace with which many a fair but foolish girl has committed suicide as certainly, and less agreeably, because not so speedily, as if she had tied it round her neck and then suspended herself from some convenient nail or bedpost.

One form assumed by vanity is a love of titles. This has been unjustly designated a peculiarly English phase of the disease; but it is equally rampant with other nations. This hankering for "a handle to one's name," far, indeed, from being exclusively English, as some foreign critics have asserted, may be found flourishing vigorously beyond seas, and nowhere more so than among our American cousins, where, unless travellers tell unconscionable falsehoods, as well as see strange things, it is not impossible that the gentleman who hands his thirsty customer a gin-sling, a mint-julep, or a sherry-cobbler, may be dubbed a major, a colonel, or even a general.

This train of thought has been suggested by the perusal of some remarks in an American contemporary on the subject of the title of "Professor," which always has been and still is used pretty freely by music-teachers throughout the States, and which, according to the testimony of the Pennsylvania School Journal, is equally popular among the teachers in the public schools. The writer in the journal mentioned thinks, and, in so thinking, cannot be accused of gross misrepresentation, that teaching is not yet a learned profession, since nine-tenths of all teachers do not intend to make teaching a life-work, and that to give the title of Professor to persons of this class is to "belittle" those who have really a right to it. We are informed that the writer has visited teachers' institutes where he has been often amused, but still oftener disgusted, at the manner in which young college graduates, who had scarcely peeped into a schoolroom, were addressed as "Professors." These sucking exponents of education, we are told, drank in the distinction as a sponge would drink in water. Like the sponge, too, they expanded under the operation. On the other hand, our American colleague is perfectly shocked at observing the servility with which older teachers bestow the title on such young calves, because the latter can show a college diploma, which, perchance, they "scarcely deserve."

Commenting on the above, a writer in Brainard's Musical World says he has always been of opinion that there is no more honourable title to be worn by men than that of "Teacher." His view of the case is that, if the name of "Music-Teacher" is not as honourable as Professor, it is simply the fault of the teacher. He is convinced that the public will scarcely be ready to respect the title of Music-Teacher, when music-teachers themselves are ashamed of it. There are many, we learn, who are a disgrace to the profession, and they are always the most eager for the title of Professor. It is true that teachers cannot be responsible for the titles which the public seem willing to confer on them; but conscientious men should sternly refuse to accept so questionable a boon. The writer winds up as follows: "Germany confers this title upon men who have distinguished themselves as teachers, or who have written works upon the subject of education. It is true we do not live in Germany, nor are we advocating the plan of following the example of Germany in all things. Yet, if we wish to use titles, we should see to it, as Germans do, that they mean something."

With the concluding principle here announced no sensible man will disagree, but there would be great and almost insurmountable difficulties in carrying it out through the length and breadth of the States. One great obstacle is the excessive weakness, to which I have already referred, which the Americans exhibit for titles of all kinds. Some people must have jewelry. If they cannot procure it genuine, they are contented with it false. They would prefer diamonds; but, sooner than go unadorned, they will wear paste. There will long, if not always, continue to be plenty of sham "Professors" on the other side the Atlantic. But true musicians there need not lose heart. The remedy is not far to seek.

Good wine needs no bush; and art-education has recently made such strides in America, especially as regards music, that the merits of those who are properly qualified to teach the divine art will not fail to obtain recognition, even without the aid of a title which charlatans have done all they can to discredit.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

It appears that M. Scholl, the well-known French critic, is not particularly partial to Boieldieu's Dame Blanche. Referring to the recent performance of that work at the Paris Opéra-Comique, he says:—

"I am of the same opinion as the King of Holland, who, after admiring Boieldieu's masterpiece for five years, and suffering it for ten, could not at last retain his composure if he merely saw it announced in the bills. Eugene Chavette told me that, when he was manager of the Theatre Royal of the Hague, it was frequently necessary that he should speak to the King. His Majesty, who was not particularly fond of pecuniary grants, ordinary and supplemental, ended by avoiding any interview with his manager. But his manager knew the King's weak point. He put up La Dame Blanche. Immediately afterwards an aide-de-camp galloped to the theatre—and Chavette obtained what he wanted, on condition of his changing the bill."

The following anecdote is related of Gaye, a chamber-musician to Louis XV. Having spoken disrespectfully of the Archbishop of Rheims, he feared he might lose his situation in the royal household. He fell, therefore, at the King's feet and begged that he might be forgiven. A few days later, as Gaye was singing mass in the King's presence, the Archbishop took occasion to remark to the Monarch, with a view of procuring the musician's dismissal: "What a pity it is, Sire, that poor Gaye is losing his voice!" "Losing his voice!" replied the King. "You are mistaken, my Lord, for he sings very well—though I must own he sometimes speaks ill."

A VIENNA paper, Die Donau, says that after the performance of Die Götterdämmerung at Bayreuth, the Emperor Wilhelm despatched General Count Lehendorf to summon the composer to the Imperial presence. After some trouble, the General found the object of his search in a little room behind the stage, stretched full length on a couch, while his wife, Mme Cosima, was kneeling before him, fanning his face. The Abbate Franz Liszt was pacing up and down, with the air of a man meditating on the Music of the Future. The General informed Wagner that the Emperor desired to see him. Looking towards Cosima, Wagner said: "Ought I to go, my dear?" "I think it will be enough for you to send word begging to be excused," replied the lady. "When the Emperor of Germany expresses a desire," observed the General, "that desire is, I think, an order as far as you are concerned. His Majesty commands your attendance, do you hear?" At this point, the Abbate interposed and impressed on Wagner the necessity of obeying the Emperor. Finally, Wagner made up his mind to follow the General. Die Donau, from which, as already intimated, this account is taken, is responsible for its correctness.

M. THIERS was not merely a most refined lover of art, and, in former days, one of the most regular frequenters of the Grand Opera, but, also, when the occasion required it, an intelligent Mecenas. A few days after Boieldieu's death in 1834, the Journal des Débats told its readers in the following terms how M. Thiers had assisted the musician, when the latter returned, ill and without means, from Italy, whither he had gone in the hope of recovering his health:

"Speaking of the state of Boieldieu's affairs, a paper said yesterday that, last year, the celebrated composer applied for a place as sub-librarian, but that both his own efforts and the exertions of his friends in his behalf were of no avail. This statement is not correct. On his return from Italy, Boieldieu, who had previously received from the Minister of the Interior" (M. Thiers) "proofs of the interest the latter took in him, requested an audience for the purpose of returning his thanks. At this interview, the Minister enquired into his visitor's position, which he spontaneously offered to improve. He personally used his influence with the Minister of Public Instruction to procure for Boieldieu, not a sub-librarian's place, but the position of curator, at the Royal Library. The rules of the institution, however, were opposed to such a nomination. M. Thiers then appointed the composer of La Dame Blanche to the professorship of composition, an office which had been long suppressed. Boieldieu had been professor of composition at the Conservatory from 1821 to 1827, with Lesueur and Berton, and his place was not filled up when he retired. Necessity, as we have seen, compelled him to resume the work of teaching, though for a very short period; illness, and then death, scarcely allowed him again to fulfil the duties of his office."

PROVINCIAL.

GLASGOW.—The City Hall Saturday Evening Concerts, held under the auspices of the Glasgow Abstinents' Union, were commenced for the twenty-fourth season on Saturday evening, Sept. 15th. There was a very large audience. In the course of the proceedings Baillie Collins, on behalf of himself and colleagues, expressed satisfaction at the Union providing these concerts. There could be no doubt, he said, that they had done a great deal towards the musical education of the masses, and the cultivation of a taste for high class music.

BRIGHTON.—Miss Blanche Lucas was the vocalist last week at the Aquarium concert. Her pleasing voice and ladylike bearing won for her the sympathy and applause of the audience. Miss Lucas finished her engagement on Saturday evening. At the morning concert Mme Marie Roze was associated with Miss Lucas. Mme Mathilde Zimeri, whose "voice and singing" are not her only attractions, has been engaged during the current week, and has met with general approval. At the morning concert, this day, she will be assisted by Signor Medica, from the Messrs Gatti's promenade concerts at the Royal Italian Operahouse, London. Mr Howard Paul is to give his "entertainment" on Monday; and an attractive series of "promenade concerts" commence on Tuesday in the Dome. Mme Liebhart, Mr Wilford Morgan, and other artists from the Agricultural Hall, London, will appear.

HASTINGS.—The series of ballad concerts, under the direction of Dr Abram, in the Pavilion, on the Pier, was resumed on Wednesday afternoon and evening last week. The artists were Miss Annie Sinclair and Miss Joyce Maas, who sang, in the afternoon, two songs and the duet from the Stabat Mater, "Quis est homo." At the same concert, Mr Thurley Beale was very successful in the "Village Blacksmith." Herr Leopold (piano) and Mons. Van Biene (violin-cello) also assisted.

BIRMINGHAM.—A "popular ballad concert" was given on Monday evening in the Town Hall. The artists were Mme Campobello-Sinico, Mme Enriquez, Mr Vernon Rigby, and Signor Campobello, vocalists; Mr D. Keppel, the eminent flautist, of the Royal Italian Opera, and Mr C. J. Duchemin, solo pianist and conductor. The programme, though not remarkable for novelty, was adapted to the executive resources and the requirements of a popular audience, and, if it had been strictly adhered to, neither artists nor audience would have had any ground for complaint; but, as nearly every vocal piece was encored, the entertainment was unduly protracted, and the good nature of the executants unfairly taxed. Mme Sinico met with an enthusiastic reception. Mme Enriquez, whose fine voice and dramatic style had been previously displayed in a duet from the Trovatore with Mr Rigby, sang Hullah's "Storm" in a manner that excited the liveliest enthusiasm. Mr Vernon Rigby was received with a hearty round of applause. He sang Mr Brinley Richards' "Anita" so much to the satisfaction of the audience, that they applauded him to "the echo." Signor Campobello sang the "Village Blacksmith" (Weiss), and Wallace's "Bellringer." M. Duchemin gave due effect to Abbé Liszt's transcription of the Erl King, and afterwards played a graceful polonaise of his own composition. Mr D. Keppel's flute playing was remarkable for perfection of execution. His time is beautiful. The concert was a great success.

BALFE.—A Correspondent of the Globe, writing about Avignon, says:—"Twice in the week there is a little fête outside the Porte de l'Oulle, where the military band plays for a couple of hours on the boulevard which extends along the river, and the entire population flock without the walls to sit beneath the plane trees and listen to the martial music. The Sunday night when I partook of this al fresco concert the music was principally Balfe, and it was a little strange and perplexing, even in the midst of scenes so strikingly foreign, to listen to the familiar strains, "I dream'd that I dwelt in marble halls."

IV.

People may think as they choose about what Frederic did in art—about his skill on the flute, for instance—but of anything like a regular cultivation of art, properly speaking, we find no trace in him. He preserved towards art the position he took up in his youth, and remained absolutely unaffected by everything which went beyond it. Every new movement, every youthful impetus, every effort to re-cast old and antiquated forms, was harshly rejected by him. He did not even restrict himself in this to Italian opera; he took his stand only on the operas of two composers, Hasse and Graun. Further than this he did not go, and was not a man to listen to new proposals or remonstrances. He was a hero, and in every respect one of the mightiest spirits of his age. But the coercive character of his arrangements, which extended to the domain of art and science, though it permitted distinguished persons at his Court to make themselves a name and earn the appreciation of the public, would not allow them to breathe freely or enjoy their condition. The despotic will of the hero, now growing old, lay always on them like an oppressive incubus. They served him well, it is true, because he was that rarity, a prince who understood them; but they did not serve him lovingly. He even watched over them personally in the minutest details. Many individuals have been inclined to see in this truly patriarchal relations between him and those around him! Of how far this system was carried the following is an example: The King, writing from Potsdam to Count Zierotin, said he had, to his surprise, learnt from the guard at one of the city gates, that Tosoni, the singer, had gone to Dresden. As the said singer had not received leave of absence, Zierotin was ordered immediately to state how he could possibly procure post-horses. In consequence of this letter, Zierotin had to institute inquiries, which resulted in the information that it was not Tosoni, the singer, but Tosoni's brother, who, after having paid a visit to Berlin, had passed through the Dresden Gate on his return to Italy. In a second letter the King expressed himself satisfied.—Frederic repeatedly gave out that he did not want to be troubled with the details of the Opera. Nevertheless he busied himself with the smallest trifles, and reserved the right of finally deciding in each and every matter. Nay, to Count Zierotin's successor, who was young in office, and had ventured to remonstrate against such a Royal determination, he could write, among other things, as follows: "I must, however, now inform you that you will act much more wisely by doing what I order you to do, and by not accustoming yourself to argue things; that is something I do not suffer, and of which you must on no account think. You must not imagine that you are my Privy Councillor; it was not as such that I chose you, and you will have to exercise more diligence in rendering partition to my ordres, if you wish me to continue your gracious king." The report of the despotism under which all artists, without exception, groaned at Frederic's Court, had spread beyond the boundaries of Prussia, and there was some difficulty in finding talented artists for Berlin. The fortress of Spandau enjoyed a very evil reputation in Italy, and, for singers and dancers, disputed the palm of honour with the Bastille in Paris. We shall subsequently see that the great King was not slow in sending a refractory artist to enjoy the pleasure of privacy at Spandau. Hence it is clear why Count Zierotin would not take a denial when the report reached him from Dresden concerning the "Leipzig girl." A good artist had to be obtained, and neither in Italy nor elsewhere was there the slightest prospect of finding one. It was to such a Court, then, that "Jungfer Schmahling," an obstinate and refractory girl in all save musical matters, now came, and a highly original scene was enacted in the small concert-room at Sanssouci, in which the flute-concerts, once so admired, were held. We give the scene as it is given by Louis Schneider in his History of the Berlin Opera, for he heard it from the lips of his father, to whom Mdme Mara often related it, when, far advanced in years, she resided at Reval.

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

V.

Having been ushered into the room, Gertrude remained standing a long time, in expectation of the King's arrival, clearing her throat to see whether she was in voice. She even sang tentatively a few notes. What she heard tranquillised her; and it was with confidence that she at length beheld the door of the Royal closet opened. Frederic II. entered, and, with his wonderfully flashing eyes, which were accustomed to produce so profound an impression, gazed fixedly at the figure bending low before him. Without uttering a word he went to the grand piano and appeared for quite a quarter of an hour to take no notice of her. Gertrude was now one-and-twenty, and this neglect aroused her pride. She thought of the "horse-neighing," and longed for the moment when she felt convinced she should change in her favour the adverse judgment of the dreaded Royal art-connoisseur. Finding that the pianoforte-playing seemed as though it would never end, she began, with great unconcern, examining the pictures on the walls, and even took the liberty of turning her back on the King. Whether he remarked this, or whether the pianoforte fantasia was concluded, he suddenly beckoned to her. She approached respectfully the instrument, and heard with affright the curt and anything but friendly question, "You want to sing me something, eh?"—"Yes, if your Majesty will graciously allow me," she stammered, seating herself on the chair from which the King had arisen, and to which he pointed. She now felt in her element, and sang an Italian air which she had long practised, and which had been composed for the celebrated Estrua. At the very first notes the King became attentive, and went nearer. When she had concluded he expressed unequivocally his approbation. "Can you sing at sight?"—"Yes, your Majesty."—"Can you? Humph! that is difficult."—"My father taught me how to do so."—"Indeed! Do you mean to say you will sing anything I put before you?"—"I will sing and also accompany it on the harpsichord, your Majesty."—Shaking his head, the King fetched from his cabinet the score of Hasse's opera Pyramo e Thisbe, laid it on the desk, and took up his position behind the girl's chair to see how she would execute her task. She began by running through the score, page by page, so as to render herself acquainted with the text. The King grew impatient. "I thought so. You are obliged to look at the notes first."—"I am not looking at the notes, but the words, your Majesty, in order to know with what expression I must sing."—"Indeed! That's it, is it? Well, well; begin." And Gertrude did begin. She sang the recitative with extraordinary bravura, as though her powers had been doubled; at the same time, she was especially careful to give the words their full significance, thereby producing an effect with which the King had previously been unacquainted in Italian opera. He tapped her in a friendly manner on the shoulder, saying repeatedly, almost after every phrase, "Brava!" Now came the Adagio. The young artist had plucked up courage. She felt sure of victory, for she knew that her special excellence lay in the sustained notes of the Adagio. But her waywardness went hand in hand with her triumph. She remembered the bad opinion the King entertained of German singing, and sang the first half of the movement so badly, with such an absence of tone, and with such intentional harshness, that the King tapped the arm of his chair with an air of dissatisfaction, and turned round. This was exactly what she wanted. "Pardon me, your Majesty, something got into my throat; that is why I sang so badly that any one might almost have fancied it was the neighing of a horse. May I beg your Majesty graciously to allow me to begin da capo?" Without waiting for the permission she sang the piece once more, but on this occasion with all the liquid charm of her marvellous voice; passed on to the Allegro; rose with the last note from her seat; and with a smile made the King a profound reverence. Frederic said in a tone of satisfaction: "I will tell you what: you can sing. If you like to stop in Berlin.

* The Royal remarks sound far more harsh and offensive in German than in English, because we cannot in English render their contemptuous tone, due to the employment of the pronoun for the third person singular, which the hero used when speaking to the future prima donna: "Sie will mir also was vorsingen?" The hero was fond of this royal style. He would even say when addressing a general, who had given him satisfaction at a review: "Er hat gut manœuvrirt."—J. V. B.

you can be attached to my Opera. When you go out, bid the lackey send Zierotin to me at once; I want to talk to him about you. Adieu!" * * * * The engagement was concluded, and Gertrude's friends congratulated her on being appointed a prima donna at a salary of three thousand thalers, and, moreover, with not a very great deal to do for it. Yet from the very first there was something prickling like a thorn in her breast. She had long cast her eyes with indescribable yearning towards Italy. Her warmest wish was to be acquainted with the beautiful land of song. She had fancied in her dreams that she would become something very different if she could study her divine art at the fountain-head. Would it not even be serving her new master if she could say of herself that she had gone through a course of study in Italy? But lo and behold, the King thought otherwise. He unceremoniously refused her first request in reference to the matter in question: "She shall stop here; she can learn nothing more yonder." Was he in earnest, or was he fearful that it would have been difficult to make her return to Berlin, supposing she liked fair Italy better? However this may have been, the Royal resolution was a bitter one for Gertrude, and the equivalent offered could not indemnify her for her shattered hopes. This equivalent was the fact that the King caused her to receive in Berlin itself the very best instruction in the Italian style of singing. (To be continued.)

MONJAUZE.

This well-known tenor died on the 14th inst., carried off in twenty-four hours by an attack of erysipelas. He had held a very excellent position at the Théâtre-Lyrique and the Opéra-Comique. He was especially remarkable as a tenor "de demi-caractère," but some of his last creations, such, for instance, as those in Les Troyens and Rienzi, revealed in him an amount of power, of which he himself was probably before ignorant, and which enabled him to play for some time in the provinces the part of Raoul in Les Huguenots, a part which he desired up to the last to play at the Grand Opera. Ponchard's lessons at the Conservatory made him an excellent actor as well as a distinguished singer. Despite this complete preparation for a lyrical career, he first appeared in the spoken drama. After a visit to Russia, he gave up the drama, and was engaged, in 1856, at the Théâtre-Lyrique, where he created the principal character in La Jaguarita and La Fanchonnette, marching subsequently to success after success with Margot, La Reine Topaze, La Statue, Sardanapale, Les Troyens, La Fiancée d'Abydos, Le Val d'Andorre, Faust, Rigoletto, Violetta, Macbeth, Martha, La Bohémienne, and Rienzi. We all remember his remarkable creation in L'Ombre at the Opéra-Comique; where he played also in Fra Diavolo. It was, too, at the Opéra-Comique that we saw him for the last time, two years ago, in the revival of Le Val d'Andorre.

During the winter of 1875, he was engaged at the Liège Theatre. Monjauze, at the age of fifty-two, was certainly not "fini" ("dried up"), as they say in theatrical circles. His fine voice still possessed brilliant notes, which sounded like those of a clarion, and his artistic talent was unimpaired. Yet he seemed to be forgotten; he could not obtain a favourable opportunity for re-appearing before the public, and he was deeply affected by it. For the last two years he was endeavouring to find a theatre he might manage. We should certainly have seen him again on some large stage and in some important part, had not death carried him off so suddenly and so prematurely.—Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris.

BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

The season for grand opera terminated on Saturday last with the second representation of Les Huguenots, the other operas since last I wrote being L'Africaine, La Reine de Chypre, Le Postillon de Longjumeau, and Les Dragons de Villars. The last-named was given on Thursday last, and was followed by La Fille de Mme Angot. On the whole, M. Froment must be congratulated on a very good season. Paul et Virginie was the greatest success, thanks to Mmes Nau and de Gérardon, MM. Herbert and Lourde. Next week we begin our winter campaign. Our visitors' summer season is quite over, as I am reminded at the moment I write by the moaning of the "Sou'-easter" up the stairs.

We had a grand concert on Wednesday last at the Etablissement des Bains, at which M^{me} Sinico and Signor Campobello were the vocalists, assisted by M. Taffernel, "première flûte du Grand-Opéra de Paris," and M. Henri François, violoncellist. The orchestra of the Casino played the overture to L'Etoile du Nord and Weber's "Invitation à la valse." M^{me} Sinico was in excellent voice, and gave "Roberto, tu che adoro," Ardit's valse, "L'Estasi," and, with Sig. Campobello, "Là ci darem la mano." Signor Campobello sang "Ah non avea più lagrime," "Vi ravviso," and "The Village Blacksmith" (Weiss). M. Taffernel played fantasias on Mignon and La Juive, and M. François fantasias on airs from Faust and "Airs Anglais et Ecossais," in which "God save the Queen" began the theme, and kept cropping up from time to time, so much, indeed, that even when one might have fancied one's self in Scotland, it burst out so prominently as actually to make some evidently very loyal English people rise from their seats in recognition thereof.

Years ago one used to go to concerts to listen to music unadulterated—pur et simple; now-a-days every performer, on whatever instrument he displays his talent, has his own "arrangement" of any motive he may select from the greatest master. Is it because we are dwellers on this side of the water, in a provincial town, that we are bound to put up with the ideas of M. N'importegni, instead of the real music, as written, and intended to be heard, by the original composer?

I mention this because no performer—French, English, or Italian—ever comes here without playing or singing something "arranged" by the said performer, whose name appears in the programme instead of that of its inventor.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The programme of last Saturday opened with a selection from Flotow's Martha, including the overture, the duet "Solo profugo," the romance "M'appari tutt' amor," the Beer Song, the Spinning Quartet, the "Last Rose of Summer," &c. The performance of the overture was excellent, while the romance and the song in praise of malt had to be repeated. The vocalists were M^{lle} Ida Cristino, Signors Gianini and Medica. At the close of the selection M. Henri Ketten played Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro gioioso with success. He was applauded enthusiastically, returned to the orchestra, and played a "Spinnlied." Signor Ardit's effective arrangement of motives from Verdi's Aida, for orchestra and military band, brought the first part to a conclusion. In the second part the overture to Verdi's Nabucco and the scherzo from Litoff's Fourth Concerto Sinfonico for piano and orchestra, played by M. Ketten, were performed. On Wednesday the Messrs Gatti gave a second Handel and Haydn night.

BERLIN.—There has been no novelty at the Royal Opera since the re-opening of the theatre on the 24th August. The operas performed up to the present are Lohengrin, Faust, Die Folkunger, Les Huguenots, Die Maccabäer, Oberon, Der Freischütz, Fidelio, La Muette, and Der fliegende Holländer. Herr von Hülssen and Herr R. Wagner have come to an understanding with reference to the production of Die Walküre, and Herr Wagner has given his consent to a considerable curtailment of the second act, a process absolutely indispensable when Die Walküre is performed alone, since the portions which will be omitted refer to the Rheingold, the prelude of the Trilogy. A very important consideration has been: how the piece was to be placed on the stage. The Intendant-General resolved, very naturally, that the performance should either equal that at Munich or not take place at all. Now the space behind the footlights at the Royal Operahouse is exceedingly limited. The chief machinist, Herr Fritz Brandt, who is a great admirer of Wagner's work, and was engaged in its production at Munich, hit, however, upon a method for solving the difficult problem. But the work will not be brought out this season. From the preceding it is fair to infer that the mounting of Die Walküre, as far as scenic and mechanical effects are concerned, will be fully as splendid and striking as anywhere else, but the result is one which will be attained only by a disproportionately larger expenditure of trouble, time, and money. Kroll's closed on the 3rd inst. with Rigoletto. Its place is supplied by the Woltersdorff Theater, which Herr Carl Scherbarth opened on the 15th inst., for the purpose, as already mentioned in these columns, of presenting to his patrons the old-fashioned German Spelopern (or pieces interspersed with songs) of Dittersdorf, Gläser, Lortzing, and other composers of the same school. The leading prima donna is Mad. Scherbarth-Fleiss, the manager's wife.

ENGLISH SONGS.*

(From the "Examiner.")

A composer who, in this country, attempts anything above the ordinary level of the drawing-room ballad, ought to be first of all congratulated on his courage; so small is the chance of external success, that the consciousness of having done his duty by art must be his chief remuneration. Cases in point are but too abundant. Not long ago we noticed with high commendation the, in many respects, admirable settings of the lyrics in Bayley's Festus, by Mr Rudall, a promising young musician. But in spite of their merits these songs have, as far as we are aware, been totally excluded from the concert-room, and a similar treatment at the hands of professional singers has been experienced by Mr J. W. Davison, the musical "discoverer" of Shelley. His "Illustrations" of that poet and of Keats, written many years ago, are amongst the most charming specimens of simple true-felt English song. But as yet they seem born to blush unseen, like many another flower of the same garden.

That Mr Lawson's Songs and Ballads may escape the fate of undeserved neglect is our sincere wish. Our reasons for this wish are almost of a personal nature. For it is on the basis so frequently and so warmly advocated by us, namely, on that of the popular song, that Mr Lawson has founded his musical conceptions. Thus a "Jacobite Lament" (No. 17), the words by an anonymous author, is full of noble courage and defiance not unmixed with melancholy at the decay of the "cause;" while the reckless gaiety of the Cavaliers is illustrated by three songs of Sir John Suckling, of which the first, "Love's Resolves" (No. 11), is perhaps the most satisfactory. But, upon the whole, it strikes us that Mr Lawson's disposition as a composer tends towards the gentle and sentimental rather than towards the humorous. This opinion is confirmed by two other attempts in the latter direction—"A Student's Song" and "A Yorkshireman's Love Song" (Nos. 5 and 6), although neither of them lacks spirit and a certain originality. Of the strictly popular songs, Nos. 9 and 16 deserve mention; the former, "When I am dead, my dearest" (words by Christina Rossetti), a simple tune which clings to the memory; the latter, a charming setting of Marlowe's well-known "Passionate Shepherd," the merit of which, however, is somewhat impaired by its striking resemblance to a chorus from Handel's Israel in Egypt both as regards the theme and the pastoral colouring of its harmonic basis. In justice to Mr Lawson, it ought to be added that this is the only instance of an actual reminiscence we have noted, although the legitimate influence of the early English composers, and occasionally of Schubert and Schumann, is observable throughout the collection. Amongst the songs of this group it remains to name a love ditty as simple and as tender as ever emerged from that inexhaustible source of poetic feeling—the heart of the people. This song, called "Adieu" (No. 14), before all others, deserves to be on everyone's lips. Its melody is easy to remember, and the accompaniment may be mastered at sight by a moderately skilled player. The beautiful words are by Thomas Carlyle. In another portion of Mr Lawson's songs the simplicity of the Volkslied has been exchanged for a more subjective mode of expression. We are speaking of feeling rather than of musical form, for in the latter respect no such difference is discernible. Amongst the songs of this class those addressed to "Kitty," which open the collection, form a separate group. Kitty is a fair maiden surrounded by, and likened to, bees and flowers, and other charming things, and fashioned, it would appear, to inspire gentle admiration rather than stormy passion, although in one of the songs her poet, Mr Marzials, somewhat hyperbolically exclaims that "Kitty in her golden glory, is my religion too." In accordance with the sentiment of the words, Mr Lawson's settings of these songs are graceful and light in character, with only an occasional indication of deeper feeling. The melodious flow of the third of these little lyrics is unfortunately somewhat marred by great monotony of rhythm. For want of musical type we cannot explain our meaning better than by saying that the rhythmical motive of the song is founded on the following metrical formula:

continued with the interruption of but half a bar from the first to the last note of the accompaniment, much to the detriment of an otherwise very pretty composition. A song of a type superior to those just mentioned, although belonging to the same class of subjective lyrics, is the one called "A Secret," No. 15 of the collection. Here music and poetry have combined to produce an idyll of tenderest lyrical charm. Again we regret our inability to give musical quotations. But we will add Mr Marzials' charming words to convey at least some idea of the music which so perfectly renders their import:—

* People's Songs and Ballads. The Music by M. L. Lawson. London: Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.

"At the heart of the wood is a crystal well,
And the nightingale sings near it,
And what she sings there's none can tell,
For no one is nigh to hear it.

"At the heart of the wood is a silent tree,
And the nightingale sings above it,
Near a name once written where none should see,
And no one now lives to love it."

After having sufficiently indicated the poetic qualities of Mr Lawson's song, it remains to add a few words as to his musical workmanship. We have on former occasions pointed out the three principal divisions of the artistic song according to the differences of structure; the first division being the strophic song, in which the tune of the first verse is repeated over and over again; the second taking the form of the rondeau, in so far as the first theme is repeated again in the last verse, the intervening stanza or stanzas introducing different melodious materials; the third, and most elaborate, approaching the form of the free fantasia or rhapsody, in which the music varies according to the poetical requirements of the single stanzas. Mr Lawson has throughout adhered to the first and simplest of these forms, and, considering the popular aim and character of his work, no doubt justly so. At the same time it must be confessed that an occasional deviation from the rule, especially in the more impassioned pieces, would have been welcome to the musician. The same principle of almost exaggerated simplicity obtains in the harmonious treatment of most of these songs. On studying the works of Robert Franz and other great German lyrists, Mr Lawson will find that these masters know how to combine interesting and striking harmonies with the absolute naïveté of the Volkslied. The ritornel is especially the place where such features may be fitly introduced; and in comparing, for instance, the interludes in the wonderful song, "Zu Strassburg auf der Schanz," by Robert Franz, with any of Mr Lawson's ritornels, the reader will at once perceive the gist of our remarks. Another respect in which we think Mr Lawson's work capable of much improvement is the purity of his harmonious progressions. It is true that the rules of the strict style of the old Italian masters have been considerably relaxed by the practice of modern composers. Beethoven and Wagner, and even Bach, occasionally deviate from the strict precepts of musical grammar, and the sequence of fifths rigorously prohibited by earlier theorists may be not unfrequently met with in their works. But there is almost always some melodious or contrapuntal reason to account for such irregularities. Such a reason it would be sometimes difficult to discover in Mr Lawson's work. We fail, for instance, to perceive why a Yorkshireman, more than any other man, should make love to such unsophisticated fifths as continually occur in the song devoted to that subject (No. 6). Mr Lawson also ought to know, and no doubt does know, that the minor seventh is bound to resolve downwards, and not upwards, as it does in the last but one bar of his third song. We trust that in his future works he will not again indulge in these and other trifling peccadilloes, not at least till, by some more elaborate and scholarly composition, he has proved himself possessed of that perfect knowledge of the musical code which alone confers a right of taking liberties with it. In the meantime, such slight blemishes ought not to prevent us from cordially welcoming these songs, which, both as regards melodious invention and poetic feeling, are the most promising English music we have seen for a good while.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—A statement to the effect that we are degenerating, musically speaking, will, I know, be received by a storm of remonstrance, which, unfortunately, will not alter the fact.

Steps have been, and are attempted to bring music forward as the leading art, which, undoubtedly, it is, vide Goethe's quotation, repeated in the frontispiece of your publication, and what has been the result from these steps?—formation of fresh academies, societies, &c.?

Let us deal with the item of concerts (speaking here generally, I exclude the private ones, which only those favoured by fortune can attend). There are several termed Promenade Concerts. To what point of musical interest have these attained, and what progress have they made since the days of Mellon, the true inaugurator of classical and varied popular concerts? A glance at the programmes of the several entertainments referred to give for answer: the sensationally effective, and the very light operatic selections are given; and, although a good band and most able conductors are available, anyone at all used to the opera grieves at the style in which such selections are given, having seemingly for object, to bring forward different soloists, who vie with each other in variations, which are simply liberties taken with an original score.

Strange inconsistencies exist in the taste of the public. A certain impresario, certain performers, and even a certain hall, will command hosts, who often really cannot comprehend much of the music from the fact that it is not often such as is to be heard, and, therefore, the grasping of it is simply impossible by an audience who usually go into raptures at the first bar of "Home, sweet home," "The last rose of summer," and "Coming thro' the rye." Yet they flock to such entertainments, and appear most instructively delighted.

That we are still in the region of melody in our national musical taste, is incontestably evident by the fact of our extraordinary silence when real harmonious passages are afforded to us in sundry operas, and our vociferous plaudits at the melodies.

Turning to the question of opera, what efforts have not been made to establish a permanent opera? London, with nearly four millions of inhabitants, fails to sustain an opera all the year round.

Failing to appreciate a fine work, we usually find fault with the plot, as not suited to the taste of an English audience; a contemporary once objected to Robert le Diable, but evidently saw nothing objectionable in Don Giovanni or Faust.

Turning to another point—and this is a cosmopolitan question: operas are, as a rule, too spectacular; it is the bane of all of them, and particularly Meyerbeer's. It is always erroneously asserted that half the merits of this great master's operas depend upon spectacular effects. I venture to say, were the eyes less blinded by gorgeous display, the ears and mind would benefit, and so would the real merits of the operas. To this display of scenic effects, I believe the now apparent withdrawal of that composer's magnificent Africaine is due. People have seen so much that they have heard nothing, and those who made a point of listening have only been privileged for the last few years to hear that grand posthumous work twice in each season.

Relative to native talent, why is it not more propagated? Talent is a natural plant, and grows in all countries. Taste is a matter of cultivation. Why should we be eight months in the year waiting for foreign artists? Why are not real encouragement and substantial assistance, if needs be, given to native talent to become artists and perform all foreign operas in English?

Let us enjoy German and Italian music. Let us boast of a national opera all the year round, attend operas for the sake of the work, and not so much, as is the case generally, because so-and-so will be a performer.

To conclude, is there no possible remedy for beginning a long opera at an hour it should be at least a third over? Are the public not to be studied? How often can the public sit out the climax of an opera, i.e., the end of the third act?

Take, for example, Les Huguenots and Don Giovanni. How many who have trains and conveyances to run for, ever hear the famous duet between Valentine and Raoul in the former, and the famous scene between Don Giovanni and the Statue of the Commendatore in the latter? Even half-an-hour earlier, and punctuality (a pleasing and most remarkable feature in one of our Operahouses) would be a great improvement.

Unfortunately, such suggestions, though feasible, are made, read, and dropped; boxes and stalls must, it appears, rule; but how is it things are differently managed in all continental cities?

In the hope that the foregoing remarks may be deserving of a little of your attention, which I crave pardon for having trespassed upon, I am, dear sir, your obedient servant,

O, L.

WAIFS.

Mr W. Ganz has returned from Eastbourne.

Professor J. P. Goldberg has returned to town from Italy.

Herr Bilse, with his orchestra, is giving concerts in Berlin.

The San Carlo, Naples, will re-open on the 15th November.

Mr Ignace Gibsons has returned to town from a tour in the Isle of Wight.

The classes at the Paris Conservatory will re-open on Monday, the 8th October.

Herr Julius Rietz, director of the Conservatory at Dresden, died on the 12th inst.

M. Romand, the co-author with Scribe of several operatic librettos, died lately in Paris.

The Champs-Élysées Concerts were brought to a close for the season on the 15th inst.

M. Frédéric Kastner, the inventor of the Pyrophone, has received the Spanish Order of Carlos III.

A Hungarian paper states that the Abbate Franz Liszt has composed a new opera, entitled Luther.

Herr Johann Strauss will direct the rehearsals of his opera, La Tsigane, at the Théâtre de la Renaissance.

Henri Meilhac, the well-known dramatic author and librettist, has been seriously ill, but is now convalescent.

It is said that the Teatro de Novedades, Barcelona, is to be opened for Italian opera, with Naudin as tenor.

According to the Trovatore, 15 per cent. of the inmates of lunatic asylums are artists, i.e., musicians, singers, &c.

The España musical has changed its form and title. It now appears as the Cronaca artistica, Revista quincenal.

There is little probability that the opening of the new Theatre Royal, Dresden, will take place, as promised, this year.

Mdlle Teresa Singer is stopping in Milan, where she will remain till called to Naples by her engagement at the San Carlo.

The New York Academy of Music will probably be opened for Italian opera this autumn, with Mad. Ilma di Murska as prima donna.

Padre Giovanni, the monk with the phenomenal voice, is announced to sing at Lucca in Rossini's Mass and Bernardino's Vesperi.

Mad. Sigl-Vespermann, formerly a highly esteemed member of the Royal Operahouse, Munich, died in that capital, on the 8th inst., aged 74.

M. Ambroise Thomas has returned to Paris, and resumed his duties as chairman of the Musical Committee of the Great Exhibition.

MM. Firmin Didot are about to publish a short treatise, entitled L'Art du chef-d'orchestre, by M. Deldevez, conductor at the Grand Opera, Paris.

Mr John Simon, C.B., has accepted the invitation of the council of the Midland Medical Society to deliver the inaugural address for the ensuing session.

Mad. Serafine Tausig, widow of the late Carl Tausig, has once more settled at Berlin, where she gives lessons on the piano to a select number of pupils.

More than 4,000 persons attended the solemn uncovering, on the 2nd inst., of the monument erected at Crefeld to Carl Wilhelm, the composer of "Die Wacht am Rhein."

L'Europe diplomatique informs its readers that fifteen royal princes in Europe have contracted morganatic marriages. In four instances, the ladies were formerly on the stage.

Instead of 1,200,000 francs, as erroneously and absurdly asserted by some journals, 200,000 francs—without the 1,000,000—was the sum lately paid for the Théâtre-Français at Nice.

M. Ambroise Thomas's Psyché, transformed into a grand opera, will be produced by M. Halanzier next spring, with Mmes Heilbronn, Engally, and M. Bouhy in the principal parts.

Professor Kullak, having returned from his summer trip, has resumed his duties as director of the Academie der Tonkunst, Berlin. His pupil, Herr Eugenio Pirani, replaced him during his absence.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The competition for the residue of the Sterndale Bennett Scholarship (two terms) was held on Friday last week, the examiners being Mr F. R. Cox, Mr H. C. Lunn, Mr Walter Macfarren, and the Principal (Professor Macfarren). The Scholarship was awarded to Henry J. Cockram, Edwin M. Flavell being commended.

The boards of the Londesborough Theatre, Scarborough, have been occupied by the Rose Hersee Company. So successful have been the performances that many persons have been turned away nightly from the doors.

Mrs Priscilla Frost, a harpist of considerable merit, played with success, at the opening of the new Operahouse, Leicester, Mr Oberthür's Concerto in G minor, and, with Mr T. Melling, a duet for harp and piano.

The German operatic company, under the management of Mr J. C. Fryer, will open at the Boston Theatre, Boston, U. S., on the 15th October, afterwards visiting Chicago, St Louis, New Orleans, and San Francisco.

M. Alfred Jaëll, while stopping lately at Blankenberghe, in Belgium, was serenaded by fifty members of the Bruges Musical Reunion, a society for instrumental music, under the direction of Count Moles Le Bailly.

R. Wagner has presented all the artists who took part in the Bayreuth performances with a medal bearing the inscription: "Richard Wagner to the Interpreters of his Work. As a Mark of Appreciation and Gratitude."

Mr Ganz was the pianist at the Agricultural Hall concert on Wednesday, and played Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor. Mr Ganz played the same concerto last evening as well as some solo pieces of his own composition.

Verdi's Aida will shortly be produced at Hanover, Dessau, Bremen, Königsberg, Magdeburg, Düsseldorf, and Prague, and Herr Brüll's Goldene Kreuz at Gratz, Hanover, Mayence, Nuremberg, Darmstadt, Leipsic, Stettin, and Treves.

M. Duprez witnessed the first appearance at the Paris Opéra-Comique, on the 6th inst., of M. Engel, as Georges Brown, in La Dame Blanche. He himself made his début in the same opera exactly forty-nine years previously to a day.

The Carnarvon Eisteddfod, it appears, proved a financial success, and the net receipts, after payment of all demands will, it is understood, be over £1,000. One half of the total surplus will be handed over to the Council of the University College of Wales.

Mr F. S. Gilmore has completed an arrangement with Sheridan Shook to give thirty monster concerts at the Hippodrome, New York. The net proceeds are to be devoted to paying the expenses of Mr Gilmore's band during their projected European Tour.

At the last Concours at the Imperial Conservatory in Vienna, the first prize for composition was awarded to the youth, Alfred Strossi, son of the once celebrated prima donna, Goldberg-Strossi, and nephew of the esteemed maestro, J. P. Goldberg, of London.

An Italian contemporary informs its readers that the author of I nostri Bimbi (Our Boys) is at present engaged on a pendant, entitled Le nostre Zitelte (Our Girls), for which he is to receive one thousand six hundred pounds. This will probably be news for Mr H. J. Byron.

The German pianoforte trade, especially at Berlin, has suffered a heavy blow from the recent imposition of a duty of 100 roubles on every piano imported into Russia. The trade was previously very large, as in all the Czar's dominions there are only three pianoforte manufactories of any note.

It is said that Mdlle Sanz, and some other members of the Théâtre-Italien, Paris, will appear at the Teatro de Oriente, Madrid, while, in return, the Spanish manager will oblige his Parisian colleague with the loan of Señor Gayarre and one or two other artists belonging to the Madrid company.

The Royal National Gallery, Berlin, has been enriched by a portrait of "Jenny Lind" (Mad. Goldschmidt), painted at her own request by Magnus. The sum received by the artist for his work was eighty gold Friedrichs; that paid by the Prussian Government to the person who had inherited the picture, 12,000 thalers.

An entirely new programme, containing many attractive features, inaugurated the thirteenth year of the "Moore and Burgess Minstrels" at St James's Hall. Six thousand consecutive performances have been given, without including extra entertainments at the Crystal and Alexandra Palaces, Drury Lane, and other theatres.

Mad. Ethelka Gerster is resting at Kissingen from the fatigues of the season. After paying a visit to her mother at Kaschau, she will proceed to Baden, where she will sing on the 2nd October, before the Emperor of Germany. On the 7th of the same month she will sing at the Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine in Cologne, whence she will go to St Petersburg.

"A short sighted friend of ours," says the Boston (U.S.) Courier, "entered a dry-goods store in Washington Street the other day, and humorously slapped upon the back what he supposed was a lay figure, saying: 'Well, old woman, how are you?' The old woman not only turned round, but volunteered a great deal of information, which her husband amplified at a later hour in the day."

Graziella, a two-act lyric drama, words by M. Jules Barbier, music by M. A. Choudens; L'aumônier du régiment, a one-act comic opera, words by MM. H. de Saint-Georges and Leuven, music by M. Hector Salomon; and La Clef d'or, a three-act lyric comedy, words by MM. Octave Feuillet and L. Gallet, music by M. Eugène Gautier, have been successfully produced this season at the Théâtre-Lyrique, the first two on the 13th and the third on the 14th inst.

Mr W. Pyatt, the popular entrepreneur, has received a letter from Sir Julius Benedict offering his services on the occasion of Mr Pyatt's benefit concert to be given at Nottingham next month. Mr Sims Reeves, Mr Santley, and other artists—says the Nottingham Daily Express—have also kindly offered their gratuitous services. In fact, had such not been the case, the same journal remarks, it would have been impossible to have brought Mme Adelina Patti to Nottingham.

The loss sustained by the resignation of Mr H. Weist Hill and the entire orchestra of the Alexandra Palace, is one which musical art can ill afford. The excellence of the orchestral performances won in a short period universal admiration, notwithstanding many adverse circumstances; and we doubt if greater perfection will ever again be obtained whoever the executants may be. On the occasion of the last appearance of the admirable orchestra on Saturday week a number of season-ticket holders assembled with the expressed intention of signifying their appreciation of the services rendered, and on the same day the members of the orchestra presented their conductor, Mr Hill, with a massive silver goblet on which was inscribed, "Presented to Henry Weist Hill, Esq., by the members of the Alexandra Palace Orchestral Band, in recognition of his ability as their conductor, and as a mark of their esteem and regard. 1st September, 1877." Mr Hill has once before received a similar recognition of his services from the same donors.—Choir.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grid, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From the "Times.")

Leeds, September 21.

Professor G. A. Macfarren's new oratorio, Joseph, produced to-day, was received with such unanimous favour as to leave no doubt with regard to its future acceptance. Nor can the verdict of the Leeds public fairly be questioned. It is to their spirit of enterprise that we owe the work, and, to speak briefly, we are indebted to them for a masterpiece. Professor Macfarren has written in an unusually short space of time three oratorios, John the Baptist, the Resurrection, and Joseph, all festival oratorios—the first given at Bristol in 1873, the second at Birmingham in 1876. Though its forerunners won unqualified approval, especially John the Baptist, which was subsequently performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society in London, and then at the Leeds Festival of 1874, it is more than likely that in the estimation of good judges Joseph will take ultimate precedence of both. Many and admirable as were the noticeable points in the first and second oratorios—so many and so admirable indeed, as at once to persuade connoisseurs that a new master in the highest school of sacred composition had been discovered—we cannot but think that, as viewed in the light of a thoroughly complete and finished performance, the palm must in the end be awarded to Joseph. That certain of the Biblical episodes accommodate themselves more or less easily to what is conventionally termed "dramatic" treatment is an admitted fact, and from this point of view Professor Macfarren has looked at Joseph, which, certain idiosyncratic differences taken into account, he has set forth in his music very much in the same way as Mendelssohn did in Elijah, and Handel in the various sacred musical dramas for which he found congenial themes in Holy Scripture. In the present instance, moreover, few can deny that the composer has been furnished by Dr E. G. Monk, organist of York Minster, his able and constant fellow-labourer, with a text so assorted as rather to aid than overweight the musician in his task. Dr. Monk, while inevitably condensing, has presented the simple and exquisitely beautiful story of Joseph and his family in its most touching and impressive form, only discarding such portions as were hardly amenable to musical illustration. Nothing, however, essential to the intelligible development of a narrative after its manner unequalled has been overlooked. The didactic and reflective passages culled from other parts of Scripture—the Old Testament being more largely drawn upon than the New—all, like the Chorus in Greek tragedy, bear more or less upon the incidents in the story that naturally suggest them, and the entire construction is thus perfectly symmetrical and in order. This is high praise, but not, we think, higher than is legitimately due to Dr Monk. To speak in detail of Professor Macfarren's elaborate and beautiful music, under the immediate impression created by a truly splendid performance—and such in almost every respect was the performance to-day—is out of the question; that task must be postponed, and further consideration will make it all the more grateful.

September 22.

There can be no hesitation in reiterating an opinion already suggested that the oratorio of Joseph is the finest work from the pen of the most gifted and distinguished of living English musicians. That all concerned in the management of the Leeds Festival were determined on affording every chance of success to the oratorio which they had commissioned the Cambridge Musical Professor and Principal of our Royal Academy to write was evident. In the universally regretted absence of Mdlle Tietjens, no less an artist than Mdlle Albani was invited to take her place, and thus one of the most responsible and significant parts was filled to perfection. It would be difficult for any amateur whose ears are trained to the appreciation of what is irreproachable in the utterance of musical sounds to forget the singing of the intelligent and charming young Canadian. Professor Macfarren, who naturally looked forward to Mdlle Tietjens with undisturbed confidence, must, in the absence of that renowned artist, have experienced genuine satisfaction in possessing one so qualified in every way to do full justice to his music. There are two soprano parts in Joseph, and the second, Benjamin, being intrusted to Madame Edith Wynne, it may well be understood was in thoroughly competent hands. The contralto was Madame Patey, to whom, as to Mdlle Albani, were assigned exclusively reflective passages, occasionally, however, of no small purport, and who did all that could be expected from so accomplished a mistress of her art. Equally to be commended was Mr. Edward Lloyd, who sang not only the tenor music set down for Reuben in the first part, but that belonging to Pharaoh in the second, and who sang both admirably. Signor Foli gave appropriate weight and meaning to the character of Jacob; and last, not least, was Mr. Santley, whose Joseph, from beginning to end, was a masterpiece of vocal declamation. For the choir no praise can be deemed exaggerated. It was hard to believe that this was a first performance of so difficult a work, a work in which not only strength and quality of voices are essential, but varied expression into the bargain. Each requisite was found by these marvellous Yorkshire singers, who, although they could only have made comparatively recent acquaintance with the music, almost persuaded us to believe that they were as familiar with it as with that of The Messiah or Elijah. But with reference to this there will be more to say. The instrumental part of the performance in most instances was beyond reproach, the players, one and all, paying as much attention to Mr. Walter Macfarren as they would have done to Sir Michael Costa himself. The reception of the oratorio throughout was as hearty as the best friends of its composer could have desired. Three pieces were asked for again with such perseverance that there was no possibility of resisting the demand. These were a duet for soprano and contralto, sung by Mdlle Albani and Madame Patey, with accompaniment of women's voices; a superbly imposing chorus describing the honours conferred by Pharaoh upon Joseph; and an unaccompanied sextet which, attractive in itself, was rendered doubly so by the absolutely faultless manner in which it was sung by Mdlle Albani, Mesdames Edith Wynne and Patey, Signor Foli, Messrs E. Lloyd and Santley. At the conclusion of the oratorio Professor Macfarren was unanimously summoned forward and greeted with such a demonstration of sympathy as he will not easily forget. Best of all, however, is the fact that the demonstration was in every way merited. Musical Leeds may be congratulated on this new addition to its festival repertory.

September 24.

Mr Walter Austin, composer of a so-styled dramatic cantata, The Fire King, the other "novelty" of last week's Musical Festival, may be congratulated on the apparent satisfaction it afforded to an audience some 1,500 in number. The libretto is constructed, by Miss Maud Hargraves, upon Scott's familiar legendary romance bearing the title accepted by the Leeds musician—for Mr Walter Austin is, we hear, as much a Yorkshireman as was the late Sterndale Bennett, who has conferred no less honour upon Sheffield than, it is to be hoped, some time hence, Mr Austin may be enabled to confer upon Leeds. Meanwhile, in the opinion of many thoughtful persons, The Fire King is hardly a subject well adapted to the peculiar bent of Mr Austin's genius, which seems to lie more immediately within the domain of ballad opera. The most successful piece in the whole work, indeed—a song, "The past is but a troubled dream"—might have been signed "Balfe," and is very much in the manner of that composer, who wrote simple ballads with such fluency as to encourage innumerable followers to imagine they could do the same with equal readiness, and "in the enthusiasm of their balladising," as Herr Wagner in his own inimitably characteristic way would express it, to deluge the world with compositions born only to die with as little regret for their sudden vanishing as there had been pleasure at their sudden apparition. These industrious producers, however, were by no means Balfes; and so, while a great many of Balfe's ballads, "ephemeral" as they were voted, continue to live and flourish, as healthy things enough, according to the peculiar method of their conception, so the fancied inspirations of many of his immediate contemporaries, and many of those who outlived or came after him, are utterly forgotten, even if at the time of their first production they really may be said to have created any impression whatever. With regard to the libretto of The Fire King, presuming that Scott's ballad is more or less familiar to the majority of our readers who interest themselves in such matters, it is unnecessary to state anything beyond the fact that the subject has in no way been unskillfully handled. On the contrary, the verses are creditably written, while the story, in spite of certain modifications here and there, is pretty closely followed. Almost the same kind of praise may be extended to the music of Mr Walter Austin. Without any pretensions to scholarship, it is fluent, occasionally graceful, and for the larger part nicely written for the voices. Of what is termed, by convention, "originality," there is not a spark; but this is now-a-days a venial fault. Mr Austin aims at very little, and in attaining that little is tolerably sure of his mark. What he has done, however comparatively trifling, is, after all, better than ambitious pretence, unbacked by adequate mechanical resources, or than the "sound and fury signifying nothing" which of recent years the musical public has had repeatedly to take into account. To give a description in detail of the cantata would answer no purpose, inasmuch as it hardly contains a single number that is not of the most unmistakably ad captandum character. Whether, at the same time, The Fire King is a work of sufficient merit to entitle it to a place in the scheme of a grand festival is a question we should feel disposed to answer emphatically in the negative. Mr Austin was fortunate alike in his chorus, orchestra, and leading singers (Mmes Osgood and Patey, Messrs Lloyd, C. Tovey, and Foli), who, as well as Mr Thomas Wingham, who conducted the work, all did their utmost to insure an effective performance. At the end he was called forward.

There remains yet to speak of the miscellaneous concerts, morning and evening, which have formed by no means the least attractive features in the programme of this in all respects interesting festival. To Professor Macfarren's new oratorio we shall, as promised, shortly return. The most interesting and varied miscellaneous selection of the week was that in which the names of Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven were combined in a single programme. There was the best known of Bach's two settings of the Magnificat, together with the imperishable Requiem of Mozart, and the one oratorio of Beethoven, not this time under the strangely-adopted title of Engedi, but as the Mount of Olives. A far more appropriate English version of the one affixed to his work by Beethoven himself—Christ on the Olive Mount—would have been still closer. For this adaptation we are indebted to the Rev. J. Troutbeck. Between the Magnificat and the oratorio, Mozart held his own, and it must be admitted that the Requiem rather gained than lost by comparison with either. Where Mozart in this particular instance, at all events, enjoys a manifest advantage over Bach is in the exquisite melodious flow and symmetrical construction of his concerted pieces for solo vocalists, a more perfect example of which than the incomparable "Recordare" could not be cited. The quartets alone, indeed, would suffice to immortalise the Requiem, without aid from its picturesque and magnificent choruses, into the spirit and feeling of which, it may be briefly stated, the indomitable Yorkshire musicians entered with real enthusiasm. At the first bar of the sublime "Sanctus" the entire audience rose. With Bach and Beethoven, moreover, they did precisely the same, as though their fixed rule was to sing everything set down for them, no matter what, as well as they possibly can sing it, which is not far from equivalent to saying as well as it can possibly be sung. The leading vocalists in the works of Bach and Mozart were Mesdames Edith Wynne, Bolingbroke, and Patey, Signor Foli, and Messrs Shakespeare and Santley, to the first, second, fourth, and fifth of whom were assigned the quartets and solos in the Requiem, Signor Foli's services being only required for a solo in the Magnificat. In the Mount of Olives the "principals" were the same as at Gloucester, Mdle Albani being the soprano, Mr E. Lloyd, the tenor, and Mr Santley, the bass. To name these practised artists with reference to so familiar a composition as that of Beethoven is enough.

At another of the "miscellaneous" concerts there was just such a programme as we are accustomed to at evening performances.

This was an innovation worthy encouragement. At night, as has already been said, Handel's Solomon was given, which enabled many whose occupation precludes their attendance in the day to hear an oratorio, while, on the other hand, as many others who reside at inconvenient distances could enjoy the opportunity of listening to a programme comprising a symphony, overtures, instrumental solos, and vocal music in all styles. The symphony at this concert was the "No. 8" of Beethoven. The overtures were Der Freischütz and Fra Diavolo. The instrumental solo, a fantasia composed by Dr William Spark, the well-known local professor, to display "some characteristics" of the grand organ built for the opening of the Leeds Town Hall, in 1858, is clever and effectively written for the instrument, was skilfully executed, and received with marked favour. Among other features of the programme, in which most of the leading solo artists had a share, were part-songs by Mendelssohn and Morley, affording the Yorkshire choir a fresh occasion for distinction, of which they took the best advantage. A graceful duet from Mr Henry Smart's sacred cantata, Jacob, sung by Mdme Wynne and Mr Lloyd; a duet from Wagner's Flying Dutchman, by Mdle Albani and Mr Santley; "Angels ever bright and fair," given in perfection by Mdle Albani; and Meyerbeer's air, "The Monk," sung in Italian by Signor Foli, were also included, the concert terminating with a superb performance of Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, in which the chorus and orchestra were beyond praise, and the solo parts were admirably delivered by Mdle Redeker and Messrs E. Lloyd and Santley.

On the following evening the miscellaneous programme contained, among other pieces, Joachim Raff's symphony in G minor, his most effective work of the kind, perhaps because his least diffuse. The overtures to Semiramide and Jessonda, in which Rossini and Spohr, while showing that they could both write good music, showed equally how little they had in common, were also comprised in the orchestral part of the selection. Added to these was the poetically-conceived and artistically-developed concert overture, Die Waldnymph, one of Sterndale Bennett's most important contributions to the repertory of the Leipsic Gewandhaus. Never, perhaps, had this beautiful work been executed with more care and refinement in every detail than on the present occasion, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, who could not have taken more pains had it been his own production. The remainder of the programme consisted of pieces more or less familiar, that general favourite, Mdme Sinico, being added to the company of leading vocalists.

The "Popular Concert" on the closing night was a brilliant success. Victoria Hall was crowded in every part. The artists, including Sir Michael Costa, gave their gratuitous services.

HAMBURG.—Gluck's Orpheus und Eurydice was recently produced at the Stadttheater—for the first time in this town.

ST PETERSBURGH.—According to a correspondent of Le Ménestrel, the Imperial Theatres of this capital have re-opened, after remaining closed for the usual time during the summer, just as if the country were not plunged in a terrible war. The French company have revived Le Fils naturel, by Alexandre Dumas, and Le Village, by Octave Feuillet. The German Theatre announces the début of Mdle Marie Spettini, from the Theatre Royal, Dresden. At the Grand Theatre, while awaiting the Italian Opera, ballet reigns supreme. At the Russian Operahouse, they are playing M. Anton Rubinstein's Demon and Macchabees. The Italian season will commence on the 15th October. Among the many names, more or less celebrated, of artists engaged, figure those of Meades Nilsson, D'Angeri, Scalchi, Rosetti, Marziali, Levasseur, Gerster, Pozzoni; Signori Masini, Stagno, Sylva, Campanini, Ciampi, and Goula, the last as conductor. The prospectus promises Cing-Mars, Carmen, Una Vendetta Catalana, Niccolò dei Lapi, Giovanna di Guzman, Il Profeta, Roberto, Semiramide, Gli Ugonotti, Linda, Romeo, L'Ebreo, Aida, La Sonnambula, I Puritani, L'Africana, Faust, Amleto, Rigoletto, La Traviata, Lucia, Marta, Mignon, Don Giovanni, Il Trovatore, Dinorah, Il Barbiere, Poliuto, Macbeth, and Norma. If the manager carries out all he has promised, the artists will have enough to do during the three or four months of the season, but experience has shown that managers' promises, in as far as regards their doom to be broken, resemble pie-crust quite as much as the promises of other people.

Attached to the Berlin Opera, were two Italian male singers, who may be taken as models, since both, Concialini and Porporino, were European celebrities of the first class. Concerning Giovanni Carlo Concialini, an exhaustive notice was published in the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung some years back. I will here merely remark that he was a member of the Berlin Opera down to 1796, when he was pensioned, and that his most brilliant period extended from 1771 to 1775, which was also the period during which he performed with Mad. Mara.—Porporino's proper name was Anton Huber, or, as Italianised, Antonio Uberti. He was descended from a German family, though born at Verona in 1719. His father, a native of Germany, was David Huber, or Hubert, from which latter the singer derived his name of Uberti. He was a soldier, and, while fighting in the Imperial cavalry against the Turks, was made prisoner and carried off into slavery. At the expiration of three years, he found means to escape, reached Austria in safety, and proceeded to Verona. He took service with the Venetians and rose to be a captain of cavalry, marrying at a late period of his life. Of twelve brothers and sisters, Anton was the youngest. He seems to have been educated with great care, but there was certainly no notion of making a singer of him. That he became one was the result of an accident. In his thirteenth year, he was one day amusing himself with jumping over palings with some companions of his own age. In doing so, he had a severe fall, and crushed himself very badly. Actuated by fear, he concealed his misfortune from his parents, till at length all remedies were unavailing, and a painful operation had to be performed. This caused his relatives great sorrow. A musician, a friend of the boy's parents, discovered, however, that the boy possessed a fine voice; and his offer to give him lessons was joyfully accepted. The boy's voice developed itself admirably; and the teacher soon found himself compelled to confess that he had exhausted his art. Antonio was now sent to Naples, where, under Porpora, he became so fine a singer that the famous master insisted on the pupil's combining the master's name with his own. Thus it came to pass that Anton Huber was known and celebrated under the name of Porporino. After being dismissed by Porpora, he sang with the greatest success in Rome, Messina, Palermo, and all the larger towns of Italy, until engaged for Berlin in 1740. These Italian engagements were, as we know, generally arranged by Count Cataneo, the Prussian Minister resident at Venice; but, in 1740, though then in the field, the King despatched his own cabinet courier to Italy, for he wanted to raise his Opera, on the model of that in Dresden, to the highest possible pitch of excellence. Nor, in this case, did he spare expense. He even ordered an offer of four thousand thalers, a very considerable sum for those days, to be made the singer, Pinti, but the latter declined it. Steffanino, Paulino, and Signora Molteni were then engaged simultaneously with Porporino. From that time forward, Porporino remained in Berlin, actively engaged at the Opera for full thirty-four years. He died on the 20th January, 1783. He was distinguished above many other singers of the period by the correctness and certainty of his singing, so that, unlike some of them, he never reduced the conductor to despair. But what was especially praised in him was his extraordinary dramatic talent, which was something in which Italian singers were as a rule far from shining.

It was to these two artists, then, that the King directed the new vocalist for instruction in the specially Italian style, and, thanks to the striking industry she had always exhibited, and which she exhibited on this occasion also, she made, in a short time, that style her own. In March, 1771, she appeared in Potsdam for the first time, and in the same opera, Pyramo e Tisbe, of which she had to sing a portion when on her trial. Despite her awkwardness on the stage, she pleased the King so highly that he looked forward with confidence to a new era for his Opera, better than it had previously known. And he was not mistaken. In consequence of his having been absent a great deal from Berlin and Potsdam, he let the Opera have a rest till the Carnival. But the very first performance, a performance of Graun's Britannicus, proved that the German artist had become in every respect the equal of her Italian colleagues. The aria, "Mi paventi," was a perfect masterpiece of vocal art, and the public, like the King, were enraptured with the new prima donna. But the recollection that she had been refused permission to go and study in Italy was a worm that kept incessantly gnawing at her heart, and the triumphs she achieved could not recompense her for the disappointment. With her defiant spirit, always inclined to opposition, we may assume that she did not keep her feelings on the subject concealed even from the King himself. In short, from the very first, there was a sentiment of discontent between the two; in her eyes, submission to a despotic and strong will was oppressive servitude, and the numerous marks of friendship and esteem she received from the public rendered her dependence doubly irksome. This state of mind is displayed only too clearly in a letter she wrote to a friend in Leipzig. We read in it: "I get many notes and letters from poets and authors here, French and German; yesterday, too, I received a communication from Canon Gleim, of Halberstadt, written in a very childish and amorous style, altogether unworthy, methinks, of a man holding a clerical title. I receive, moreover, offers of marriage; a short time since I actually had one from an old general with seven bullets in his body; they are gradually to be cut out of him, probably in the course of our married life; I declined the offer with thanks, and threw the other letters into the fire. A fine idea to suppose I would marry, and have to acknowledge the will of a second man over me. Poor me, who am already so sunk in slavery." Antipathy for the entire male creation cannot well be more plainly expressed; yet love and marriage came, and were the very things which subsequently caused her endless grief and sorrow, crushing her, for years, bodily and mentally to the ground.

MUSIC AND PAINTING.

Mr Ruskin, in the July number of his "Fors Clavigera,"* points out how much more general progress has been made during the last twenty years in the appreciation of good music than in our knowledge and love of good pictures. "The reason is easily found. Our music has been chosen for us by masters. When we ascertained that Mr Hallé could play, we did not go to the man at the music shop and pay him fifty guineas commission for recommending us a new tune! If we can imagine exhibitions, where good, bad, and indifferent symphonies, quartets, and songs could be heard—not more imperfectly than pictures, good, bad, and indifferent are to be seen at the Academy—and works to which at a concert we must listen for twenty minutes were to be listened through in as many seconds, or indeed by an ear-glance at a few bars, can we doubt that pretty tunes would be more popular than the finest symphonies of Beethoven, or the loveliest of Schubert's songs?"

"The suddenly luminous idea that art might possibly be a lucrative occupation secured the submission of England to such instruction as, with that object, she could procure: and the professorship of Sir Henry Cole at Kensington has corrupted the system of art-teaching all over England into a state of abortion and falsehood, from which it will take twenty years to recover. The professorships also of Messrs Agnew at Manchester have covered the walls of that metropolis with 'exchangeable property,' on the exchanges of which the dealer always made his commission, and of which perhaps one canvas in a hundred is of some intrinsic value, and may be hereafter put to good and permanent use. But the first of all conditions for this object is that the Manchester men should, for a little while, 'choose for themselves'; that they should buy nothing with intent to sell it again; and that they should buy it of the artist only, face to face with him, or from the Exhibition wall by direct correspondence with him."

BERLIN.—Glück's Armida was to have been revived at the Royal Operahouse, on the 23rd inst.—the date, by the way, of its first production at the Royal Academy of Music, Paris, a century ago—but the performance had to be deferred in consequence of Herr Niemann's inability to appear. Professor Julius Stern has added to his celebrated Conservatory an Operatic School, for the especial benefit of pupils desirous of appearing on the lyric stage.

A CLIMB TO CLOUDLAND.

(From a Holiday Correspondent.)

I think it is Mrs Browning who speaks of the mountains as drawing us up from the "vile flats" of common life; and unless they really exert some mysterious influence I cannot explain why, on a certain day, I took the trouble to go to the top of Snowdon. Judged by the rules that ordinarily guide human action, my adventure was about as unreasonable as anything could well be. Men go up mountains for the sake of pleasurable exertion or for the prospect revealed. But when the rain pours down, and the clouds are no higher than a church steeple, flats, be they ever so vile, are preferable. I knew this well; nevertheless, I climbed up Y Wyddfa, and, what is more, met with a friend equally under the charm that kept common-sense in abeyance. We went up together, Overall and I, attended by an unwilling sharer of our fortunes, my companion having a suspicion of places along the route where the four legs of a horse could do better and quicker work than his own two. I would rather have left Diamond in his stable, because, amid all the infatuation of the moment, there was just the glimmer of an idea that we were making fools of ourselves, and that the presence of the horse blurted out the fact to everybody. Without Diamond we might have passed as tourists, performing the usual damp pilgrimage to the waterfall, but a horse going in that direction means Snowdon and nothing else. Revealed to all observers, therefore, were our intentions, and if we did not pass as a couple of lunatics it was simply because the natives hereabouts are used to the eccentric action of the British tourist, and have acquired with regard to him that state of mind which marvels at nothing. Nevertheless, I could have spared even the few observers who watched our start. It was not such an impressive start as the essential foolishness of the enterprise demanded for the concealment of its real character. I had an idea of this at the time, but now I am convinced that it was an ignominious start. Overall might, at least, have bestridden his mountain steed, assumed his most gallant bearing, and gone forth as a knight to victory. But perhaps he was well advised to throw the reins over his arm, and trudge his watery way by my side, for a horse less likely than Diamond to make an impressive effect never spent his days in carrying people up hill. Anyhow, we sneaked away in the manner described from the ken of the damp idlers about the hotel doors, and were soon lost to sight in the little wood whereat the ascent begins.

Even then and there, amid rain, mist, and wind, sundry tourists, driven from the deadly liveliness of the coffee-room, were wandering about with no purpose more obvious than getting themselves well wetted through. They had visited the waterfall, perhaps, and yielded to the temptation of going higher. But they led no horse, and we knew that Snowdon was not within their thoughts. What they, in turn, divined of our intentions seemed perfectly clear, if the blank stare of astonishment, or the more or less derisive grin had any meaning at all. "But," we said to one another, in comforting tones, "he who carries the 'Excelsior' banner must stick to it, though maidens allure and old men warn;" and as we were neither tempted nor cautioned, desertion had no excuse. So, when quite beyond mortal ken, Overall ascended Diamond, and we addressed ourselves in grim earnest to our task. It was far from pleasant work, for raindrops driven by mountain winds at their worst have a habit of hitting like hailstones, while, on Snowdon at any rate, the waters prefer to seek their level by running down the beaten track. Our road, therefore, rough at the best, lay along the course of a stream, up which man and beast floundered and splashed with many a slip and slide. Yet did we deem ourselves fortunate, and once or twice were on the point of actually expressing pity for the miserable beings in the coffee-rooms below. As each early stage of the ascent was reached, the prospect, so far as it went, became more and more stern. The Llanberis lakes in our rear stood out clear in what was, by comparison, brightness itself, but, ahead and on either hand, every summit wore its mantle of cloud, while slopes and valleys appeared and disappeared as masses of vapour were driven along by the wind. Thus half revealed, the scene might have been one of Alpine magnificence and grandeur; nor did fancy omit to supply, on the largest scale, that which the eye could not discern. This was our utmost recompense for the labour and discomfort of the journey, inasmuch as we soon met a dripping tourist—only less a maniac than ourselves, because he was coming down while we were going up—who told us that all above was a hopeless cloud, and pointed to a ragged fringe of vapour as the limit of vision. During our brief halt, Diamond turned his head down hill, as who should say, Even my brute brain comprehends the wisdom of surrender. But we, having a coffee-room and not a stable below, were made of sterner stuff. Once more had Diamond to breast the slope, till the half-way hut was reached, and Owen Williams—or Jones, was it?—and a broad-faced Welsh damsel, met us with a welcome, tempered by undisguised astonishment. It was a bad day for Owen Williams, or Jones, and he told us so with an emphatic "Yes, indeed," which perhaps, led Overall to order a bottle of soda-water on the spot, by way of solatium. That exhilarating compound imbibed, we entered upon the stiffest part of the ascent, the hut and its tenants vanishing with startling celerity in the ever increasing mist. Close ahead now was the ragged fringe. Another minute and it touched our faces; another, and we were in Cloudland, with the whole earth reduced to a few square yards of strong soil, across which swept the vicious rain. Happily, the path could be made out with sufficient clearness, and up it we struggled, beaten upon by the elements as though it were a combat à outrance between us and them. In his dumb way, Diamond showed a gradually increasing dislike of the whole proceeding. As each more bitter blast struck us, he would veer round like a weathercock and expose to it the broadest part of his person, or stand still with drooping head and woe-begone aspect till the wind had expended its violence and retired to gather more. But now the ascent became less steep, and we knew that our way lay along a ridge with precipices on either hand terrible to see, more terrible to approach without seeing. Down into the very foundations of the earth seemed to sink the imprisoning wall of cloud as we cautiously neared the brink of the abyss. Beyond that jagged edge lay the infinite—a space the mind was as powerless to fathom as the eye to penetrate, and it was not without a shudder that we kept a sharp look-out for the path of safety. The storm now did its worst, howling and dashing over the ridge as though to sweep off every intruder upon its "ancient, solitary reign." But we fought with equal resolution, and presently the increasing steepness of the ascent showed the summit to be near. A few more minutes and the cairn loomed above us. Diamond was turned into a rough pen of stones, and we scrambled up the last few yards into the enclosure made by the hospitable huts, from one of which smoke issued invitingly. This was the goal of all our efforts. We were in Cloudland. "Georgeous land," Wordsworth called it, who looked from the distance that lent enchantment. To us it was much the same as a grey and very wet blanket suspended within six feet of our noses. Peering keenly over the parapet into the depths, a few yards of the grim pinnacle on which we stood could be made out. The rest was blanket and a platform of weather-beaten rock, with, presently, the more agreeable apparition of an open door and a kindly wondering face. Hearing other sounds than the roar of the storm, the hut-keeper had peered out preparatory to inviting his besodden visitors warmly in. What a change; One moment blown upon, rain-dashed, fogged, and bewildered; the next sitting in a cosy interior where a fire blazed merrily, and a comfortable house-wife read in her native Welsh a report of the Carnarvon Eisteddfod! Down below I should have styled the hut and all its appurtenances rough; here it seemed a palace in the completeness of its comfort, while the elemental uproar outside served but to enhance the enjoyment of its occupants. But even at the height of 3,500 feet one is not above considerations of prudence in the matter of wet clothes, nor in this particular case dared we ignore the coming on of night. Emerging from the hut, the wind seemed to spring upon us like a wild beast. Soon, however, we had Diamond again in tow, and were cautiously feeling our way along the ridge, resisting the poor old horse's efforts to edge from the blast and seek shelter in the appalling leeward depths. The ridge traversed, the rest was easy, and in due course our melancholy procession arrived at the point whence it had set out, decidedly wetter, somewhat sadder, and so much wiser that the biped members of it will henceforth imitate their four-footed friend by not willingly, under any like conditions, climbing to Cloudland.

THE ANGEL'S CALL.*

I saw a vision fair and bright; An angel called me in the night— Come with me.	A pang shot thro' the Mother's heart; Shemurmur'd, Child, we must not part, Stay with me.
Dear Mother, here I cannot stay, But grieve not, for I must away; I still can hear that sweet voice say— Come with me.	Thy Father to his rest hath gone; Thy brothers, sisters, all are down; My child, I have but thee alone— Stay with me.
Alas, for helpless human love! The voice soon lured the child above— Come with me.
The Mother could not all resign; To her then came that form benign; She followed, too, that voice divine— Come with me!

S. P. HOWELL.

Punch at Leeds.

(Our Representative Man at a Musical Festival.)

Your Representative is a man of his word; he said last week he would go to Leeds, for the great Musical Festival, and faithfully has he kept his promise.

The arrival, at the Leeds Station, of Your Representative, was, I need hardly say, a triumph. The demonstration of one porter was something to see. It was immense—for threepence. As for the cabman, his enthusiasm was so overwhelming (he had been waiting for a job all day, he said, and this was the first money he'd taken) that he would willingly have removed his horse from the shafts, and have drawn the vehicle himself to the Queen's Hotel, had I only made it worth his while.

A magnificent spectacle the Hall, sir, on the entry of Yours truly. Chorus of ladies high up in the air, like sweet singing birds, on either side of the orchestra, and the male voices crowding the middle. Such a chorus! Such an audience! After bowing to the Mayor and the committee, and intimating to Mr. Wingham that the business of the evening might commence, the band at once struck up the overture to the new cantata, The Fire King.

A prophet is not great, as a rule, I believe, in his own country, and if Elijah were given down in Judæa, I've no doubt he wouldn't be thought much of, therefore as Mr. Walter Austin, the composer of the new cantata, is said to be "A native of Leeds" (and why not?), he ought to be highly gratified with the reception accorded to his work, and to himself, when cheered, at the conclusion, by the other natives of Leeds, who had not written cantatas.

Mrs. Osgood and Mdme. Patey did their best, the latter singing such a low note that the occupants of the front row of stalls looked under their seats, as if for something that the lady had dropped, and which they were polite enough to pick up for her. Mr. Lloyd was enthusiastically and deservedly encored (though the encore was sensibly not taken) in a ballad of the Balfé style, "The past is but a troubled dream," which ought to be immensely popular everywhere, and would make the fortune of any drawing-room tenor; and in "To Arms! To Arms!" which he gave in such spirited style, as caused Your Representative to regret that the singer was not in a Tannhäuser-like suit of armour, addressing a crowd of chorus and supers attired as warriors of the most unlimited bravery. For success, the cantata was, from the first tenor song, "insured at Lloyd's."

Setting aside the occasion of its production (and, undeniably, the work was not big enough for the great Leeds Festival), the composer is to be congratulated on the cantata itself, taken for what it is, and affording much promise for the future. If, in choosing this exceptional time for a first attempt, Mr. Austin's friends showed more zeal than discretion, it must not be forgotten that in the North the reading of the old proverb is, "Friends in Leeds are friends in deeds," and a young composer cannot be blamed for jumping at such an offer.

But what of Professor Macfarren's Joseph? Magnificently interpreted by Mdle. Albani, Meadames Edith Wynne and Patey, Messrs. Santley, Lloyd, Signor Foli, and the unrivalled Chorus, which is the crown and glory of the Leeds Festival, the new oratorio achieved an unequivocal success. It was indeed a touching spectacle when the gifted Composer was led forward by his brother to hear the acclamations which resounded from every part of the hall.

Fresh from the scene, I confess myself unwilling to treat lightly one single detail of this great performance. For some future time I will reserve what remarks I have to offer on the libretto and style of oratorios generally, where the sublime so often touches the ridiculous; but, for this present, I can only say that to have heard the first performance of Joseph at the Leeds Festival, and to have assisted, heart and voice, at the ovation given to Professor Macfarren, will ever be remembered as a real and true pleasure by Your Representative.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Permit me to add a few words to a well-worn theme, respecting which Mr. Chappell addressed a letter to you (Sept. 15). It is possible, nay, probable, that Carey had a hand in manufacturing the National Anthem; perhaps he wrote the words. But that the tune was stolen from Dr. Bull I am fully convinced, from ample proof in my possession, about which I shall by-and-by have more to say.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

Brackley Villa, Thurlow Park Road, Dulwich.

DÜSSELDORF.—The next Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine is to be held here at Whitsuntide, 1878. M. Anton Rubinstein will act as conductor, and some of his more important vocal works, together with his "Dramatic Symphony," will be performed.

"TWA HOURS AT HAME" WITH THE KENNEDY FAMILY.

It is now more than seven years since Mr. Kennedy was delighting us with his Scottish entertainments at Hanover Square Rooms. Fresh from foreign lands, he was brimful of anecdotes of his experiences in the United States, South America, California, Canada, &c. In like manner he comes again after singing "round the world" for more than four years. Wherever our language is spoken a Scottish audience is to be found, and this Mr. Kennedy has so well experienced that his genial face can only be seen here at rare intervals. The world has pronounced him to be the Prince of Scottish Vocalists of his day, and wherever he goes the cry is ever "Will ye no' come back again?" In London we have hitherto been accustomed to hear "The Kennedy" alone, gracefully "accompanied" by Miss Kennedy. But now the clan comes in force, no less than five talented members of the family taking a part in the concerts, one and all possessing rare natural and musical abilities. Mr. Kennedy is, no doubt, still the backbone of the entertainment, but he may well be proud of his "bairns," as he is wont to designate them; and they are really a great credit to him. London is now said to be empty, but the large and enthusiastic audiences which welcomed the Scottish vocalists at St. James's Hall, on Monday and Wednesday evenings, gave good promise that Mr. Kennedy had not erred in venturing upon twelve nights in the great hall; and they must be strangely constituted who do not at once feel very much at home in the "Twa Hours at Hame." Those who would hear the "auld Scots sangs" sung as they ought to be would do well to take advantage of this opportunity, and the sons and daughters of Scotland, in particular, must be irresistibly drawn towards those who can so powerfully thrill every pulse of their hearts. Of late we have had no lack of Scotch concerts, which have been deservedly successful; but, however artistically the music has been rendered by our best London vocalists, it was not the "wood-notes wild" inspired by "the land of brown heath and shaggy wood;" it reminded not of the bracken, the broom, and the heather; and not only so, but for the thoroughly genuine impersonation of Scottish character in such songs as "Hame cam' our gudeman at e'en," "The women are a' gane wud," "Tam Glen," &c., the nice perception of the ridiculous in "There cam' a young man," "Duncan Gray," "Last May a braw wooer," "Jenny's bawbee," &c., the thrilling force, heroic or pathetic, in "Scots wha hae," "I'm wearin' awa' Jean," "Annie's tryste," &c.; for all such the vocalist must be to the manner born in order successfully "to hold, as 'twere, the mirror up to nature." Percolating through ages, from a mother's lips is imparted the true traditional style; and whether it be in the grave, the gay, the heroic, or the pathetic, we have in Mr. Kennedy a masterly interpreter of his country's songs—in the heroic, irresistible as the waves of the Atlantic, or as the mountain spate; in lovesongs, melodious as the lark's or the lintie's lay. As we listen to his "Scots wha hae," we are forcibly reminded of one of his own experiences. Visiting Richmond shortly after its fall, and before the doomed city had risen from its ashes, he had just given the grand address of Bruce to his army, when an old Scot, who had risked and lost all for the South, sprang to his feet, exclaiming—"Kennedy, sing 'Scots wha hae' round the South and we'll hae another fecht yet!" Mr. Kennedy has an individuality quite his own. He is, in a word, like his great predecessors, Templeton and Wilson, thoroughly original—possessing a style realistic as a Tenniers, a Wilkie, or a Faed, he is not only a most accomplished vocalist, but also an effective and graceful actor. It was a pleasing link with the past to notice on Wednesday night, as we have done at previous concerts of Mr. Kennedy's, the grand snow-capt head of John Templeton.

But now we must return to the junior members of the family. Their Glee singing forms quite a prominent feature in the programme, and, as Mr. Kennedy aptly remarked, the fine old glees of England are fit to vie with any national music; and such gems as "Blow, gentle gales," "The cloud-capt towers," &c., as also the part-songs, were rendered with a taste and precision rarely equalled. Every item in the programme, in fact, seemed to have received the most intelligent study and careful practice—everything being sung from memory. The songs generally were given with a natural force and expression which was quite refreshing. We would particularly notice Miss Kennedy's sweetly simple rendering of "Kind Robin lo'es me" and "The lang awa ship," and Miss Marjory's equally charming voice and style in "The four Maries" and "Ca' the yowes to the knowes;" David delighted and stirred his audience with "The march of the Cameron men;" Robert displayed a voice of much promise in "O Nannie, wilt thou gang wi' me"; and James, who possesses a rich baritone voice, was equally felicitous in the quaint old song of "The Golden Vanities." Of Mr. Kennedy himself we would just say, in conclusion, that he returns to us with powers not only unabated, but, if possible, improved.

MACFARREN'S JOSEPH AT LEEDS.

(From "The Yorkshire Post and Leeds Intelligencer.")

Before recording the event of yesterday, a memorable one in the history of music, we feel bound once more to revert to the previous day. If the committee had desired to make their mistake of Wednesday night as glaring as possible, they could not have done so more effectually than with Elijah as a prelude, and Walpurgis Night and Solomon to follow. We mention these last works again because we desire to repeat the opinion expressed yesterday as to the wonderful excellence of their performance. That opinion, formed at the time, was more than justified, but, after hearing the works of the greatest masters even respectably performed, the lover of good music is so liable to lose a critical balance that we are glad now deliberately to repeat that yesterday the Leeds Festival band and chorus covered themselves with glory, and arrived at that point of excellence beyond which it is impossible to advance. After Mendelssohn, Beethoven, and Handel on Thursday, Macfarren yesterday. Professor Macfarren is not a Handel, or a Mendelssohn, nor does he slavishly imitate them or confine himself to any particular school of writing. He is simply Macfarren, a name hereafter to be honoured in musical history, and to make the professor's chair at Cambridge memorable for the two great musicians who have held it in succession. It will be remembered that at the last Festival the Professor had a place with St John the Baptist. This work delighted all who heard it, especially those who appreciate learned writing. The oratorio yesterday perhaps appeals to wider sympathies with its beautiful melodies and colour. At any rate, whether the work is heard many a time again, or is forgotten (a very unlikely and unreasonable event), the performance yesterday will mark the present Festival as an important event in the history of music. Mr Walter Macfarren, who so lovingly devotes his own great talents to the study and interpretation of his brother's masterpiece, conducted. It will be as well to admit at once that after the first hearing of so important a work, and on the day of hearing, it is impossible to do full justice to it. The small tribute of praise which we can render is the composer's due. The work is dedicated thus:—"In remembrance of happy hours spent in its inscription, this oratorio is dedicated to my pupil, friend, and amanuensis, Oliveria Louisa Prescott." The work is great in design and execution, and seemed to demand from the audience a front rank in the greatest musical compositions, or rejection as an over-reaching ambition. The challenge was accepted by the audience, and at the close the answer might have been heard in the streets outside, as cheer followed upon cheer. . . . Throughout the oratorio Dr Macfarren has been (with one or two exceptions) above all things original. He tells the beautiful story of Joseph's life, commencing with the brothers' treachery, and ending with the arrival of the Patriarch Jacob to witness his son's glory, in the most dramatic musical language. Every phrase must have been the result of intense care and study, arising from a fine artistic sense, an appreciation of sacred words which would have distinguished the Professor as a theologian of matured experience. From the first bar to the last the work is a surprise—a wonder to those who thought that Music had said all she had to say, and that no resources of novelty were left open. The orchestral colouring is most remarkable, especially in the gorgeous and barbaric choruses of the Court of Pharaoh, a word pronounced throughout, by-the-bye, as Faro, with the accent on the first syllable. One of the most remarkable features in the oratorio is the frequent and unexpected changes of the key-note, a device certainly not new, but hitherto seldom resorted to with such extraordinary effect, while in the melodic structure the intervals are most surprising, taxing the powers of the singers to the utmost. Had many serious blunders occurred in such music there would have been little wonder; as it is, the wonder is all the other way that band, chorus, and solo singers should have done so much justice to the work. They all appeared, however, to love it and, to a great extent, understand it. The programme will show how the parts were allotted, and the great names put down for the principal ones.

The "principals" did their duty to the music, and were rewarded with almost incessant applause. Mr Cheshire, the harpist, deserves honourable mention for the good service he did in the accompaniments to the relation of the dreams. The audience throughout cannot so well be described appreciative, as positively excited and sympathetic. Sir Michael Costa, who, we believe, is engaged on another oratorio called Joseph, was a listener. Though the work bears evidence throughout of the hand of a musical scholar learned in all structural devices, the fugal treatment of a subject is sparingly introduced. We have the first fugue in "Honour thy father and thy mother"—a very fine chorus. The solo, "Love is strong as death," was finely sung by Mdlle Albani, who came out with flying colours. In the last phrase we should like to know whether the artist was giving us Macfarren or Albani. Once or twice it appeared that alterations had been made in the published score, possibly by the composer himself.* The oratorio occupied a little over three hours in performance; and although there is little of the music we should like to part with, it is an open question whether some of the dialogue, and some of the didactic numbers, could not be spared. Dr Monk, author of the libretto, has occasional extracts from the Book of Psalms. No composer could desire a better librettist, but it is rather strange that he should put in the mouth of Joseph the words, "We have walked in the house of God as companions," as there was no house of God until the Tabernacle in the wilderness. The enthusiasm of the audience was immense at the chorus of the Ishmaelites, with the picturesque tinkling of percussion instruments and the beautiful melody crescendo from pianissimo to full, and the remarkable concluding phrase, "We will take him to Egypt, and can sell him to Potiphar." The duet with chorus, "Commit thy way unto the Lord," was very fine, and was re-demanded and repeated. Here, however, we must make an exception in our remarks about originality. There was a remarkable reminiscence of Mendelssohn about it. What modern musician has ever freed himself of the influence of Mendelssohn? The last number of the first part, the chorus, "A voice was heard," was the finest of all in that part, passing from C minor to C major in "Refrain thy voice from weeping,"—a beautiful movement, which in the interval was hummed by numerous listeners as they took their meditative airing on the pavement outside.

In the second part we are introduced to the Court of Pharaoh with gorgeous choruses of stupendous power, commencing with "Lord of Diadema." Both strings and reed instruments were very fine, and the trumpets and trombones were splendid. The soprano had another beautiful air, "Hath not God?" and there is nothing more remarkable in this oratorio than the beauty of the airs, hitherto not supposed to be Dr. Macfarren's strongest point. The chorus, "See! Pharaoh hath set Joseph," was magnificent, and here again the instruments of percussion did great service. The chorus was beyond praise, taking up the leads with great precision. The applause was something furious, and a repeat could hardly have been refused by Sir Michael Costa, much less by a brother of the composer. Space and time preclude a notice of this work at all commensurate with its grandeur. One or two of the remaining numbers, however, demand mention—among them the devotional chorus, "O! Lord, have mercy upon us," with its exquisite counterpoint, the magnificent air (one of the finest ever written by any composer), "Wherefore let us run with patience the race that is set before us," in which the Professor seems to reveal his whole soul of faith to us, the aëstet, "Forgive" (repeated), the dramatic revelation of Joseph to his brethren, and the final fugue, "Sing unto the Lord." It was a great work, grandly performed, and listened to with eager interest until the last bar. Then followed a scene never to be forgotten. There was a persistent roar until the blind Professor was led into the orchestra, and the cheering was renewed again and again. No need, Professor, to be so overcome with emotion! This is but the first instalment of the tribute of praise which the lovers of the true and good in Art shall pay you in the time to come as you take your just place with the worthies whose names are remembered when the wearers of crowns are forgotten and dynasties have crumbled to dust.

* With the composer's hearty assent.—D. P.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1877.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—There is nothing new under the sun; and, therefore, it is only natural that the belief entertained by many with regard to the efficacy of music as a curative agent should have existed in ancient times before being broached at the present day. In the mythology of Greece and Rome, Apollo is represented as the god of medicine as well as of music, and there can be no doubt that music and therapeutics are more nearly connected than is generally imagined. Still, as Dickens makes one of his characters observe: "We must draw the line somewhere." The personage who lays down the maxim illustrates theory by practice and draws the line at bakers. But there are individuals no more to be stopt by bakers than the progress of Ocean, that Mighty Monster, is, when thoroughly aroused, to be arrested by the Admiralty Pier at Dover. They belong to the class described by Molière:—

"La nature a pour eux des bornes trop petites;
En chaque caractère ils passent ses limites,
Et la plus noble chose, ils la gâtent souvent
Pour la vouloir outrer et pousser trop avant."

I am afraid that among the number of these irresistible enthusiasts I must place Citizen Roger, who, in a Thesis sustained by him at Montpellier, in 1769, under the title of Tentamen de Vi Soni et Musices in Corpus humanum, gives some wonderful instances of the power exercised by music over the victims of ill-health and disease. Music, he asserts, dissipates the sad effects of sombre melancholy, hypochondria, hystericism, imbecility, and madness; stops epileptic fits and prevents their recurrence; suspends the tortures of gout and sciatica, securing the patient against a relapse; restores vital energy when exhausted by long attacks; facilitates and expedites difficult cases of convalescence; puts an end to the disorders of an excited imagination, holding captive the violent efforts which the latter provokes, and disarming the hand about to commit a crime; dispels the cruel fears caused by the bite of an animal suspected of rabies, and ensures mental tranquillity and bodily health to persons condemned by prejudice, and frequently without good reason, to agonies more terrible than death itself.

"Why," enquires Citizen Desessarts—in a paper read before the French National Institute of Science and Art, on the 20th Vendémiaire, Year XI., that is, on the 3rd October, 1792—"Why has the employment of this art, which produces such marvellous effects upon man in health and disease been discontinued by medical practitioners? Why do they not have recourse to it in cases that elude the actions of drugs which they vaunt as the most energetic?" Like Echo, we also answer "Why?" and are at a loss to explain the dense stupidity which prevented the National Convention from at once taking measures for the adoption in France of so sure and efficacious a sanitary agent. The assembly in question was not accustomed to stand on trifles. It had substituted for the ancient religion of the country the worship of Reason, though afterwards condescending to declare that the French people acknowledged the existence of the Supreme Being and the immortality of the soul. Why did it not, in face of the facts for which Citizens Roger and Desessarts vouched, decree that all hospitals should be changed into operahouses and concert-rooms; that physicians and surgeons should qualify themselves in counterpoint and harmony; and that scalpels, forceps, bistouris, et hoc genus omne, should be replaced by violins, flutes, and double basses? Their remissness may, perhaps, have arisen from their not yielding implicit credit to all the wonders related in the Montpellier Thesis. Yet those wonders were supplemented by others equally extraordinary. Citizen Bourdelot, a member of the medical profession, tells us, in his Traité sur la Musique, how a woman, driven mad by the infidelity of her lover, was restored to reason and health by three concerts, judiciously administered. The Mémoires for the year 1707 of the French Academy of Science contributes the story of a dancing-master of Alais, in Languedoc. This worthy man, having during the carnival been compelled to go through a great deal of fatigue in the discharge of his professional duties, had a violent attack of fever. On the fourth or fifth day he fell into a state of lethargy, in which he lay for a long time, and in which he had better have remained altogether, had it not been for a bright idea which struck M. Mondajor, the Mayor of the town. The unhappy follower of Terpsichore had passed from lethargy to furious but dumb delirium. He was continually endeavouring to jump out of bed, threatening with "his head and face" those who frustrated his attempts, and refusing all the remedies offered him. The Mayor suggested to the doctor that the patient might take a little music, though he rejected everything else. But the doctor, I am sorry to say, appears to have been swayed too much by personal reasons. He did not disapprove of the idea, but hesitated carrying it out for fear of the ridicule to which he might be exposed, and which, as he mildly put it, would be infinitely greater if the patient died while under such a treatment. A friend, however, of the dancing-master's was deterred by no such scruples. He could play the fiddle, and performed a number of airs with which the sick man was most familiar. He was set down as being more of a maniac than the madman in bed, and was beginning to come in for a goodly amount of personal abuse, when the patient sat up, as though agreeably surprised. The poor fellow commenced marking the measure with his head, as his arms were held down by the attendants; but when the latter, also susceptible to the charms of melody, loosened their hold, he marked the measure with his arms. In a quarter of an hour he fell into a deep sleep and, on his awaking, the crisis was surmounted. Then we have the case of the Princess Belmont Pignatelli, who, in 1776, after all the most celebrated medical men of Naples had essayed their skill in vain, owed her cure from a violent fever to the febrifugal qualities of an air of Hasse's, prescribed—and performed—by the Chevalier Raaf, who received as his fee an extremely handsome ring, which his distinguished patient presented him in token of her gratitude. Did space allow, I could cite at length a case of catalepsy in which we are informed that the aged patient, though indifferent to airs with which she was unacquainted, derived such benefit from canticles, and still more from "noëls," or Christmas carols, given her on a clarinet, that she danced; walked; went down, on the fifth day, three stories, to see her doctor out; and eventually resumed her usual avocations. As the old lady was sixty, I do not suppose, however, that those avocations were very arduous.

All these alleged facts are very strange; so much stranger, indeed, than fiction that we may fairly assume them to be true. Still, though a thorough and devoted admirer of music, I own that a dash of suspicion is mingled with my eagerness to believe. I should feel greatly obliged by some persons practically testing the matter. We have already Allopathy, Homœopathy, and Hydropathy. Why not add Melopathy to the list? I should much prefer a remedy from the works of Beethoven, Mozart, or Mendelssohn to anything mentioned in the Pharmacopœia Londoniensis; a draught from Balfe's melodic spring would be more to my taste than the most successful pill, which has enabled its inventor to spend a colossal fortune in advertisements and still remain a millionaire; and I can assure you, Mr Editor, that, if suffering from the most deeply-tinted fit of the blues, the gentleman I should best like to call in would be Doctor Arthur Sullivan, if he would only order me a good dose of Trial by Jury.

THE PROPOSED NEW OPERAHOUSE.

(To the Editor of the "Times.")

SIR,—I have read in the Times of September 1st the letter from Mr Mapleson, which that gentleman doubtless intended to be an answer to the one from myself, and which you were good enough to publish on August 22nd.

As to the first paragraph in Mr Mapleson's letter, I have to say that I published no letters on the subject of the proposed Operahouse until July in last year, and that my justification for so doing then, if any justification were necessary, was that I had the very best authority for knowing that Mr Mapleson and his coadjutors, when endeavouring to obtain subscriptions for the proposed theatre, had stated that he (Mr Mapleson) had engaged several of my principal artists to sing there. Mr Mapleson, in a certain way, denies this. I must, however, repeat my assertion.

My reason for writing my letter published last month was, not because Mr Mapleson spoke of the locality of the Royal Italian Opera—the annual subscriptions and the audiences are a sufficient reply to that—but because he insinuated that my theatre was unworthy even of the name of an Operahouse.

As to my "fanciful calculations," I took Mr Mapleson's own estimate of the cost of the building—that is, the sum which he proposed to borrow as stated in his own printed circular—viz., £250,000. This was for the building only. It would appear from Mr Mapleson's circulars and letters that, exclusive of the unforeseen expense of the foundations, work has already been done to the amount of about £50,000. Mr Mapleson avers that his architect and builder now say that £110,000 is sufficient to complete and furnish the building. Are the words "complete" and "furnish" really meant to include also the immense outlay for the fire-water supply, the gas supply, lamps and chandeliers, and the vast machinery of the stage, &c.?

As to fire insurance, Mr Mapleson quotes that of Her Majesty's Theatre, but he possibly forgets that its proprietor, Lord Dudley, is not a person at all likely to have borrowed money in respect of that building, and so not forced by a lender to insure. Lord Dudley may prefer, and probably does prefer, to be in a great measure his own insurer. Besides, I do not suppose that Her Majesty's Theatre cost one-third of the sum at which that of the proposed Operahouse is estimated.

As to the insurance on the Royal Italian Operahouse, I have within these last three years increased the amount by £48,000, and must before long again add to that; for as the stock of costumes, scenery, &c., of an operahouse increases, so ought the amount of insurance, and I have no doubt Mr Mapleson will find that, whether he borrows £100,000 or £300,000, his creditor will force him to cover pretty nearly, if not quite the full amount by insurance.

With regard to my statement that the cost of the Royal Italian Opera nearly doubled the original estimates, I, of course, did not intend to convey the meaning that the portion of the work the cost of which the architect and builders originally estimated was nearly doubled, but that the various alterations and additions which are so frequently found necessary during the progress of large buildings, and particularly in the case of theatres, brought up the ultimate cost to nearly double the sum for which it was at first supposed the whole could have been completed.

I therefore think that anyone who may take the trouble to read Mr Mapleson's own official circulars, together with his letter to the Times, dated July 14th, 1876, and those which appeared in the Times on August 4th and September 1st, 1877, and will compare them with my letters to the Times, dated respectively July 1st and July 18th, 1876, as well as with the one which appeared on August 22nd, 1877, and with this present letter, will arrive at the conclusion that my estimate as to the ultimate cost of the proposed Operahouse, should it ever be completed, furnished, and opened, are rather under than over the mark; and that whether Mr Mapleson should succeed in inducing some millionaire to do this work and let the theatre to him at a rental of £14,000 per annum, as he has proposed, or whether he obtain funds to complete the whole himself, the charge on the establishment, for rent (or interest of money), rates, taxes, insurance, and ground-rent (without reckoning any outlay for new scenery, &c.), will not be less than £24,250 per annum, and this enormous sum, be it remembered, is (less anything which may be obtained from winter lettings) really to be spread over and chargeable on an opera season of sixteen or seventeen weeks.

Permit me, sir, to take this opportunity of asking on what grounds this projected theatre has been named "The New National Operahouse," for I can see no pretence for such a title.

I would also ask on what authority it is called "Her Majesty's Opera," as I see it is in one of Mapleson's printed prospectuses, dated June 22nd, 1876. I can understand that the King's Theatre—that is the old operahouse in the Haymarket—was properly called "Her Majesty's Theatre, that title having been adopted subsequently to the death of King William IV., but I do not see why, when a troupe of artists is taken to Drury Lane, Dublin, or Edinburgh, the performance should be styled "Her Majesty's Opera."

The circumstances which occurred with regard to the titles of the London Operahouses were, as I believe, the following:—After the death of King William, there being already a theatre in London called "The Queen's," Her Majesty's permission was applied for to name the Haymarket Operahouse "Her Majesty's Theatre," and was graciously granted, and when the old Covent Garden Theatre was converted into an operahouse (1847) although it had always been a Theatre Royal, the Queen's permission to call the establishment "The Royal Italian Opera" was requested, and also graciously accorded. It is, of course, possible that Mr Mapleson may have applied for permission to advertise whatever troupe he may choose to engage and whatever locale he may select for its performances as "Her Majesty's Opera," and he may have been favoured with permission to do so, but I do not think it at all likely. Your obedient servant,

FREDERICK GYL.

Shinness, Lairg, Sutherland, September 17.

THE NEW OPERAHOUSE.

(To the Editor of the "Times.")

SIR,—As the subject of the new Operahouse on the Thames Embankment has been more than once discussed in the Times, and as the lessee of the unfinished building and his powerful competitor have both been allowed a hearing, I beg you to permit one who is not interested in either of the rival houses to call attention to the opportunity, wholly unexpected, which now presents itself for correcting a most grievous error.

How the Metropolitan Board were induced to grant a lease of this, their choicest plot of land, without taking ample security that the conditions of the lease should be punctually fulfilled, is a question for the ratepayers; but I venture to affirm that, even if the Board have to make some sacrifice of money, it will be in the interest of the public that the existing lease be cancelled, and that the ugly obstruction which defaces our finest thoroughfare be removed. The great enjoyment which is derived by everybody from the gardens laid out on the adjacent parts of the Embankment, and the charming appearance which they already present, fully justify the conclusion that the best use for the site of the abortive Operahouse would be to apply it for an extension of the gardens. If this be unattainable, and if the land must be used for building, then, at the least, it should be let either for Government offices or for private houses of a high class, to be set back to the line of Whitehall Gardens and Montagu House.

The projection as it now stands destroys altogether the general effect of this really fine part of London, and if the building be completed it will be as great and glaring a disfigurement as the station and railway bridge at Charing Cross, which have spoilt beyond redemption one of the noblest views in London. H. G.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Mrs BILLINGTON was so hoarse one night when she had to sing, at Drury Lane, Mandane in Artaxerxes, as to render it doubtful whether she would be able to get through her task, or even to attempt it. To add to her trouble, her maid had mislaid the key of her jewel box, but persisted that her mistress must have it with her. "What can I have done with it?" exclaimed the lady. "I suppose I must have swallowed it unconsciously." "And a lucky thing, too," observed Wewitzer, "it may perhaps serve to open your chest."

In the narrative of their travels in Africa, by Major Denham and Captain Clapperton, we find the following instance of the sensibility of animals to music:—

"We had a full opportunity of convincing ourselves that these stupendous animals" (the hippopotami) "are very sensibly attracted by musical sounds, even though they should not be of the softest kind. As we passed along the borders of Lake Mungaly at sunrise, they followed the drums of the different chiefs the whole length of the water, sometimes approaching so near the shore that the water they spouted from their mouths reached the persons who were passing along the banks. I counted fifteen at one time sporting on the surface, and my servant, Columbus, shot one in the head, when he gave so loud a roar, as he buried himself in the lake, that all the others disappeared in an instant."

WINTER, the composer of Das unterbrochene Opferfest, would, had he lived, have been a great patron of spiritualists, though he might not probably have dared to attend their dark sittings, or even accept a ticket for Messrs Maskelyne and Cooke at the Egyptian Hall, though those gentlemen expressly announce that the spiritual manifestations they exhibit are all brought about by very unspiritual means. Winter entertained such a dread of ghosts that he trembled at the idea of venturing out alone after nightfall. On one occasion at Munich, someone enveloped in a sheet lay in wait for him at the corner of a street. On Winter's approach, the apparition clasped him round the neck, and, though its weight did not exactly tally with its supposed incorporeal nature, Winter dragged it along with him till he reached his own door; but the alarm he experienced nearly cost him his life.

It is a custom in the Tyrol on the eve of Christmas Day, Easter Sunday, All Saints' Day, and the 1st of May, for the young men of a village to sing under the young girls' windows, accompanying themselves on the zither, their favourite instrument. The lover vaunts his mistress's charms, and, in wooing strains, implores her to share with him his father's humble roof. It sometimes happens that his strains are broken in upon by the jealous outbreak of some rejected swain. This affords the two an opportunity of testing their skill in improvisation. The jealous lover points his keenest shafts of satire against his more fortunate rival, endeavouring, by some well-directed gibe or happy epigram, to overthrow the latter's hopes or shake his faith. Presently this Fensterlied, or "Window Song," attracts a crowd, whose presence adds a fresh stimulus to the efforts of the maiden's admirers. This continues till the sparkling wit or biting irony displayed by one of the opponents turns the balance in his favour, and compels his discomfited antagonist to quit the field, pursued by the taunts and jeers of the bystanders.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

MADAME LIEBHART'S Concerts at the Agricultural Hall came to a close with the benefit of the Manageress herself, who must have been gratified with the evidence of her popularity testified to by the crowd who assembled in the Hall on the occasion, and who greeted her enthusiastically. Madame Liebhart had wisely drawn around her, during the series of her concerts, many of the leading artists of the day, among whom were Mesdames E. Wynne, Antoinette Sterling, Anna Bishop, Ernst, Julia Warwick, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Cummings, Vernon Rigby, Wadmore, Maybrick, and Wilford Morgan. The pianists were Signor Tito Mattei (who opened the concerts), Miss Lillie Albrecht (who appeared on five different occasions, and played works by Chopin, Thalberg, Döhler, and Liszt), and Mr. Ganz, who closed the series. Miss Albrecht, whose reputation is becoming more and more "constable," and whose versatility enables her to take part in either classical or miscellaneous concerts, met with deserved success. On several occasions, being warmly "recalled," Miss Albrecht played her own brilliant transcription of the "Blue Bells," which was received with great applause. The conductors have been Sir Julius Benedict, Messrs Ganz, Allen, and Kingsbury. The orchestra was composed of many of the leading performers of the day. Jullien's "British Army" Quadrilles, which were given every evening, contributed in no small degree to the success of the enterprise. We hear that it is in contemplation to renew these Grand Concerts next year.

PROVINCIAL.

BRIGHTON.—Mr. George Watts began a series of Promenade Concerts at the Dome, on Monday, with Mr F. Kingsbury as conductor, Mr A. Pollitzer as leader, Madame Liebhart, Miss Singleton, and Mr Wilford Morgan as vocalists. The concerts are planned in the same form as those given at the Agricultural Hall, London. Jullien's "British Army" Quadrilles, played by the orchestra and three military bands, being the pièce de résistance. There is to be a special afternoon concert to-day (Saturday), and the series will come to a conclusion on Monday. At the Aquarium, to-day, Madame Sinico is to be the vocalist. During the week, Mr Howard Paul and Miss Rudge, with Miss Florence Temple as pianist, have been giving their entertainment. Miss Harriette Dunbar, a lady violinist, was specially engaged to play at Wednesday's concert. Last Saturday night, Signor Medico, from Messrs Gatti's London Promenade Concerts, sang, as well as Madame Ziméri, who met with unqualified success on each evening she appeared. The Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society announce Haydn's Seasons for Tuesday next; and on Monday evening, October 8, Madame Christine Nilsson, with Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr Edward Lloyd, and Mr Lewis Thomas, will sing at Mr Kuhe's concert in the Dome.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The Messrs Gatti gave, on their "Classical Night," on Wednesday, a selection from the works of Beethoven, including the overture to Egmont, the slow movement from the Ninth (Choral) Symphony, the first movement from the Violin Concerto (played by Mlle Pomme-reul), the Pianoforte Concerto in E flat (played by M. Ketten), and the whole of the Symphony in C minor. Both Mlle Pomme-reul and M. Ketten were warmly re-called after their respective performances, and the applause after the Symphony (admirably played under the direction of Signor Arditì) was as hearty as it was deserved. The vocal pieces were "In questa tomba" and "Pénitence," sung by Miss Annie Butterworth, and "Se il ver" (Fidelio), sung by Mlle Ida Cristino. As usual, the second part of the programme was miscellaneous, the selection from Rossini's Mosè in Egitto, for orchestra and military band, producing the usual effect. Mlles Rajmondi, Ida Cristino, and Signor Gianini were the vocalists, Mlle Cristino being set down for Signor Arditì's new and effective valse song, "L'Incontro." Next Wednesday is to be a "Wagner Night."

JULIUS RIETZ.

Dr Julius Rietz, Director General of Music, died in Dresden on the 10th September. The fact has excited universal sympathy and sincere regret in the whole world of music. It was not unexpected, since, some days ago, the melancholy intelligence was conveyed to us that Rietz had had an apoplectic stroke, and that there were scarcely any hopes of his recovery. The sorrow which the sad news is calculated to excite will not be diminished by the knowledge that in Rietz the brotherhood of German artists loses a prominent champion of classical music, an eminent conductor, and a distinguished composer; in a word, one who was devoted to all that is noble and elevated in art. Rietz had been ailing for several years. For some time, indeed, he had been compelled to cede to another his duties as conductor at the Theatre Royal, Dresden, but he recovered sufficiently to enter on them again. About a fortnight ago, the opera of Le Val d'Andorre, after being got up by him, was given under his direction at the Theatre Royal, and as late as the 6th inst. he was at the head of the orchestra during the performance of Der fliegende Holländer. Everyone liked him. He was an honorary member of numerous musical societies and associations.

Julius Rietz, a son of Johann Friedrich Rietz, Royal Chamber Musician and tenor violinist in the Royal Band, Berlin, was born in that capital on the 28th December, 1812. A course of thoroughly sound musical instruction by the very first teachers speedily enabled him to make such progress, that, when only sixteen, he entered as violoncellist the orchestra of the Königsstädtisches Theater. While occupying this position, he composed the music for Holtei's Lorbeerbaum und Bettelstab. In 1834 he was induced by Mendelssohn, who entertained a great esteem for him, to go to Düsseldorf, where he acted as conductor at the Theatre, becoming, two years later—when no more than twenty-five—Mendelssohn's successor as Town Musical Director. Rich in musical productivity and renowned for his remarkable talent as a conductor, he held this post for eleven years. He often conducted subsequently at the Musical Festivals of the Lower Rhine, the last occasion on which he did so being two years ago at Aix-la-Chapelle. In 1847 he accepted the post of conductor at the Theatre and director of the Singacademie, Leipzig, to which, from the 1st October, 1848, he added the direction of the Gewandhaus Concerts. A series of eminent artists, once his pupils, testify brilliantly to what he did as a teacher in the above city. It was there, moreover, that he began his musico-critical labours, alluding to which, Otto Jahn says:—"In Rietz we have lost a philologist, which would be highly regrettable, had he not become a musician." Rietz assisted in the issue of Bach and Handel's works, and published himself 12 Symphonies by Haydn, and 12 Concert Airs by Mozart. He subsequently devoted most of his time in Dresden to the edition of Beethoven and that of Mendelssohn, as well as that of Mozart's Scores, published by Breitkopf and Härtel. He took also a leading share in the latest edition of Mozart. Since 1860 he was in Dresden first as Capellmeister to the Court, in place of Reissiger, and afterwards as Artistic Director also of the Dresden Conservatory. Last year, on the occasion of the fortieth anniversary of his appointment as conductor, he was created, by King Albert, Director General of Music.

On the 1st October he was to have retired for the purpose of enjoying the repose he had so richly earned—but death summoned him before then to his eternal rest. Though, in his numerous compositions (overtures, concert-pieces, symphonies, &c., as well as two operas), Julius Rietz does not shine by vigorous originality, his productions always inspire respect, while, on account of many beautiful creations, some of a most inspiring nature, for instance, the "Dithyrambe," among other things—he will never be forgotten by Choral Associations for Male Voices. Even if his own compositions were lost, the name of him who critically edited our classical German masterworks would be indelibly preserved in the history of music. We hear that the Intendant-General of the Theatres Royal commissioned Herr Robert Radecke, Royal Capellmeister, to attend the funeral on the 15th inst., and, in the name of the Royal Chapel, to lay a laurel wreath on the grave of the Deceased.—Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

BOLOGNA.—A new opera, Wallenstein, by a young French composer, M. Ruis, will shortly be produced at the Teatro Comunale.

No. II.

THE WAGNER FESTIVAL.

Writing to a friend in Dresden towards the close of his stay amongst us in 1855, and after speaking of the "distinguished manner" in which he was received by the public, Herr Richard Wagner said:—"Quite indifferent to me, on the other hand, was the abuse of the London critics, who only proved by their attacks that I had omitted to bribe them. Indeed, it always amused me to observe how they still left a door open, in order, upon the slightest approach on my part, to change their tactics—a step, of course, which I never thought of taking." In a good-humoured notice of these remarks—which it was impossible to treat seriously—a critic of the period wrote: "The next time Herr Wagner comes to London, we recommend him strongly to bring with him a little more money or a little better music. In the event of his changing his mind, and becoming an honest convert to the good old bribery system, he may be induced to speculate on the virtue of a few thalers. Should the critics refuse the money—and there's no knowing what these obstinate and malignant dogs may do, especially if they fancy they have been cheated out of their lawful due—we advise him to try a small dose of real good music. It may, peradventure, have its weight and influence. It was by such simple means Mendelssohn bribed and corrupted universal England." Herr Wagner is again amongst us, but there is little probability of his trying the virtue of thalers. He has come to gather money, not to spend it. How far, on the other hand, he has taken advice with reference to "a small dose of real good music" will appear by-and-bye. But one thing is certain, whatever else may be doubtful—we are all glad to see Herr Richard Wagner amongst us; even those sharing the gladness who must needs assume towards him the attitude of "openly declared enmity" which, in Opera and Drama, he confesses he was obliged to take up towards Meyerbeer. More than this, we all wish good luck to his enterprise, as far as that can be without injury to an art a thousand times more worthy of consideration than the greatest of its professors.

At this point, perhaps, some one will ask, "Why begin harping upon the man? Is not his music the chief theme?" We answer that it ought to be; and if it is not, the fault lies with Wagner himself. Were he satisfied, like the "immeasurably rich master" whose mantle we are sometimes told he wears, to appeal to the world by artistic creations alone—were he content to let his work stand or fall upon its merits, Herr Wagner would never be spoken of with other than the profound respect due to his great and unquestioned genius, however strongly the principles he advocates may be assailed. But, unhappily, the most prominent, most portentous, and, we had almost said, most objectionable, thing about Wagnerism is Wagner. We cannot have the one without the other, and the other is so big and terrifying an apparition that it eclipses the one and stands in the way of our calmly estimating its merits. Needs must, therefore, that the master be reckoned with. He does not so much say, "Here is my work," as "Here am I." And in what attitude does he present himself? The question deserves an answer, because we are sometimes told that Wagner has been a persecuted man—that he has had to fight almost single-handed against a host of furious assailants. Assuming the truth of this, we wholly decline to look upon him as an object of pity, since he has nobody but himself to blame. It was open to him, if necessity compelled the writing of pamphlets as well as music-dramas, to set forth his principles with judicial calmness, and moderation, instead of which he was content with nothing less than running a-muck, like a mad Malay, among those of his contemporaries and fellow-musicians whom the world—in its profound erroneousness, no doubt—delighted to honour. That which is written remains, and we cannot forget—Herr Wagner does not permit us to forget—who turned upon the operatic composers of his own time with a fury which even now men wonder at; who ransacked the capacious German language for its strongest terms of contempt and scorn; who, in his boundless self-consciousness, charged a whole race of people with conspiring to ruin him; and who, heedless of the law against kicking a man when he is down, wrote a farce lampooning Paris in her distress and suffering, presumably because, in her prosperity, she had rejected him. It is idle to talk of persecution when a man invites reprisals in this way. The proverbial navy took no notice of the thrashings given him by his wife because, while the exercise gratified, it did not annoy him; but Herr Wagner, however feminine he may be in the shrillness and intensity of his invective, has strength enough to hurt. If, therefore, "reaction has been equal to action, and contrary thereto," it is not for the assailer to complain, unless, indeed, the manifest duty of the world is to crouch like a beaten hound. Why do we write all this? That, in the midst of whatever honours are paid to Herr Wagner—and the deserts of his genius are great—there should be no false sentiment about the master's personality. Also that he may know in what respect the welcome we give him and the homage he receives have a limited application.

But if any of us cherished personal animosity against Herr Wagner there would be cause just now for glee, especially as, once more, the poet-composer is reaping the reward of his own presumption. It was his dream for years to give a performance of the Nibelungen Trilogy under conditions best adapted to its artistic principles. So far, good. Nothing could be more proper, or more worthy of sympathy and active help. But the next step was amazing in its underlying assumption. Herr Wagner believed that he could fill his theatre with a paying audience of his own professed followers, and, not only so, but that he could afford to build a theatre for himself, in the little out-of-the-way town where it pleases him to reside. As might have been expected, the whole scheme, apart from the artistic success which attended it, turned out disastrously. The Wagner Societies could not fill the house, and buyers of tickets had to be sought among the Philistines, who declined a pilgrimage into the Bavarian wilderness when they might have been drawn to some attractive capital. Thus it came to pass that the enterprise left its promoters with a heavy balance to pay. Well, those who perpetrate blunders must stand by the consequences, and Herr Wagner, very rightly, is doing his best to make good what has been lost, but at such a sacrifice that it is impossible not to regard him with feelings of commiseration. His bitterest foe never yet charged him with wanting sincerity; and when he tells us that his art, though made up of various elements, is one and indivisible, or divisible only with loss and shame, we know that he expresses a deep-rooted conviction. Indeed, the master has insisted upon this with special force. Poetry, music, and stage effects are connected in his teaching by such a bond that no one party to the alliance is separable from the others. In the Ring des Nibelungen we find this principle so rigidly acted upon that it cannot be ignored without a certainty of the entire fabric tumbling to pieces. Imagine, then, the reluctance with which Wagner consented to take his poetry and music into the concert room; to break the perfect whole, and offer a part; to fly in the face of his own teaching, and stultify himself. Only a sense of dire need could have led to such a result; and, albeit the necessity was created by Wagner's own act, his fate in having to sanction and bear a personal share in so gross an outrage commands sympathy. To make matters worse, it is in England that this is done, in the very head-quarters of Philistinism, and among the unmusical people who inhabit Liszt's "pays de médiocrité." But when a man wants money he must follow the market, and, although the unmusical people are not quite so well off as usual just now, they are rich by comparison with aesthetic Germany. To the accident of our wealth is due the fact that Herr Wagner here conducts a concert-room performance of his dramatic works. There can be no doubt at all that the master would say, "Don't judge my music dramas from the fragments presented under ruinous conditions in the Albert Hall." We join him in the caution with all possible emphasis. The power and beauty of the music performed are half lost, and, at the same time, the weakness of Wagner's system is kept out of sight along with that which is not heard. Really, therefore, the Kensington performances have no value whatever apart from the gratification of a natural curiosity, while they may even do harm by creating false impressions. You cannot appraise the merit of a picture which is half hidden behind a curtain; neither can Wagner be estimated when but partly revealed.

In the interests of truth, this caution is emphatically needed just now, and every visitor at the Albert Hall should keep it constantly in mind. Putting together all the considerations advanced, we fail to discern much in the Wagner Festival that is festive. True, it brings a great man amongst us whom we are glad to see, because great men are scarce; but it is the offspring of a necessity, which has combined with it the violation of a cherished principle and a capacity to mislead.—Daily Telegraph, May 9, 1877.

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS.

Mary Queen of Scots, the most celebrated woman of her time, died upon a scaffold. The beauty of her person and the possession of the throne of Scotland excited the jealousy of Queen Elizabeth of England. She passed for an agreeable writer in prose, and the few poetic pieces which she has left, prove that she had gained a distinguished rank among the French poets. To the merits of a literary character, she joined every female accomplishment. She was an excellent musician, a good dancer, and possessed of every amiable talent; these, united to the charm of her wit, would have rendered her greatly superior to all the women of the age in which she lived. Her attractions, of which Elizabeth frequently heard, fatigued the English Queen's jealous ears, and were, perhaps, the sole cause of Mary's misfortunes. Elizabeth, conversing one day with Melville, Ambassador from Scotland, asked if Mary were not a finer woman than herself. The cautious courtier, unwilling to offend and wishing to avoid a direct answer, replied that Elizabeth was the finest woman in England. This answer did not satisfy Elizabeth, who, wishing to gratify her vanity by hearing an acknowledgment of her own superiority, again pressed Melville for a more decided reply. The Ambassador then confessed that he thought Mary a finer woman than herself. This reply, as unexpected as it was true, greatly chagrined Elizabeth.

To testify Mary's deep regret at leaving her connections in France, she composed the following farewell address to that country, which serves as a proof of her poetical talents:—

CHANSON.

Adieu plaisant pays de France!
O ma patrie,
La plus chérie,
Qui as nourri ma jeune enfance!
Adieu, France! adieu, mes beaux jours,
La nef qui disjoint nos amours,
N'a c'y de moi que la moitié,
Une partie te reste, elle est tienne;
Je la fie à ton amitié
Pour que de l'autre il te souvienne.

Ah, pleasant land of France farewell!
My country dear,
Where many a year
Of infant youth I lov'd to dwell,
Farewell for ever happy days.
The ship that parts our love conveys
But half of me—one half, behind
I leave with thee, dear France, to prove
A token of my endless love,
And bring the other to my mind.

WALLINGTON GUERNSEY.

ST GEORGE'S HALL, LIVERPOOL.

Programme of Organ Recitals by Mr W. T. Best.

THURSDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 27th:—

Organ Concerto, D major	Handel.
Adagio for the Organ, E major...	G. Merkel.
Prelude and Fugue, G major	Bach.
Andantino, E major	C. V. Alkan.
Pastorale à la Styrienne	Hummel.
Procession March, Guillaume Tell , 3rd Act	Rossini.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, SEPTEMBER 29th:—

Triumphal March	J. L. Hatton.
Andante, A major	S. S. Wesley.
Allegretto et Grand Chœur	C. V. Alkan.
Organ Sonata, E flat major	Christian Fink.
Air, "Di Cupido impiego i vanni"	Handel.
Hymn to Bacchus, Antigone	Mendelssohn.

VIENNA.—A new opera, Des König's Brautfahrt, by Herr Alban Förster, will probably be accepted at the Imperial Operahouse.

MANHEIM.—Francesca da Rimini, which Hermann Goetz left incomplete at his death, will be produced at the Court Theatre within a day or two. It was finished for the stage by Johannes Brahms and Herr Frank, the latter of whom, like the composer himself, is now dead.

LEIPSIK.—At the Lepke sale, in the early part of October, a large number of musical works, by Haesler, Festori, Tartini, and others, will be put up. Among the autographs figure those of Beethoven, C. M. von Weber, Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Marianne Mozart (the Composer's sister), Rossini, Zelter, &c. The catalogue, 86 pp., with extracts and biographical remarks, may be procured free by post for 5 Pfennigs, from Herr Stargardt, 53, Jägerstrasse, Berlin.—The venerable Thomas-School, which since its foundation in 1214 has done so much in preparing students for the University, and has played so brilliant a part with regard to sacred music, is about to be transferred to a new abode. The old "Thomaner" intend celebrating the event by a farewell solemnity in the old edifice, and the establishment of several free scholarships for day pupils.

HORTON ALLISON, the pianist, has met with an accident to his left hand, through being thrown from a tram-car, which moved suddenly as he was alighting from it, in Manchester.

THE collection of ancient musical instruments at the Paris Exhibition will contain some fine specimens of Old French and Italian art. To these will be added a number of documents, MSS., autographic scores, and other interesting objects of musical archaeology.

WAIFS.

Mr and Mrs F. B. Jewson have returned to town for the season. Gillmore's Concerts, New York, have been unusually well attended of late.

M. Vizontini has accepted a comic opera by M. Léon Gastinel. It is entitled La Tulipe bleue.

Sig. Luigi Bordèse, the composer, has been created a knight of the Portuguese Order of Christ.

Mr William Dorrell has returned to town from Sussex, where he has been passing his vacation.

Francesca da Rimini, by Sig. Cagnoni, will be the principal novelty of the approaching autumn season at Turin.

M. Hœssli, a most ardent advocate and promoter of choral singing in Switzerland, died recently at Lausanne.

Herr von Flotow has received a commission from the house of Ricordi, Milan, to set a libretto of d'Ormeville's, entitled Sakuntala.

It was exactly a hundred years last Tuesday, the 25th inst., that Gluck's Armide was first produced at the Royal Academy of Music, Paris.

The meanest man in the world inhabits Oil City, U.S. He has sent a bill to a neighbour for giving the latter's children the mumps.

The King of Holland has conferred upon M. Guillot de Sainbris the Order of the Oaken Crown, in recognition of that gentlemen's services to Music.

Though Mad. Pauline Lucca has bid adieu to the stage in Germany, she has not yet altogether left it. She will sing next season at the Teatro Real, Madrid.

For some little time past, a son of Henri Wieniawski has been stopping at Boston, U.S., where he thinks of giving concerts. Like his father, he is a violinist.

Among other artists engaged by Herr Ullmann for his concert tour in Norway and Sweden, are Mad. Artôt-Padilla, Señor Padilla, Sig. Bottesini, and M. Wieniawski.

Count von Platen, Intendant-General of the Theatre Royal, Dresden, attended the performance of La Reine de Chypre a few nights since at the Grand Opera, Paris.

The 4th volume of Ambros's Geschichte der Musik (History of Music), will shortly be published. It treats of "Palestrina and his times, and the Commencement of Opera."

The Abbate Franz Liszt will visit Pesth at the beginning of November, and remain till Easter, for the purpose of taking the upper classes at the National Academy of Music.

The stage rehearsals of M. Reyers's Statue have commenced at the Théâtre-Lyrique. M. Talazac, prizeman last term at the Paris Conservatory, will sustain the part of Sélim.

Mdme Enriquez has returned to Town for the season. The accomplished contralto is specially engaged to sing at the Choral Union Concert, at Edinburgh, in Sir Julius Benedict's St Peter.

The Swedish tenor, Henrik Westberg, gave a farewell concert at Stockholm on the 15th inst., previously to starting for Paris, where he hopes to obtain an engagement at the Théâtre-Italien or the Théâtre-Lyrique.

The new cantata, The Buccaneers, by Wellington Guernsey and John Cheshire, is to be produced, next Tuesday, at the Royal Academy of Music, with full band and chorus, under the direction of Mr Walter Macfarren.

A. C. D. writes:—"The parents of the late M. Thiers were Protestants. He was born in that faith, but died a Roman Catholic. No memoir that I have read mentions at what stage of his life he changed his religion." [We have seen him more than once at High Mass.—D. T.]

Mdlle Coulon has returned from a tour in Brittany. Vichy, and other fashionable resorts of the Parisian aristocracy, have also been visited by the accomplished pianist. During her tour in Brittany Mdlle Coulon played at a concert she instituted for the benefit of the poor of Portrieux, at which Monsieur des Roseaux, as well as two clever amateur vocalists, the Baronne de Barthélemy and the Comte de la Noë, assisted.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

REMINISCENCES OF THE LEEDS FESTIVAL.

No. 2.

(From the "Leeds Mercury.")

The utility of musical festivals had a splendid demonstration yesterday morning. We are sometimes told that their raison d'être no longer exists—that facility of communication between the provinces and the metropolis has made them unnecessary. The best reply to such an argument is found in the list of works which musical festivals have directly called into being. What a magnificent list it is!—and who, after yesterday's experience, shall say that the latest addition to it is not worthy of association with anything that goes before? Even were the Leeds Festivals to end—absit omen—with the present celebration, they would not have had their little day in vain. To them the musical world owes Joseph, and thus may our town, as far as concerns the most prominent and learned of living English composers, set itself on a level with the Bristol of St John the Baptist, and the Birmingham of The Resurrection.

If any one felt anxious about the success of Joseph, it was not without some show of reason. The greatest musician may attempt too much, and it cannot be denied that, since the success of his first oratorio, four years ago, Dr Macfarren has attempted a good deal. He has produced The Resurrection—in itself a work of years for an ordinary man; he has completed also a cantata to be brought out at Glasgow in November next; and he has finished—how we all now know—a third oratorio of the largest dimensions and importance. One may well ask "Who is sufficient for these things?"—and anticipate the result of such efforts with considerable misgiving. But, as will presently be seen, Dr Macfarren knows how to justify the confidence of those to whom misgiving about his powers is a stranger. Joseph, yesterday morning, was acclaimed with enthusiasm, and the most critical among those who heard it, while not shutting their eyes to the imperfections hardly separable from human effort, admitted that English music had been enriched by a noble work, and the action of the Committee in applying to Dr Macfarren justified by a splendid return. It is somewhat remarkable that the story of Joseph has so little engaged the attention of oratorio makers. Handel, as readers of his biography know—and no others—occupied himself with the theme, as did the French master, Méhul, with a result more abiding than that which attended the effort of the Saxon giant, since fragments of Méhul's Joseph still live, while of Handel's not a note appears to survive. But because the subject has been so neglected in the past, there is all the greater reason why the composers of the present should turn to it. And this they seem to be doing with remarkable unanimity. Sir Michael Costa is understood to be engaged upon a Joseph for the Birmingham Festival of 1879, and we believe it is a fact that Sir Julius Benedict turned his attention to the same theme till he discovered that his brother musicians were ahead of him in the race. There is room for two of the sort, especially as Sir Michael Costa's music is not likely to resemble in any degree that of Professor Macfarren; and besides, it will be a matter of interest to note how two clever men treat a subject which they look at from opposite points of view, and with very different predilections.

It can hardly be needful to say that Dr Macfarren's librettist is the organist of York Minster. Dr Monk has fairly earned a right to be the literary associate of the learned composer. It is true there are critics who contend that in The Resurrection Dr Monk led his co-worker by the wrong path, and landed him in what was, comparatively speaking, a failure. But however this may be—and it is a point we shall not discuss—the merit of his St John the Baptist book cannot be denied, any more than can the fact that, despite The Resurrection, it gave Dr Monk a claim upon the composer which Professor Macfarren was most unlikely to ignore. For the third time, therefore, the one doctor has gone to the other, and we have now to consider the result. The libretto of Joseph is in strict dramatic form, utterly devoid of narrative, and makes by no means extravagant use of reflective commentary. So far, good. St John the Baptist has shown clearly enough that Dr Macfarren's strength lies in dramatic situations. He has great power of characterisation; and a terseness, force, and directness of expression which mark out very clearly the course that a literary colleague should prepare for him. In arranging the book of Joseph, Dr Monk seems to have kept this in view, and the very fact was, in some sort, a guarantee against failure. Moreover, the librettist has constructed his drama well, avoiding superfluity of material on the one hand, while omitting nothing essential on the other. Its two parts, or acts, are rounded off with singular neatness, the first concerning itself with Joseph's dreams, and the events preceding his being sold to the Ishmaelites; while the second deals with his interpretation of Pharaoh's vision, his promotion to power, and the sequence of incidents that, beginning with the arrival of his brethren seeking food, ends with the immigration of Jacob and the entire Hebrew family. Mark the variety of all this, not only as regards incident, but character and feeling. Mark, too, the steady accumulative interest, the compactness of the plot, and the sound judgment which allows nothing to obstruct our view of the hero, or turn away our attention from his fortunes. It may, perhaps, be a disadvantage that in the entire dramatis personæ there is no woman; but this, if felt at all, only suggests itself to us after reflection, and is not obvious on the face of things. A more serious fault is the occasional irrelevancy of the reflective texts, some of which Dr Monk has, to use a common expression, dragged in by the ears—some of which, moreover, are not the best adapted to inspire a composer with musical ideas. Wagner is quite right when he contends that "words for music" should "yearn" for musical expression—should demand it, so to speak, and lay the composer under an obligation to supply their need. But some of Dr Monk's texts cry out for music very little more than do the entries in his private diary. Here is one, for example: "Forgive if ye have ought against any, that your Father also, which is in heaven, may forgive you your trespasses. But if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgive your trespasses"—a very excellent admonition and weighty statement, but not one that asks to be sung. The whole matter, however, of these reflective passages in oratorio deserves and calls for discussion, since not even the well-ascertained functions of the "Greek chorus," and their perfect exemplification in Majah, appear to have much influence upon librettists. But it is time to turn to Dr Macfarren's music.

The overture, like that to St John the Baptist, is of large dimensions, and in strict classical form. It is full of charm and power moreover, though, perhaps scarcely equal in that respect to its distinguished predecessor. As for its interest we can only measure that quality justly after observing the extent to which the composer again avails himself of themes having a representative character. * * * * * The first subject of the overture stands for the love of Jacob for Joseph; its second may be termed the "Canaan motive," and there are episodes afterwards identified with the conspiracy of the brethren and other incidents in the drama. How much recognition of these facts increases the significance of the prelude need scarcely be pointed out. As for the ingenuity with which the composer subsequently employs his motives, it is not too much to say that Wagner himself would approve it. They are continually appearing, but never without a meaning obvious to the dullest perception. Passing from the opening chorus, a melodious ascription of praise charmingly accompanied by the orchestra, to Jacob's air, "I dwell in the land," and from it, without comment, to the duet wherein Jacob and Joseph interchange assurances of affection, we come next to the first of a series of "dialogues," or more properly, dramatic scenes, which form a very distinguishing feature of the work. Dr Macfarren has here chosen to do without recitative, strictly so called, giving us in its place elaborate set pieces, to the construction of which solo, chorus, and orchestra freely contribute. The plan involves a heavy tax upon the composer's resources, and it is beyond dispute that no other device could have invested the oratorio with an equal measure of dramatic force and consequent interest. In this first of the "dialogues" are more than one happy touch. Joseph, for example, relates his dreams to the accompaniment of a harp, henceforth destined to attend upon all the visions in the work; while the interjected sentences of Jacob and his elder sons are full of vigour and appropriate meaning. By the way, the passage to the words "We hate him!" is an obvious reflection of "Stone him to death," in St Paul, but the oratorio as a whole is singularly free from such reminiscences. The chorus "Honour thy father" need not detain us longer than is required to observe the masterly ease in which its fugue is worked out, and from it we go to the song, "Love is strong as death"—one of the most beautiful and thoughtful numbers in the work. There are passages in it of extreme gracefulness, while all are marked by the repose and dignity required by the text. The conspiracy scene follows, and in an energetic concerted piece the envious brothers resolve to kill Joseph. But Reuben interposes in an air (tenor), "Let us not kill him," which, musically speaking, is a worthy companion to the one we have just commented upon, though, perhaps, the appropriateness of its music to words uttered in the midst of an exciting situation, and at a critical moment, may be open to question. The dialogue is now resumed with added terseness and force, an excellent contrast being secured between the pleading utterances of Joseph and the fierce invectives of his brethren. Finally, the victim is cast into the pit, and Reuben, with a cynicism for which we should like to know Dr Monk's authority, invites the others to sit down and be merry, because "there is one event unto all" and when it happens signifies little,

The music to this episode is extremely pretty, but, coming when and where it does, jars a little on the nerves. A reposeful contralto air, "Who ever perished being innocent?" has the distinguishing merit of not imitating "O rest in the Lord," and serves for an effective contrast to the music with which the Ishmaelites appear on the scene. The children of the desert come with the conventional jangle and clatter of their minstrelsy, and tell us in ingeniously barbaric strains who they are, where they are going, and why they go. This exciting episode is followed by another dialogue, full of suggestive music, at the close of which, Joseph having been delivered over, the noise of the caravan gradually dies away. But we do not get out of hearing of the captive, who, in an air, "If I forget thee," dwells lovingly upon thoughts of his native land, expressing his emotions by the help of music instinct with real feeling. Then comes a duet, with chorus of female voices, "Commit thy way unto the Lord," over which we pass, and go to the resumed conspiracy; following the brethren as they return home and show the blood-stained coat to their father. Jacob's air, "I will rend my clothes," is one marked by genuine pathos, to which, after Dr Macfarren's manner, the orchestra contributes as much or more than the voice. The end of the first part has now been reached, and is signalled by a chorus—"A voice was heard in Ramah," closing with a strain of hope significant of what is to follow.

The second part opens at the Court of Pharaoh, whose people sound the praises of their monarch with true Eastern hyperbole, but not at great length. The King then tells his dream, to a harp accompaniment, and the magicians answer an unreasonable demand for its interpretation in a series of short two-part choruses, taking the form of a canon on the major second. All this dialogue is graphic, admirably worked out, and very interesting. Here a reflective soprano air, "Hath not God made foolish," &c., intervenes, and we turn to Joseph's interpretation of Pharaoh's dream, and rejoice in his sudden elevation. Dr Macfarren makes all this very agreeable and interesting to us. We may not approve everything he does, but he commands our sympathy nevertheless, and there is no consciousness on our part of desiring to quit his company. A grand chorus follows—the grandest in the work—descriptive of the honours and homage paid to the new favourite. Here the composer rises to a great height indeed. He grasps all the resources of his art, and uses them as though, so to speak, he had a hundred hands. The musician who can write such a chorus is a master before whom men may cry, as they did before Joseph, "Bow the knee." Passing hurriedly on, we come to, first, a duet for soprano and contralto, "The Lord sendeth the springs," and next to a chorus, "If I enter into the city," descriptive respectively of the years of plenty and the years of famine. The latter is enormously difficult—we cannot but think unnecessarily so; though its effect may not be questioned. Another dialogue now shows us Joseph's brethren in presence of the Egyptian ruler, and we watch the progress of that remarkable interview with unflinching interest, and with admiration for Dr Macfarren's "staying" power. Its end is followed by a short but striking contralto song, "When your sins are brought forth," after which we may hear the brethren entreat Jacob to comply with Joseph's demand for the presence of Benjamin. The music to this dialogue strikes us as less effective than the rest, but amend is made in the succeeding fugal chorus, "O Lord, have mercy upon us," throughout which the composer revels in a display of the strength his profound learning confers. Now comes an elaborate soprano scene, the lofty theme of which is a parallel between Joseph and the Saviour of man. We might dwell long upon this number, but, with a word for the masterfulness of not a few among its passages, must pass on to the resumed dialogue and the revelation of Joseph to his brethren. This crisis of the drama is well and firmly treated by Dr Macfarren, who is equal to its demands, and successfully avoids any suspicion of anti-climax. Especially may we commend the air, "My spirit is sore moved," in which the hero gives vent to his emotions. A very beautiful sextet, "Forgive, if ye have ought," occurs here, and tranquillises the mind previous to the scene where the long-parted father and son meet to be no more divided. After this comes the final chorus, "O give thanks to the Lord," respecting which it may emphatically be said—"Finis coronat opus." And now, what is the sum of the whole matter? Simply that we have witnessed the birth of an oratorio which is "a thing of beauty," and which, we hope and believe, will, as a thing of beauty, illustrate Keats's familiar saying.

M. GOUNOD has nearly completed a new comic opera, founded on a subject taken from the story of Abeilard and Héloïse, and entitled Maitre Pierre. The libretto is by MM. Poirson and Gallet, who wrote the libretto of Cinq-Mars.

"OH NANNY!"

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Accuracy in quotation is indispensable. Permit me, therefore, to correct a slip of the pen in my letter of last week. In the fourth line of the second stanza, for "To shrink," read "Nor shrink."
—Yours truly,
G. A. C.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—I was considerably interested by reading in your number of Saturday, October 13, two letters on the subject of the once popular song, "O Nanny, wilt thou gang with me?" The one letter bears the name of the well-known musical antiquary, Wm. Chappell; the other is signed with the initials of one of our most accurate and painstaking musico-literary amateurs. Indeed, I may say that I have never found "G. A. C." tripping. But neither of your clever correspondents has thought fit to allude to the author of the lines. Let it not be forgotten that this was Percy, Bishop of the Irish See of Dromore, collector and editor of the famous Reliques of English Poetry. The beautiful lines, set to music by Tom Carter, were, I believe, addressed by the good Bishop to his own wife. Carter's claim to the authorship of the music was at one time disputed by J. Baidon, now only known by a little three-voice glee, "Adieu to the village delights." It simply remains for me to add to your correspondents' notes about the existing published forms of "O Nanny" my own experiences. For a long time I possessed an engraved copy of Carter's song, with the imprimatur of "Rhames, Essex Street, Dublin;" the engraving was rude, the paper greenish and discoloured. This old copy, however, bore no allusion to Baidon's claim, but was called "A Song by T. Carter." I presented it to an Irish gentleman, a pious judge, who perished in the railway accident at Abergele in 1868. I have not met with a copy of Carter's song since. A short notice of Carter's peculiarities will be found in O'Keefe's Recollections.
R. P. STEWART.

P.S.—There is an amusing similarity (not only in the key, E flat, but in the entire first phrase) between Carter's song and No. 2 of Mendelssohn's "Christmas Present."
University of Dublin, October 14, 1877.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—Permit me to express my thanks to Mr. William Chappell and "G. A. C." for their courteous and interesting replies to my letter of 6th inst. How far Mr Chappell is right, however, in blaming M. Fétis for originating the incorrect date of Carter's birth is another matter. Fétis would probably give it on the authority of some English writer, as he generally did, whether rightly or wrongly; and anyone who compares his notices of English musicians with that furnished by the English Biographical Dictionary, dated 1827, will find abundant confirmation of that assertion. All the notices of Carter I have hitherto seen concurred in saying he was born in 1768, and died 1804. "G. A. C." gives a most interesting account of him, furnished by Sir R. P. Stewart—a gentleman to whom musicians owe a debt of gratitude, whether we speak of his ability as a composer, his industry and research into the doubtful or disputed questions of past history, or his energy and public-spirited advocacy of the great claims of his countrymen upon us—in which he seems to have proved that Carter was born about 1735, &c. In that case, the story of Joseph Vernon singing the song in 1773 is quite likely to have been true. Still, however, it seems to me there is a mystery to be cleared up, if possible, as it is strange that two accounts differing so very widely should have got into circulation about the same man. Let us contrast them:—

Thomas Carter, born 1768, died 1804.

Thomas Carter, born about 1735, alive in 1809!

May there not have been two Thomas Carters, father and son? If we assume the composer of "Oh, Nanny" to have been born in 1735, and to have married, his son (Thomas?) might have been born in 1768; the father being then thirty-three. Again, it is quite possible that either father or son might die in 1804, as stated, while the other might be alive in 1809. Unless we adopt some idea like this, it is incomprehensible how such discrepancies can have arisen. I may remind "G. A. C." (who seems, like myself, to have consulted the obituary columns of the Gentleman's Magazine, of an interesting feature, which has now for some years been discontinued), that the death of one Thomas Carter is given in the year 1800; the month I forget. Several persons have supposed this Thomas Carter to refer to the composer in question.

D. BARTON.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The concerts to which the Crystal Palace is indebted for the artistic repute unanimously conferred by public opinion are resumed, and two have already been held. From early October, in one year, to early May, the year after, these well-ruled entertainments make Sydenham, in a musical sense, notorious, drawing from London and its vicinities a large number of amateurs and connoisseurs to whom orchestral performances of the highest class are invariably attractive. Such performances are furnished week after week under the superintendence of a conductor who, in his way, has few rivals. Mr August Manns, from the beginning, accepted the task imposed upon him with full understanding as to its responsibilities. For a long period of years the sterling excellence of his concerts has been maintained, their fame advancing in proportion. A mere retrospect of what has been achieved under his guidance, with the zealous co-operation of Mr George Grove, who, under the signature "G.," prepares the majority of those historical and critical annotations which help to please while imparting instruction, would suffice to establish the fact, if proof were wanting, that the Crystal Palace Concerts have done no little on behalf of that gradual development of a taste for genuine art which is a sign of the times. Such a retrospect would occupy more space than can well be afforded; nor, indeed, is it requisite; a brief acknowledgment, however, of what Mr Manns, by force of genuine talent, coupled with untiring industry, has been able to accomplish will hardly be looked upon as superfluous. That the public are sensible of his merits is shown in the cordial greeting awarded to him whenever, after a six months' interval, he once more takes his accustomed place on the orchestral platform.

The programme of the first concert of the 22nd series contained German, French, Polish, and English music—German, as always, preponderating. The selection, both varied and interesting, comprised, among other things, the overture to Oberon and Beethoven's First Symphony (C), played as we are used to hear them played at the Crystal Palace. Despite their high merit it would probably be to the advantage of both if they were allowed to repose for a somewhat lengthened period; their re-advent would then be all the more welcome. The overture to Le Premier Jour de Bonheur, Auber's last opera but one, being a novelty here, was, if only on that account, acceptable. It seems difficult to believe that anything so fresh, spirited, and vigorously sustained could have come from the pen of an octogenarian. Another novelty was the music composed by Mr Arthur Sullivan for Henry VIII. Mr Sullivan, as amateurs are aware, had already written incidental music for The Tempest and the Merchant of Venice, the first of which at once made his name familiar. Neither of its companions is so carefully wrought out as The Tempest, though each possesses indisputable merit. In their instance, however, the musician had exclusively to deal with what was selected to fit special performances at the Manchester Theatre; whereas in The Tempest, composed while a "Mendelssohn scholar" at the Leipsic Conservatory, he was at liberty to consult his own judgment and give the reins to his individual fancy. There are excellent things, nevertheless, in Henry VIII.; and while two or three scenes strongly suggestive of musical treatment are omitted, what has been done is extremely well done. Avoiding details, we may point to an air, with chorus, "Youth will needs have dalliance," the quaint words of which are traditionally assigned to Henry Tudor himself. In this, with its tuneful burden and characteristically limited orchestral accompaniment, the true spirit of old English melody is reflected. The solo voice part was delivered by Mr George Fox (of our Royal Academy) with so much force and good taste as to win an "encore," of which no one was likely to complain. There are other noticeable things in Henry VIII., including an exquisitely graceful dance; but, as it stands, the whole is rather suited to the stage than to the concert-room. Mr Sullivan should do with this and the other Shaksperian play what he did with the Tempest—complete it, as Mendelssohn completed a Midsommer Night's Dream. That he is quite equal to the task the Tempest is enough to show. The other instrumental piece at the first concert was Sir Julius Benedict's admirable pianoforte concerto in E flat, begun many years ago, and finished more recently for Mr d. Arabella Goddard, who has played it several times before, at the Philharmonic Concerts (Hanover Square Rooms), the Birmingham Festival, &c., but never more perfectly or with more unanimous recognition than on the present occasion. Schumann's "Gipsy Life," with its striking reminiscences of the "Hunting Chorus" in Der Freischütz, afforded the Crystal Palace choir a favourable opportunity of showing what progress they were making; and songs by Wagner (Flying Dutchman), Chopin, and Kirchner were contributed by the clever and intelligent Mme Sophie Löwe. At the concert on Saturday the symphony was Haydn's in B flat, one of the finest among the

"Twelve Grand," composed during 1791 and two following years, for Salomon's concerts at the Hanover Square Rooms, when Haydn occupied the place originally destined for Mozart, who had died in the first-named year. The overtures were Cherubini's Anacreon (his most brilliant, but far from the greatest of his operatic preludes) and Mendelssohn's bright and poetical Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage, each as familiar to amateurs as the symphony, and each as effectively given under the direction of Mr Manns. An event of importance at this concert was the appearance of Herr Max Bruch, who set to music Geibel's Lorelei, which Mendelssohn had accepted but left unfinished, and whose concerto in G minor has been more than once made known to us through the playing of Herr Joachim, Herr Ludwig Straus, &c. Herr Bruch has composed other successful works, not hitherto produced in this country, but of which we shall doubtless hear sooner or later. The two pieces comprised in the programme of Saturday were the concerto just named, and the Vorspiel (a short prelude) to Lorelei. Mr Manns resigning the bâton to his compatriot, Herr Bruch conducted his own music, and was greeted with such cordiality as rarely fails to welcome the appearance of foreign artists of distinction. The prelude to Lorelei was executed with studied attention by the members of the orchestra, and loudly applauded. Judging by a single hearing, it must be credited for the most part as a very effective and ingenious piece of orchestral writing; but it is difficult immediately to perceive the "highly romantic texture" upon which Mr Manns, in his brief analysis, lays stress, even while listening "with an unprejudiced ear to new music," which the excellent conductor hints (and we agree with him) is essential under such circumstances. About the violin concerto little need be added to what has previously been written. It is a concert-stück at the best, the opening number having neither the form nor the dimensions of a "first movement," properly so called. The adagio, into which it leads directly, is built upon two melodious themes, well associated and ingeniously developed. The finale, however, in G major, which at periods conjures up faint reminiscences of that to Beethoven's fourth pianoforte concerto (in G), is in all respects the most ably planned and logically conducted movement—spirited from beginning to end, with themes happily contrasted, orchestration highly coloured, expressive as well as brilliant passages for the principal instrument, &c. The entire movement, indeed, if not strikingly original, is throughout effective. Herr Bruch, who directed the performance himself, was lucky in such an exponent as Señor Sarasate, a Spanish virtuoso, who, but little known in England, has nevertheless of recent years been winning golden opinions on the Continent, and not infrequently through the medium of this same concerto. As a boy he was pronounced a phenomenon; and another Joachim was predicted. That Señor Sarasate is an artist of exceptional ability cannot be put in question. His mechanism is distinguished for unfailing certainty; his tone, if not quite equal throughout the register of the instrument, is pure, telling, mellow—not unfrequently broad, and even rich. His execution of rapid passages—marked, from time to time, by excess of the rapidity actually demanded—is nearly always equally balanced; though now and then the tone, which should be just as equally balanced, becomes, for the reason named, in a certain measure deteriorated. Señor Sarasate's most nearly irreproachable performance, in our opinion, was the concerto. With this, after stating that the adagio was too uniformly "expressive," affording slight evidence here and there of a "tremolo," as much regrettable on the violin as in the human voice, no fault could possibly be found. It was a truly admirable display. That the audience accepted it as such was manifest. Both Herr Bruch, the composer, and Señor Sarasate, his interpreter, were called forward and applauded with enthusiasm. Señor Sarasate's solo was to have been a fantasia, by himself, on Spanish melodies, which—the composer's nationality borne in mind—would have been interesting to everyone; but at the last moment three pieces from a suite with orchestral accompaniments, by Herr Raff, were substituted. The first of these was an allegro "prestissimo," according to the player's reading of it, the last a moto continuo, still more "prestissimo," if such were possible—after the manner of but inferior in matter to the famous moto continuo of Paganini. The middle movement is a dance air with variations. In the two quick movements the rapidity of the Spanish violinist's execution had ample opportunity for display, and he availed himself of the chance with unrestrained impetuosity. A fresh proof of what can be accomplished by music written with no other purpose than to show off the dexterous manipulation of a virtuoso was thus afforded; and nothing more than this can be detected in the suite of Herr Joachim Raff, whose quickly improvised works might already fill a library. The performer, nevertheless, was honoured by another and well-merited demonstration of applause, on returning to the platform, at the vehemently expressed desire of the audience. The singers were M^{me} Nouver, and Mr Barton McGuckin (a young tenor sensibly rising in public esteem)—the former giving "With verdure clad" and Cherubini's "Ave Maria" (clarinet accompaniment by Mr Clinton); the latter selecting "Love in her eyes" (Acis and Galatea), with songs by Schumann and Mendelssohn, accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr H. Gadsby. Each was warmly applauded.

At the next concert we are promised an unknown symphony in B flat, by Schubert; Sterndale Bennett's overture to Parisina; La Jeunesse d'Hercule, a new orchestral piece by M. Saint-Saëns, and Mendelssohn's violin concerto, played by Señor Sarasate.

MUSICAL QUACKS.

(From the "Tallor.")

IN most occupations of life some standard and recognized guarantee of capacity is necessary. A physician has to give proof of proficiency, and to be duly registered before he is allowed to practise. A solicitor must pass certain ordeals before he can reap his harvest of six-and-eightpences. But the so-called teachers of singing are under no such obligation. Literally any one who chooses, be he never so ignorant, is at perfect liberty to appoint himself instructor in the art of song, and to trade with the most delicious impunity upon public good faith and gullibility. How on earth is any respectable British matron, in no way associated with music or musicians, to tell whether Signor Tizio, maestro di canto, is really a fit and proper person to be entrusted with an important and expensive branch of her daughter's education? How is she possibly to decide whether he is any better or any worse than Signor Caio, or Mr. Blank, who has not yet clapped on a fine-sounding ini or oni to his patronymic? It is a pure matter of speculation for her, a pure risk, an utter lottery. Reputation is by no means a safe criterion; the most shameless musical impostors, by means of a good appearance and consummate impudence, have managed, and do manage, to work up a fictitious fame, most dangerously dazzling, most perilously alluring to the unwary. How, then, shall any one be warned off in time from the pitfall, when there is absolutely no guarantee of even rudimentary knowledge, much less of proficiency?

The matter is of far more serious import than may appear at the first blush. It is not merely a question of a temporary wrong inflicted by an unscrupulous swindler upon an unfortunate dupe; it assumes a graver aspect when, by the assumption of non-existent knowledge, irreparable injury is caused to good natural material. The human voice is a most delicate and finely-constructed organ; it ought not to be left to the mercy of quacks and charlatans, to be twisted, tortured, and eventually ruined for ever. The position of a singing-master is peculiarly tempting as a harbour of refuge for the destitute and unfortunate in general. As matters are now, nothing more is required than a bare personal assertion of knowledge; no further proof is demanded, none is offered. Unsuccessful pianists, disappointed fiddlers, misunderstood composers, and a crowd of others, men and women, all equally ignorant of the vocal art, fasten like leeches upon a métier that shall yield them that measure of pecuniary reward denied to incompetence elsewhere. The danger of meeting with them does not, of course, lie so much in the direction of public academies or the larger and more important schools. Teachers of tried worth and experience are, as a rule, picked out, though even there it is by no means a rare occurrence for those whose business it is, to choose badly or by rule of favour. The peril lies among those who spring up from nobody knows where, whose antecedents are as Eleusinian mysteries, who simply call themselves singing-masters, without anybody to question their right, and, by cool persistency and vulgar assurance, trade upon the credulity of their neighbours.

Another coil, even in the case where the teacher is competent to instruct, is the raging internecine war of systems. Every man has his own particular theory; every man declares his own particular theory to be the best. Suppose, for example, a young lady runs the gauntlet—as, indeed, many do—of some five or six teachers. What does she find? Five or six separate systems, all widely opposed to each other and chaotically perplexing. By the time she has come out of the contest, she probably learns that she has learned nothing, and that her voice is hopelessly impaired, if not ruined. One universally accepted system is the only condition under which a sound school of singing can possibly flourish. It is nonsense to argue that vocal art cannot be reduced to definite rules. Each of the numberless methods extant has the most definitely prescribed regulations possible, and surely one may be at last discovered which will prove at least to be the best of them. Malibran, Grisi, Rubini, Tietjens, and a host of singers of the past, must have been properly taught, and if the right system is in temporary abeyance it must be called to life again.

As for the crying shame of crass ignorance being permitted to exercise important functions with impunity, the remedy is simple, yet efficient—test by examination, or obligation in some way to give complete proof of having received the proper training requisite for the post of teacher. Such a wholesome check might not be productive of any immediate high art results; but, at all events, it would protect the public, and put a full stop to the rule of incompetency and egregious vanity over the atrocious style of singing now universal in drawing-rooms. It would save throats and lungs from misuse, and even from disease and destruction.

There are many institutions in Europe whose diploma of proficiency would be sufficient evidence that the bearer has learned well, and therefore has some claim to be able to teach well. Indeed, any sort of evidence would be worth something, because the self-styled "professor" is mostly distinguished by being able to produce none at all. It is as easy for anybody to learn which schools of singing are of the best repute as to find out the respective characters of public schools and colleges. People must be expected to take a little trouble in matters that interest them. The object of reform is simply to exclude from any chance of employment the quacks and charlatans of the profession. And in time the whole body of skilled teachers would be certain to result in the establishment of a good school wherein, by the process of natural selection, the fittest system would survive. At present, the few good teachers whom we possess mostly waste themselves in unteaching the lessons of charlatans, and in trying to make the best of ruined voices that come to them for desperate remedies.

[The greatest number of quacks here are German, Italian, French, Spanish, Low Dutch, Russian, Chinese, Japanese, Kurdish, Bazoeks, Shawm-players, and Canaries.—D. P.]

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The first fortnightly meeting of professors and students for the season took place on Saturday, October 13. We subjoin the programme:—

R. Cox—accompanist, Mr Hooper; Sonata in E flat, Op. 29 or 31, No. 3, pianoforte (Beethoven)—Miss Dinah Shapley, pupil of Mr Benson; Song (MS.), "A Last Look" (Oliveria Prescott, student)—Miss Weyland, pupil of Professor Macfarren and Mr Goldberg—accompanist, Miss Prescott; clarinet obbligato, Miss Thomas; Aria, "Qui sdegno," Il Flauto Magico (Mozart)—Mr Frith, pupil of Mr Fiori—accompanist, Mr Jarrett; Fugue in B flat, Op. 60, No. 6, on the name Bach, organ (Schumann)—Mr Charlton T. Speer, pupil of Dr Steggall; Quartet (MS.), "Sleep, beloved" (Emily M. Lawrence, student)—Misses Hardy, L. Evans, Henderson, and M. S. Jones, pupils of Professor Macfarren and Mr F. R. Cox—accompanist, Miss Lawrence; Prelude and Fugue in D, No. 5, pianoforte (Bach)—Miss R. Dunn, pupil of Mr W. H. Holmes; Air, "In the battle," Deborah (Handel)—Miss Lena Law, pupil of Mr Garcia—accompanist, Miss Amy Hare; Berceuse (Chopin), and Tarantella, No. 3 (Walter Macfarren), pianoforte—Miss Ada Hazard, pupil of Mr Walter Macfarren; Cavatina, "See you rose, so freshly blooming" (Donizetti)—Miss Eliza Thomas, pupil of Mr Gilardoni—accompanist, Miss Alice Heathcote; Barcarolle, pianoforte (Chopin)—Miss Lawrence, pupil of Sir Julius Benedict; Song, "To Chloe in sickness" (Sterndale Bennett)—Miss Jessie Percivall (second study), pupil of Mr Latter—accompanist, Mr Hooper; Toccata in C, pianoforte (Onslow)—Miss Bacon, pupil of Mr O'Leary.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT'S CONCERTO IN E FLAT. *

(From the "Graphic.")

The pianoforte concerto of Sir Julius Benedict, the opening movement of which was composed many years ago, the work being afterwards finished expressly for M^{me} Arabella Goddard, was a marked success. The concerto itself, in which we find Weber's favourite pupil following in the footsteps of Mozart as regards form, rivaling Hummel in his bravura, Dussek in his cantabile, and, while glancing here and there at the famous author of the Concertstück, endowing the whole with strong individuality, is in its way a masterpiece. M^{me} Goddard, who has introduced the concerto on several previous occasions, has never played it with more spirit, grace, and refinement.

ROSE HERSEE AT MANCHESTER.

Since our last notice of the performances of this company, two operas have been given—Benedict's Brides of Venice on Thursday, and Mozart's Figaro last night. The first is almost unknown here, and though it had its day of popularity when Bunn reigned at Drury Lane, it is now rarely heard. The plot is romantic, and the music attractive. For a first performance, it was very well given on Thursday by Mme Cave-Ashton, Miss St John, Messrs Parkinson, James, Temple, and others. Mozart's Figaro attracted a large audience, and no opera during the week has been so creditably performed. Mme Rose Hersee's charming singing of the music of the Countess is well known here, and though the other artists appeared in the opera for the first time, they were evidently familiar with the music. Mme Cave-Ashton, as Susannah, sang and acted better than on any previous occasion; and Miss St John delighted the audience in Cherubino's two airs. We have seen less competent Figaros than Mr Temple; and Mr James, as the Count, showed decided merit. The Rose Hersee company assuredly deserves encouragement. Such effective performances of opera have never been given in Manchester at such reasonable prices; and though a change every night makes great demands on all concerned, the policy at any rate indicates a desire to gratify all tastes, and we hope the enterprise will meet with the success it deserves. To-night Balfe's Bohemian Girl will be given.—Manchester Examiner, Sept. 29.

THE LAST NIGHTS OF THE KENNEDYS.

There is an old adage that a Scotchman is never so much at home except when he is abroad, and, paradoxical though this may at first sight appear, there is nevertheless some foundation for the assertion. Of course the extent of a Scotchman's nomadism, owing to the recent failure to discover the North Pole, has not yet been accurately ascertained, but a look into the Great St James's Hall, during the Kennedy Family's stay in London, clearly demonstrated to our mind that there is a large and thriving colony of Scots, who have a "local habitation" and a home in and about town, and who can thoroughly appreciate the auld Scots sangs and Scottish legendary lore when sung and narrated by their country's best exponents. For four weeks the Kennedys have, with unflagging assiduity and zeal, kept alive the interest in their "Twa Hours at Hame," and their efforts, we are glad to say, have been crowned with success. That an entertainment, partaking so much of Scottish ingredients, should have attracted large and admiring audiences for fifteen nights incontestably vindicates the genuineness of the bill of fare and the ability of the artists. They now leave town to fulfil other engagements in the provinces, and it is with mingled feelings that we take leave of them: we express a hope, however, that their next undertaking may prove as successful as the one they have so commendably completed here. We have already particularised this specialty, so that recapitulation is unnecessary. We will, however, take a brief retrospect. Amid the vast variety of subjects calculated to "cheat a tedious hour" and afford pleasure and instruction, there is none perhaps more pleasant than the contemplation of the characteristics of those who contribute to our gratification. Mr Kennedy is the facile princeps of Scottish entertainers. He has, so to speak, personally explored the charnel-houses of the Scottish Muse, culled largely therefrom, and into what appeared dry bones he has infused a new being and a new vitality; so that many of the quaint and humorous gems of Scottish song have been rescued, vocally at least, from oblivion. This, perhaps, is one of the secrets of Mr Kennedy's success both at home and abroad. Add to this a voice of exceptional register which enables him to cope successfully with the extensive gamut of Scottish minstrelsy—be it the grave or the gay, the pathetic or the humorous—and his faithful embodiments of the ludicrous side of human frailty are alone sufficient to hand his name down to posterity.

One of the most prominent features of this visit was Mr Kennedy's grand rendering, for the first time in London, of "Jeanie Morrison." Although the lovely words were written by Motherwell over fifty years ago, they seem to have been waiting for a fitting melody. In introducing the song Mr Kennedy predicted that the composer of the music would be better known hereafter than now. It is certain that the singer was in love with his theme, and the fitly wedded words and music were sung with such exquisite expression as to become an absolutely fresh creation. A spontaneous outburst of long-sustained applause followed the first performance, and on being repeated on Tuesday night a rapturous encore followed, to which Mr Kennedy at once responded.

That the mantle of the father has descended upon his children, who are yet in the springtime of life, and capable of much development, there can be no doubt. As soloists and glee-singers they have individually and collectively left a favourable impression. Miss Helen Kennedy will be remembered notably for her mellifluous singing of such songs as "Auld Robin Gray," "Will ye no come back again," and "The lang awa' ship"; Miss Marjory will be kindly thought of for her quaint, impassioned, and intelligent cantation of "Ca the yowes," "The Rowan Tree," and "The Four Maries"; David's animated and spirited songs, "The Cameron Men," "Draw the sword, Scotland," "The Standard on the braes o' Mar," and "The Clansmen's Song" will recall pleasant memories; we will think of Robert's "Scottish Emigrant's Farewell" and "O Nannie, wilt thou gang wi' me"; and James's flexible voice and resonant notes will be recollected in "Gae fetch to me a pint o' wine," "When wild war's deadly blast," and "Dark Lochnagar." The words and music of the latter are so felicitously blended together that this new composition is destined to attain co-equal favour with the household treasures of Scottish song.

Fortified by the success of the twelve nights originally advertised, Mr Kennedy prolonged his stay for three nights longer. On Monday there was "Anither Nicht wi' Burns"; on Tuesday "A Nicht wi' the Jacobites"; and on Wednesday Mr Kennedy bade adieu to his friends and patrons.

GRATZ.—Herr Ignaz Brüll's Goldenes Kreuz has been successfully brought out at the Landestheater.

THE LONDON & PROVINCIAL Music Trade Review:
 PIANOFORTE & MUSICAL INSTRUMENT MAKERS' JOURNAL
 AND PUBLISHERS' MONTHLY LIST OF NEW MUSIC.

Price 4d.—Monthly.

THE large interests connected with the Music Trade generally have hitherto been unrepresented by any special publication; it is, therefore, intended to make The Music Trade Review a medium of publicity for all matters of interest in connection with the manufacture and sale of Musical Instruments, as well as a newspaper for the dissemination of information on musical subjects in general, among professors, the trade, and amateurs; and for giving as complete a list as can be obtained of all New Music published during the month in Great Britain and elsewhere; also lists of artists' engagements, tours, and other news likely to interest the trade and the profession.

The further contents of The Music Trade Review will embrace a résumé of all Musical Events of the Month, at home and abroad; Reviews and Notices. Original articles and other contributions upon practical subjects have been promised by J. F. BRIDGE, Mus. Doc., Oxon., Organist at Westminster Abbey; WILHELM GANZ, Director of the New Philharmonic Society; BRINLEY RICHARDS, Professor at the Royal Academy of Music; H. WEST HILL, late Director of Music at the Alexandra Palace; THOMAS WINGHAM, Professor at the Royal Academy of Music; HENRY F. FRONT, Organist at the Chapel Royal, Savoy; J. STIMPSON, Organist at the Town Hall, Birmingham; FREDERIC CLARK, of Gloucester; WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE, N. VERT, "FLAMINGO," FREDERIC SCARBROOK, J. SHEDLOCK, T. PERCY M. BETTS, and many other eminent musicians and writers.

The Music Trade Review will consist of sixteen large quarto pages, stitched in coloured wrapper. The first number will appear in the course of October.

Subscribers for not less than Twelve Months will receive their copies post free for 4s. 6d.; or for Six Months, 2s. 6d. All subscriptions must be paid in advance.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1877.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

PANNYPANYPPANY.—The assumption of intellectual superiority by painters over musicians is simply ludicrous. It would take seventeen Hooks to catch a Sullivan; half a dozen Millais' (even with Stentor Ruskin to back them) would not make a fifth part of a Sterndale Bennett; while Macfarren could swallow as many Leightons as a whale could swallow herrings.

MR MICHAEL WILLIAMS.—Many thanks. We have read the "Recollections of Tietjens" with the greatest pleasure, and only regret that, instead of going to Cornwall, they had not been published in Middlesex. The "Opera" all right. A proof of our correspondent's first article has been sent to his address.

POLKAW.—Received with thanks. The "Scarecrow" will appear in our New Year's double number. About the "Novel" we can say nothing without at least one chapter under eye. The "Sonnet" will be found in another page. Bon jour, "Polkaw!" "Be kind to your father" (says Mathews Nipperkin), "and lend him your coat."

SMUDGE, M.D.—Dr Smudge is hopelessly wrong; he might as well try to swim in a drop of stagnant water, because that drop of stagnant water is magnified, or weave for himself a girdle out of Cleopatra's Needle, because that needle was bayed. Nor did Arne compose the Battle of Prague; nor is there an ounce in all Bessarabia—although (according to Dr Quoits) there are otters and phenicopters in other parts. Dr Smudge would do well to tighten his braces, clean his history, and jump into his hammock. Quid?

A COMPURGATOR.—No. The opera, Ma Tante Aurore, is by Boieldieu. On every other point "A Compurgator" is wrong.

NOTES UPON NOTES.—Too late for this number, but will appear in our next. Welcomed with rapture. Utcheter for ever! Uttoxeter when intoxicate.

MR (very) CUNNINGHAM BOOSEY.—Let it be at the Fish and Volume. Captain Swordfish, Professor Bream, and Dr Cod will be of the party.

Episode.

Enter MAN WITH UMBRELLA.

MAN WITH UMBRELLA.—Ho! W. H. Holmes is not here; though he was at Leeds, carousing with Dr Spark and Mr and Mrs Allen. I looked for his umbrella specially. Tut! no umbrella! Not even a scarf—not a breast-pin! No business at Lark and Glimmer! Ho!—where are Head's spectacles? I will take Head's spectacles. (Takes SIR FLAMBOROUGH's spectacles, and puts old umbrella in their place.)—I shall go to Schopenhauer and Cynic. Sutherland Edwards and Hueffer carry good umbrellas. Ho! I'm off. It's not too late. Happy thought! (Singing):—

There was an old author, Burnand,
Who in "Fun" showed a moderate hand;
And so the "Punch" crew,
Wanting blood that was new,
And not over rich, took Burnand.

[Exit man with umbrella.]

Re-enter SIR FLAMBOROUGH HEAD.

SIR FLAMBOROUGH HEAD.—And my spectacles? I forgot my spectacles. I say, old boy, here's an umbrella (shakes wide the umbrella). No!—spectacles are gone! (Throws down umbrella in disdain). How ever could I have thought my spectacles were in that umbrella? If only Arthur were here!

WRAITH OF ARTHUR (subterraneously).—Well said, old mole!

[Exit Sir Flamborough precipitately.]

Enter OCULIST.

OCULIST.—Waiter!

IRISH WAITER.—Sort?

OCULIST.—I hear Sir Flamborough has lost his spectacles.

IRISH WAITER.—Sort?

OCULIST.—He must want an oculist?

IRISH WAITER.—Sort—he has gone to an optician—a friend, bedad! of Sir Caper O'Corby's, sorr.

[Exit Oculist.]

IRISH WAITER.—Be the nails of my toes!—he tuk no dthrink!

Schluss folgt.

[Vanishes.]

To Dr Francis Hueffer.

TIETJENS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—The subjoined appeared in the Plymouth Western News of October 8th:—

"Mdlle Tietjens was always so obliging to the public, and had such a bright and merry way with her, that it is difficult to imagine that there was room in her heart for jealousy. But the winsome Sinico found out that there was, and this episode was a little blot on the great cantatrice's career."

What does this mean? I peremptorily call upon Sig. Campobello for an explanation. Yours obediently, YAXTON LAST.

Tewksbury, October 16.

JOSEPH OF LEEDS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Who wrote that article on Joseph in the Monthly Medical—no, Musical—Record, of the 1st October? He had better have remained at Sonderhausen, to listen to the orchestra of Erdmannsdörfer—for at the best he is an Erdapfel (Earthpuff). Was it Mr Smithers Goldfinch? Yours obediently,

A HATFELLOW COMMONER.

[We know not—nor care got. How confoundedly German we are all getting!—B. B.]

A PLEA FOR MR AUSTIN.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—In a speech delivered before the Committee of the Leeds Festival (at Leeds), Mr Frederick Spark (of Leeds), the active Hon. Secretary, thus pleaded for Mr Austin:—

"A discussion followed, during which Mr Spark defended the action of the committee in the selection of Mr Austin's Fire King, remarking that congratulations had been numerous as to its choice. He said its performance pleased the audience very much; and though it had been adversely criticised in some of the papers, it might, to some extent, be explained by the fact that everything was so good that the newspapers wanted some one to crucify, and so selected Mr Austin. They wanted something to write down, in order to give a variety to their criticism. (Laughter.) The calling of Mr Austin to the front of the orchestra was, he thought, sufficient testimony in favour of the selection of the Fire King. (Applause.)"

Thus did Mr Frederick Spark plead for Mr Austin. It is a piteous case—a piteous case—piteous, indeed! Yours, Mr Editor, STEPHEN ROUND.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

A WRITER in the Journal de Musique relates the following anecdote of Mad. Frezzolini: Some time in the year 1865, the lady was announced to appear at Geneva. She was set down for the first act in La Sonnambula, followed by an air from Lucia di Lammermoor. She began La Sonnambula, but had not got through three bars before she stopped. Everyone looked at everyone else with an air of dismay and astonishment. No one had ever heard such a fearfully discordant noise. It was impossible to understand what it meant. At length the conductor suddenly exclaimed: "Ah! I see it all! You are singing La Sonnambula, and we are playing Lucia!" Picture! The music-books were changed, and, after a moment or two of painful emotion, Mad. Frezzolini resumed. But there was a confounded double-bass who would persist in playing the accompaniment of Lucia. This gave rise to a sharp dialogue between the said double-bass and the conductor, the result being that the former put on his hat and left in great indignation, taking his instrument with him. For that evening Mad. Frezzolini gave up all further notion of singing.

PROVINCIAL.

BELFAST.—The Choral Association gave its first concert for the season in the Ulster Hall, on Friday evening, October 12th. The vocalists were Mdme Campobello-Sinico, Mdles Emma Howson and Elena Franchi, Messrs Campobello, Hilton, and Shakespeare, and M. Niedzielski (violinist), who were heartily welcomed and applauded after each of their performances. Mr Shakespeare made his first appearance in Belfast on the occasion, and achieved a marked success. The Belfast News-Letter, writing about the concert says:—"Mr Shakespeare—who sang the recit. and aria, "Deeper and deeper still," and "Waft her angels to the skies" (Jephthah)—came heralded as a former distinguished pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, London, and the sanguine anticipations formed regarding his attainments were not disappointed. Twice was he re-called, and each time bowed his acknowledgments. He achieved a character for himself which will ensure him an enthusiastic reception when he again visits Belfast." Mendelssohn's setting of the psalm, "Why rage fiercely the heathen? (minus the "Gloria"), the pièce de résistance, was very creditably sung. The concert ended with the National Anthem. Signor Romano accompanied the vocal, and Mr Newport conducted the choral music.

ARMAGH.—A concert in aid of the sick and wounded in the Eastern War was given in the Tontine Rooms, on the 12th inst., under the patronage of his Grace the Lord Primate, the Earl and Countess of Charlemont, and Captain Beresford, M.P.

LIVERPOOL.—The Rose Hersee Opera Company opened a very successful series of performances at the Prince of Wales' Theatre, on the 8th inst., with Maritana, and brought it to a triumphant close on the 13th inst. with Les Huguenots. The Liverpool Mercury says it is a marvel how Mr F. Emery, the manager of the Prince of Wales', could, while adhering to his regular prices of admission, place the operas so effectively on the stage. Proceeding to details, our contemporary remarks, among other things:—"Mdme Rose Hersee's performance of the Gitana has long been recognized as of the first order, and the brilliancy of her vocalization last evening again elicited frequent marks of genuine approval. Added to this, there were the former charm and abandon in her acting which so largely contribute to the marked excellence of the part. Miss Florence St John deservedly secured success by her singing in the character of Lazarillo, 'Alas! those chimera,' provoking the almost invariable encore. Don Cesar was represented by Mr W. Parkinson, who is always welcome. Mr Lithgow James is a valuable member of the company. Mr R. Temple proved himself a genuine artist as the King. The band, under the bâton of Mr J. Pew, was not only strong but highly efficient, and, if the voices in the choruses wanted a little freshness, there was no mistaking acquaintance with their work." Nor were the fair Directress and her company less successful in the more ambitious work by Meyerbeer. We curtail the annexed account from The Daily Courier of the 13th inst. :—

"Mdme Rose Hersee's impersonation of Valentina proved musically as well as histrionically a very effective rendering, her pure, fresh voice, which seems to be gaining in fulness, giving out Meyerbeer's magnificent music with all possible refinement and good taste. Mdme Cave-Ashton was equally successful as Margarita di Valois. Mr Richard Temple's Marcel was a study. The Raoul of Mr Bernard Lane also deserves high commendation. Miss St John secured an encore for the Page's song in the second act, whilst Mr Lithgow James as Count di Nevers, and Mr Montelli as Count di St. Bris, rendered most efficient aid. The house was crowded. This evening The Bohemian Girl will be presented, closing a very short but most praiseworthy series of operatic performances."

TRURO.—A most agreeable concert took place in the Concert Hall on Friday evening, October 5th. The artists were the sisters Robertson (pupils of Mr Randegger), Miss Fonblanque, Messrs Wadmore and Guy (vocalists), Mr Albert (violinist), and Mr J. Hele (organist). The West Briton Advertiser says Miss Robertson was exceedingly well received, and no one who had heard her on her last visit to Truro could help observing the great improvement which had taken place, not only in her voice, but in her grace of deportment and artistic finish. The advance made by Miss F. Robertson is still more evident, because there was here more work for the skilled trainer. Miss F. Robertson has a beautiful voice, and she can now use it with admirable skill. Miss Ellen de Fonblanque, who accompanied the party, sang for the first time before a Truro audience, and displayed a rich voice and delicacy of execution. Mr Wadmore and Mr Henry Guy were both received with great favour, as well as Mr J. Hele, who gave an organ solo. The concert ended with a part song, "Old daddy long legs," sung by the Misses Robertson, Mr Henry Guy, and Mr Wadmore. Sig. Alberto Randegger was the conductor.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

At the last meeting of the General Committee, under the presidency of the Mayor, Mr Spark read the following report:—In presenting thus early a balance-sheet of the Leeds Musical Festival, held on September 19th, 20th, 21st, and 22nd, the figures must not be taken as final, for several accounts are yet in abeyance. The totals, however, may be considered as substantially correct, and have been verified by Mr Alfred Williamson, honorary auditor to the Festival Committee. Our total receipts from all sources amount to £7,847 7s. 6d., being £238 6s. 8d. more than the gross receipts for the Festival of 1874. The total expenditure reaches £7,078 0s. 10d., or £478 in excess of the expenditure for the previous Festival. There is thus an apparent balance of profit amounting to £769 6s. 8d. But this does not fully represent the balance, for we have assets consisting of 500 chairs, purchased for the Patron's Gallery, furniture, music, &c., calculated to realise, at a moderate estimate, about £110. This sum, added to the actual amount in hand, will leave a total balance of profit amounting to £879 6s. 8d. The increased receipts, it will be seen, are not sufficient to cover the increased expenditure, leaving the profit about £130 less than 1874. This increased expenditure is almost entirely due to the greater sums required for principal singers, the increased band, chorus, and other charges, all tending to an improved musical performance; and the committee have reason to be congratulated on the verdict of the press and of the public, by whom the Leeds Festival of 1877 has been emphatically pronounced to be one of the greatest and best ever heard in this or any other country. As compared with 1874 the charges under the heads indicated show an advance of £450. The following may be taken as a fairly estimated balance-sheet on present available figures:—

This result, which, in view of long-depressed trade, must be considered as satisfactory, has not been achieved without a considerable amount of honorary labour on the part of the committee. By the executive, no fewer than 51 meetings have been attended since the close of last year, apart from numerous sub-committee meetings. The General Committee have been called together 14 times, to review the business of the executive, and to confirm or modify their decisions. The executive desire to acknowledge the warm interest and the close attention shown by the Festival Chorus and the chorus-master in the work they undertook to do. No fewer than 34 rehearsals have been held, and it is but just to recognise not only the gratuitous services of many excellent amateurs, but the really hard work of the "professional" chorus-singers, whose payment, in many instances, could only be sufficient to cover their personal expenses. To the Leeds Town Council thanks are due for the readiness with which that body adopted the recommendations of the Festival Committee permanently to enlarge and improve the orchestra, to erect a substantial and handsome gallery (admirably designed by Mr Morant), and for generally facilitating the Festival business. The committee desire also to acknowledge the excellence of the police arrangements at the Festival—which were well planned by Chief Constable Henderson, and admirably carried out by Superintendent Ward—and the services of Mr Berry, Town Hall secretary. It now only remains for the committee to decide what shall be done with the surplus funds when they are fully realised, and to appoint a provisional committee in whose hands the Festival books may be lodged, and to whom should be entrusted the duty of selecting new works for performance at the Leeds Festival in 1880.

In explanation of the increased expenditure, Mr Spark stated that the principals had been paid £157 more than in 1874, the band had cost £123 4s. 7d. more, the chorus £71 17s. 2d., and the copyright £98 17s. 4d., the committee having paid 100 guineas to Dr Macfarren for the privilege of producing his oratorio. The increased cost of the chorus was mainly due to the increased number of rehearsals, and the band included ten more strings than in 1874, besides which there were band rehearsals held in London, the expenses of the local players being met by the committee.

It was agreed to hand over to the charities the sum of £800, in the following proportions:—£400 to the Infirmary, £200 to the Dispensary, £100 to the Hospital for Women and Children, and £100 to the House of Recovery. Mr T. Marshall next moved the appointment of a provisional committee to promote the interests of the next Festival in 1880.

A discussion followed, during which Mr Spark defended the action of the committee in the selection of Mr Austin's Fire King. The Provisional Committee was then appointed, and, after votes of thanks to the Mayor, as chairman of the General Committee, to Mr F. Marshall, as chairman of the Executive Committee; and to the Hon. Secretaries, Messrs J. W. Atkinson and F. R. Spark, had been proposed, carried, and acknowledged, the meeting terminated. Commenting upon the Festival, the Leeds Express of the 12th has the following remarks:—

"The great musical success of the Leeds Festival held last month is equalled by the financial success which attended it. From the statement made at the committee meeting yesterday, we learn that the total receipts reached the large sum of £7,847, being £238 more than the receipts at the Festival in 1874. When the state of trade during the two periods is considered, the result, as the committee admit, 'must be regarded as satisfactory.' It is more than satisfactory. In 1874, trade was in a highly prosperous condition; whilst in 1877 trade is in an exceedingly depressed state. Luxuries of all kinds have been abandoned by thousands of persons who in 1874 freely indulged in them. In that year, large numbers of persons finding themselves 'flush' of money, gratified their love of display, of pleasure, or it may be of music, by attending the Festival. Many whose artistic tastes were never before exhibited, and whose mode of living was generally of a humble kind, spent their guineas in 'swelling it' at the Festival. This year, with the knowledge of long-continued bad trade, the committee felt that one source of patronage was completely cut off; and that the best course to pursue was to appeal to the real musical taste of the whole country by providing a Festival of the greatest excellence attainable. Expenditure, therefore, had to be increased; the fault of Festival Committees elsewhere in stinting rehearsals was to be avoided; everything, in fact, that would tend to a perfect performance of the various works to be produced was done. Hence we find that the £450 increased expenditure, as compared with 1874, has been applied solely to improvement in the musical department. The principal singers cost £157 more than at the last Festival. The band was increased from 96 to 106 performers; and this increase, together with the cost of extra rehearsals, required £123 more than in 1874. Then the chorus rehearsals were very numerous; and frequently all the singers from Bradford, Barnsley, Huddersfield, and other towns had to visit Leeds. All these things taken into consideration, we are bound to admit that the profit of nearly £900 on the Festival is a great and unexpected success. From the figures we published representing the attendance during the Festival, it was seen that the numbers were in excess of 1874; but, as was explained at the time, this increased attendance did not represent a corresponding increase in the receipts, for advantage was taken of the lower priced seats, and it was shown that no fewer than 1,000 persons purchased second-class tickets, who, in 1874, occupied the first-class seats. Although everybody must wish that this year there had been no reduction on the £1,000 profit which was divided among the charities in 1874, still, if we look to the future, it must be conceded that a stock-in-trade in the shape of reputation has been stored up for the future Leeds Festivals which cannot fail ultimately to produce excellent financial results, by which the medical charities of the town will receive substantial benefit."

A MILAN theatrical paper, speaking of the autumn season at Her Majesty's, says that important concessions will be made for the comfort of visitors. "Gentlemen" (it adds) "will be admitted without frock coat, and ladies will be allowed to wear hats in reserved corners."

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

You have been receiving such enthusiastic accounts of the Leeds Festival that I may be pardoned for wondering whether you would be unwilling to give ear to a report of humbler doings in the musical capital of Lancashire. Thus, with a modesty, I trust you will appreciate, I have allowed nearly a month of our musical season to run on without venturing to record its incidents. In a few lines, then, let me give you a summary of the past week.

The Gentleman's Concerts—a venerable society which possesses a handsome concert hall, and only issues tickets to subscribers—began, may I say, its season three weeks ago. The band, under Mr Hallé's direction, played Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Mr Hallé gave two movements of a Mozart concerto and a Chopin selection, and Miss Robertson was the singer.

For a fortnight large audiences were attracted to the Queen's Theatre by the Rose Hersee Opera Company. Mme Hersee, Mme Cave-Ashton, Miss St John, Mr Parkinson, Mr Bernard Lane, Mr Temple, Mr James, and other members of the "troop" did good service. The Bohemian Girl, The Lily of Killarney, and Maritana are always attractive here. Benedict's The Brides of Venice was also revived, and two really excellent performances of The Marriage of Figaro were given. More ambitious, and less judicious, was the production of The Huguenots in English, but Mme Rose Hersee's Valentine was a pleasant surprise. Mme Cave-Ashton sang the Queen's songs more than respectably, and Mr Temple was an effective Marcel. The orchestra was not strong, and a small harmonium is not a satisfactory substitute for missing instruments; nor was the Monks' chorus very terrible. But you, I am sure, would resent anything like censorious criticism of the efforts of a company which supplied, on the whole, satisfactory entertainments at marvellously low prices.

The Manchester Vocal Society began its season last week, and the programme of the first concert included Gounod's very interesting Messe du Sacré Cœur de Jesus. The Mass is choral throughout; but Mme Patey added to the pleasures of the evening by singing several of her most popular songs.

The first of Mr Pyatt-Patti-Reeves-Santley Concerts attracted a very large audience at the Free Trade Hall last Friday; but, unfortunately, Mr Sims Reeves had an intense cold and could not sing. The concert was not of much musical importance, but Mme Adelina Patti's magnificent voice and incomparable singing excited the usual enthusiasm. Mr Santley, who also was in splendid voice, was an admirable representative of English art. Herr Strakosch accompanied Mme Patti, and Mr Sidney Naylor the other singers.

On Saturday Mr De Jong gave the first of his annual series of ten fortnightly concerts. The band played, among other pieces, Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas overture and a grand selection from The Huguenots. Mme Edith Wynne, Mme Antoinette Sterling, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Sims Reeves were the singers, all of whom delighted the large audience, while Mr De Jong himself was not less successful in his flute solo.

Manchester, Oct. 17.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

The exigencies of professional life often force young artists from the art-homes of London and other musical centres to districts where their beloved muse, stricken dumb by the loud clang of trade and commerce, is unheard and unknown. All can sympathise with home-sickness, for, like love or the measles, it is universal; few, however, can understand and realise the miseries of the young musician, hungering after both mental nourishment and delight. Though lesson-giving proves lucrative and brings unwonted money circulation, though big breeches pockets bulge out with patronage towards him, still he feels that husks the swine eat are his only meat and daily portion. He writes as if some supernatural angler of men, hooking him by a mean bait and snatching him from his beloved element, had landed him to gasp away his forlorn existence. Newcastle, prosperous though it be, can scarcely be called a land flowing with musical wine and honey. Is it not rather a dreary waste? Rich in minerals, but poor in art; it would be violating the principles of economic science to carry coals there; but it is surely an act of benevolence to carry music. Mr W. Rea of late years has undertaken this mission. Not satisfied with the influence of his own admirable executive powers, he has brought annually to his evangelizing aid a London orchestra of the first class. To a superficial observer—and, musically, an English public is little else—orchestras are deemed mere superfluities, only to be used for programme padding. Our "Superficial" is unconscious of the fact that now-a-days the very breath of musical life is to be found therein. Undismayed by continued pecuniary losses, Mr W. Rea this year gives again a series of festival concerts, commencing on the 5th of November, extending over a week, instead of a month, as heretofore; for which he has engaged, partly through the agency of Mr N. Vert, an excellent vocal staff, consisting of Mmes Wynne and Patey, Misses Williams and Dalton, Messrs Lloyd, Bernard Lane, Lewis Thomas, and Foli. He claims, however, more novel merit in the qualities of his orchestra—an engine indispensable for the advancement of high art in a region weak in instrumental resources. The series opens with The Messiah, and the programme includes the Stabat Mater, Elijah, H. Smart's Bride of Dunkerron, a new cantata Hezekiah (written for the occasion by Dr Armes, of Durham Cathedral), a symphony, and pianoforte concertos by the great masters. A scheme of such variety and excellence deserves the patronage and support of a public Mr W. Rea has long and faithfully served. P. G.

LA MARJOLAINE AT THE ROYALTY THEATRE.

The Royalty Theatre opened under new management on the 11th instant, and "inaugurated" its season with the new opera-bouffe of Lecocq, La Marjolaine. During the recess the interior has been entirely re-decorated, and now presents a charmingly fresh and warm aspect. The Theatre is in reality an elegant bonbonnière. To those unacquainted with the libretto of Vanloo and Leterrier it may be mentioned that the scene opens with a view of the square opposite the Hotel de Ville of Brussels, where a great crowd is assembled to witness the periodical solemnity of presenting with a medal, as a prize for virtue, the young woman deemed irreproachable by the verdict of a unanimous jury? The prize is awarded to "La Marjolaine," a young and pretty girl, not long since married to an elderly Baron, Annibal (not the Carthaginian general), leader of a society of gay bachelors, the terror of husbands, who, meeting with the Baron, bets all his fortune that no woman exists whose virtue is beyond proof. Baron accepts challenge, and gives an entertainment to celebrate the event, to which endless Bachelors are invited. During their stay, Annibal (not the Carthaginian), in order to win the wager, attempts, but in vain, to compromise the young wife's virtue. At length, having bribed the Baron's steward, he succeeds in getting into Marjolaine's bed-room, concealed in a large trunk.* During the night, he witnesses the arrival of Frickel, a former lover† and foster-brother of "La Marjolaine," who, having been admitted a member of the Bachelors' Society, is cognizant of the bet, comes to warn and protect her. Annibal (not of Carthage) surprises the couple, secures Frickel (not Jarrett's), and calls in the guests. Thus "La Marjolaine" is exposed, and the wager won. The Baron, reduced to poverty, retires, leaving Annibal (a Frank) in possession of all his (the Baron's) property. On learning that the Baron has obtained a divorce from his wife, Annibal (a Kurd) endeavours to secure "La Marjolaine" for himself, but she, being free, gives her hand to Frickel ("No preparation"), declaring she has now obtained the true prize for virtue. In the English version, by Mr Sutherland Edwards, the plot is closely followed. There is little need, in fact, for change, the moral being pointed clearly enough. Mr Edwards has bestowed great pains on his book, and the words are admirably adapted to the music. Of the latter, it is long since such elegant and unaffected writing has been heard. Number after number contains features of great beauty, and all are distinguished in character.‡ Some of the melodies have already a widespread reputation, and there is not a dull measure in the whole opera.§ The cast includes Miss Kate Santley as "La Marjolaine," Miss Rose Cullen as Aveline, Mr Walter Fisher as Frickel, Mr Mervin as Annibal, and Mr Lionel Brough as the Baron.¶ The minor characters are well filled; the chorus, although small, is efficient; and the piece is well mounted. La Marjolaine is a welcome addition to the répertoire of good opéra-bouffe, and has our hearty wishes for a long run.

F. W. HAYDON ACROSS ART.

Mr F. W. Haydon, of Southsea, writes to the Times, under date October 4th, enclosing a copy of a letter from Sir Stafford Northcote, M.P., which he has received in answer to one addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to his speech on Art education at Exeter on the 21st ult. Mr Haydon, in his letter to Sir Stafford Northcote, remarked:—

"I have read with interest your remarks at Exeter with reference to the changes that have taken place in England, particularly as regards public instruction in art, since 1841. I see with regret that while you appear to give all the credit of our present Art Schools to the late Mr William Ewart and to others who have come after him, you pass over in silence the public services in respect of our Art Schools of a prominent man in British Art, and a Devonshire man to boot—viz., the late Mr Haydon, painter, who, for fully one quarter of a century before Mr Ewart took up the subject in Parliament of Art instruction, had been incessantly at work to get the various administrations to give support to Art schools for the benefit and instruction of the people of England."

In answer to this he received the following letter:—

"Sir—I regret that you should have considered my remarks at Exeter in any way slighting towards the late Mr Haydon, of whose merits and services to the cause of art I have always thought highly. I was not attempting to review the history of Art education, or to apportion praise to those who have laboured to promote it. I was only sketching very rapidly and roughly some of the features of the English educational system in 1841, and at the present time; and I referred to Mr Ewart's committee as showing the stages which have been reached at the former period. It did not fall within the range of my observations to discuss the merits of those to whom our progress since 1841, is due, nor the influence which the labour of those who had been in the field before them had upon their work. No complete account of these matters could be given without reference to the honourable exertions of Mr Haydon. I remain, faithfully yours, Stafford H. Northcote."

[When are they going to say a word or two about music? Surely an oratorio like Joseph is as much a work of genius and acquirement as any picture by any living painter. It is easier to paint a Huguenot soldier than to write an oratorio!—D. P.]

A TALE OF THE DAYS OF OLD.

The dark hours sped through the winter's night,
Like ghosts that glide to the mystic fold,
As the blue-eyed boy heard with fear and delight
A tale of the days of old.

The ancient fire-place seemed to stare
Like a witness to what the grandsire told,
To the face half hid in the shaggy fair hair,
Of the tale of the days of old.

The lingering logs shed a dying glow
In the gloom; the young listener, not over bold,
Was awed and pale as he drank in the flow
Of the tale of the days of old.

All night he gloated and pondered in bed:
'Twas a morning stroke the cracked bell tolled
Ere he slept, and dreamt over what had been said
Of the tale of the days of old. P. S. K. M.

MANNHEIM.—Herr Hermann Götz's posthumous opera, Francesca da Rimini, has been produced here, and, despite a cast in many respects inefficient, achieved a marked success. The first act hung fire somewhat, but the grand love-duet of the second act excited great enthusiasm. The third is dramatically rather uninteresting; the music, however, contains beauties of a high order. Mdle Ottiker proved an admirable Francesca. Herr Frank, who, with Herr Johann Brahms, completed the score for the stage, and was erroneously stated to have since died, conducted with great ability.

VIENNA.—Critics are greatly divided in opinion as to Herr Ignaz Brüll's new work, Der Landfriede, recently produced at the Royal Operahouse. Some pronounce it an extraordinary success, while others declare it to be a complete failure. Meanwhile, one fact cannot be denied: the opera went extremely well the first night, the composer and the representatives of the principal characters being enthusiastically and repeatedly called on after each act. But modern experience has taught us that first night manifestations cannot be invariably received as proofs of artistic merit.

VERSIFICATION.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR.—Can you recommend me some book upon versification?
Yours obediently, P. S. K. M.

Read the English poets (especially Milton, Pope, and Crabbe); try to scan the Odes of Horace; and consult your own ear. Rhythmic music is a good help. D. P.

WAIFS.

Signor Schira has returned from Milan, having made all arrangements with a celebrated Italian man of letters for the libretto of his projected new opera, which will be, in these desolate times, a god-send to the "sunny," but now not over-fertile (in re dramatic music), peninsula. Heaven speed the worthy maestro, whose characteristic and spirited Lord of Burleigh we should all like to hear again.

Sig. Braga has returned to Paris.

M. Offenbach has been suffering from gout.

Flotow is engaged upon an opera entitled Aurelia.

Sig. Bazzini (Florence) is engaged on a new Quartet.

Mad. Adelina Patti is expected in Milan on the 27th inst.

Miss Emma Barnett, the admirable young pianist, has gone to Italy on a visit.

M. Kowalski's opera, Gilles de Bretagne, is in rehearsal at the Théâtre-Lyrique.

Mdle Albani is engaged to sing at Leeds on the 19th of December in The Messiah.

A Wagner Association, with Herr Buth, a pianist, at its head, is to be founded in Breslau.

The Grand Duke of Baden, has conferred the cross of the Zähringer Lion on Don Pablo Sarasate, the violinist.

M. Charles Garnier, architect of the Grand Opera, Paris, has been appointed Inspector-General of Public Buildings.

Sig. de Giosa has composed a four-act semi-serious opera, entitled Rabagas, and founded upon Victorien Sardou's comedy.

Unpublished masses by Palestrina, and autograph manuscripts of J. S. Bach's, have been discovered in a convent at Gratz.

The first anniversary of the transportation of Bellini's remains to Catania was celebrated by a solemn mass in the Cathedral.

After all that has been said to the contrary, M. Gounod's Polyeucte may be produced at the Grand Opera during the Exhibition.

During the Patti Performances at the Scala, Milan, the price of an orchestra stall will be fifty francs, and of a pit seat, thirty.

By a decree of King Victor Emanuel, Sig. Verdi is appointed a member of the Italian Commission at the Paris Universal Exhibition.

Herr Hans von Bülow officiated, for the first time, as conductor at the Theatre Royal, Hanover, on the 4th inst. The opera was Fidelio.

The revival of Les Diamants de la Couronne at the Paris Opéra-Comique is not very creditable to any of the artists concerned in it, except M. Danbé and his orchestra.

Thanks to the great amelioration in his health, M. H. Vieuxtemps has resumed his duties as "finishing professor" ("professeur de perfectionnement"), in the Brussels Conservatory.

M. Gevaert is engaged in transforming into a grand opera his Quentin Durward, first produced at the Paris Opéra-Comique, with MM. Faure and Coudere in the principal parts.

Mad. Pauline Lucca is to receive two thousand four hundred pounds for her twelve night's engagement in Madrid, and eight hundred and forty pounds for her six performances at Nice.

Herr Joachim Raff has left Wiesbaden, where he has been domiciled since May, 1856, and taken up his residence in Frankfurt, to fulfil his duties as director of Hoch's Conservatory of Music.

M. Anton Rubinstein's opera of Nero will be produced almost simultaneously in Paris and St Petersburg. There are four different versions of the libretto; one in French, one in Italian, one in German, and one in Russian.

Don Felipe Ducascal, manager of the Teatro Español and the Teatro de las Novedades, Madrid, is having a theatre built on the Trocadero, Paris. He intends giving performances of Zaruelas and Spanish national dancing during the Universal Exhibition.

Mad. Knopp-Fehring, formerly Mdle Withun, a native of Berlin, who created a sensation as a concert singer, when only 14 years of age, has just died at Weimar. She sang the part of Agathe at the Royal Berlin Operahouse, on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the production of Der Freischütz.

The first general rehearsal of L'Africaine took place at the Grand Opera, Paris, on the 9th inst., under the direction of M. Ch. Lamoureux, who entered upon his duties as conductor, for the first time. In order to devote himself entirely to his new post, M. Lamoureux has resigned his place as second conductor of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire.

The new organ erected in Gualford Church was opened on Tuesday, Oct. 8th, by Mr W. Higley. The instrument was built by Mr Nicholson, of Worcester. The sermon was preached by the Lord Bishop of the diocese; the service being by Jackson, and the anthem ("Rejoice in the Lord") by Dr Elvey. The offertory amounted to £20 11s. 1½d.—Malvern News.

He had been to a revival meeting, he said. At all events, coming home at half past twelve, fumbling up stairs in the dark, and going head first over a scuttle of coals the girl had left on the landing, he sang, "Let the Lower Lights be burning," with a fervency that Sankey might have emulated.

BRUNSWICK.—A period of twenty-five years had elapsed on the 30th ult. since Herr Franz Abt, the celebrated song-composer, first wielded the conductor's stick, as director of the Choral Association for Male Voices. He did not, however, enter on his duties as Capellmeister at the theatre till the 1st January, 1853. For this reason his official "jubilee" will not come off till next January. But a preparatory and informal jubilee took place on the 29th and 30th ult. in the Egydien-Kirche. The proceedings commenced with a concert, the programme of which included various choral pieces for Male Vocal Associations, a speech by Herr Schwerin, the stage-manager at the Theatre, and a number of the jubilarian's songs. The vocalists were Mdle Brandt and Herr Fricker, from the Royal Operahouse, Berlin; Mdle Schreiber and Herr Himmer. Mdle Brandt had to appear the next day in Lohengrin at Berlin. In consequence of her being encored in Abt's "Liebesbotschaft," she had barely time to catch her train, and was obliged to start just as she sang the song, in concert costume, with flowers in her hair, and so forth. On the 30th there was a grand performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony and other less important works, the leading artists being Mdme Koch-Bossenger, from Hanover; Herren Schröter and Nöldechen, of the Ducal Theatre; and Señor Sarasate. Innumerable congratulatory messages and valuable presents were forwarded to the jubilarian from far and wide.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 6d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

More about Blackmailing.

(From the New York "Arcadian.")

JOURNALISTIC VERMIN.

The Sun of Tuesday, October 16th, copied a statement originally made in the Mercury, and therefrom copied into the Dispatch. Reasons, which will be apparent through the perusal of my letter to the Sun, made me write to that paper as follows:—

ABOUT MISS ABBOTT, MR LAKE, AND MR ENGEL.

"To the Editor of 'The Sun.'"

"Sir,—The Sun of Tuesday, 16th inst., contained the following:—

'Accounts of an outrageous attempt to blackmail Miss Emma Abbott, the singer, have been published in the Sunday Dispatch and the Sunday Mercury. The story is that a man connected with a "pretentious" weekly newspaper called on Mr Lake, with whose family Miss Abbott resides, showed proof sheets of a favourable and an unfavourable criticism, and demanded fifty dollars for suppressing the one and publishing the other. The climax of the interview, according to the reports, was the kicking out of the rascal by Mr Lake. We are informed that, while Mr. Lake furnishes the story for publication, he refuses to tell who the would-be blackmailer was or what newspaper he represented. Mr Lake's duty is to expose the man, and have him sent to prison; and if he does not do so, his reputation for truthfulness will suffer among people who do not know him.'

"When reading this, I took no further notice of it, assuming (as the World did) that it was an advertising dodge of Mr Lake, for which he did not pay. This day, however, I received by mail a slip from a paper whose existence I did not even know, and which is, I am told, edited by two associates, one a miserable office-boy, the other an old beggar, who has got nothing on earth—less than nothing, for he has not even got a nose. These two literary celebrities found nothing on earth to draw attention to their little sheet—which I shall not name, because to be noticed is all they want—than to name me as the man who brought the two articles to choose from to Mr Lake's house, hoping thereby to raise a scandal which would secure them a few dollars' sale. Now the man who goes through the journalistic world noiseless and noiseless made a mistake. He will get no advertisement. I would get him instantly arrested and punished for libel, if it was worth my while, or if he had a cent in the world to lose. But what will happen to him, he does not. For the present, suffice it to say, that at the time which this paragraph alludes to—that is, when Miss Abbott came before the public in her concert, first week of February—I had severed all connection with the paper I used to write for, and I had not yet bought the Arcadian. I had, therefore, no paper at all to write in, and thereby that case is settled so far as I am concerned. I received on January 25th a letter from Miss Abbott inviting me to dinner at Mr Lake's, but I declined the invitation; and it was the evening before her concert that Brignoli and Ferranti both, after the rehearsal, asked me (having authority and the friendship for Miss Abbott) to tell her that she made some horrid flouriture and shakes. Then I spoke about this to her husband. He virtually compelled me to go and dine with him, and hear Miss Abbott after dinner, and tell her the truth. I did hear her, and told her that she would be cut up by all the critics if she ventured upon making a shake, which she made worse than any pupil I knew. The result was that she thanked me, made no shake in the concert, and got over the difficulty by escaping it. When she afterward sang in the Academy of Music, I wrote her, like a true friend, that I regretted to tell her that her singing displeased me, for reasons which I gave, and she replied, saying she was so sorry she could not satisfy me, but that she hoped she would be able to do so in Marguerita; that she 'begged of me to tell her what studies to make, and to come and advise her about it.' But I was then very much engaged. I had bought the Arcadian, where I expressed my opinion frankly, as I always do, and I saw her no more.

To the best of my belief, the story of Mr Lake is a lie. Either he said it or somebody credits him with it. Not only is no journalist so stupid as to let two so different articles in proof go out of his hands which would break his neck once forever, but I believe that Mr Lake would have made no fuss and paid him.

Because I can say that Mr Lake told me himself of a journalist to whom he had gone to offer him money, a thing which he said he would not do for a thousand dollars for himself, but which he did for his little protégé. The critic in question, however, he told me, declined, not from virtuous scruples, but because he was not sure that his article would be published. About another critic he asked me, too, what he should give him, and I heard afterwards that he had decided upon giving him a pin, I know not of what value. The whole story is, as the World says, an advertising dodge, and, as far as I am concerned, simply a lie. "LOUIS ENGEL,

"New York October 18."

To this letter a rejoinder was put in, one series of barefaced lies, to which I replied the following:

"To the Editor of 'The Sun.'"

"SIR.—In to-day's Sun a Mr Thoms, whom I have the honour not to know, and who calls himself the editor of a journal which I have the pleasure of never seeing, avows that he himself is the liar who said that I was the man who brought two articles in proof to Miss Abbott and tried to blackmail her, and he further says that, if I will bring a suit for libel against him, he will bring the testimony of several gentlemen in support of his lie. I dare say he wants a suit very badly, and every suit will be welcome to him; but he only adds new lies to the old ones. I will have him indicted to-morrow if Mr Lake or any responsible person will guarantee the costs and damages to be awarded, otherwise I would only lose my time and lawyer's expenses to prove, what nobody cares to know, that Thoms, Mr Watson's office-boy, as I am told, who derives all his education from sweeping the office and collecting small bills, is a liar, a nonentity, a journalistic vermin. Having gained the reputation of being one of the best musical critics in the United States, and as the editor of a paper universally respected for its able and fair criticisms, it is utterly beneath the dignity of my position to have any controversy with such a person. Miss Abbott is not capable of making deliberately a false statement; and since I have not seen her, nor written to her, nor held any communication with her after her singing at the Academy, as I stated in my letter on Saturday, the assertion that I 'endeavoured to get a letter from her, acquitting me from blackmail,' is another lie to be put down to the credit of Mr T. That a 'great piano house in Fifth avenue,' should so lower itself as to make incorrect statements to such people is difficult to believe; but since I have had the most pleasant business connection with several 'great piano houses on Fifth avenue,' it is but right to say that a house in Fifth avenue ordered their advertisement in the Arcadian exactly as others did, who paid their bills punctually; that the first month was promptly paid; that several other months were paid with great difficulty and after very long waiting; and that on the 5th October, the advertisement being ordered to be discontinued, it was instantly taken out, as a glance at our advertising columns will show; and that, of course I demanded payment up to the time the discontinuance of the advertisement was ordered, but it is true, 'did not get it,' not because it was not due, but because prompt payment is not one of the distinguishing features of the said house. I will not further trespass upon your valuable space. Those who wish to know the fuller details of the case will find it in the next issue of the Arcadian, and I think that for a few days the matter may safely rest there.

"LOUIS ENGEL,

"Editor of the Arcadian."

"New York, October 20."

HOW THE MATTER AROSE.

When I saw the first notice in the Sun, copied from the Mercury, I had, of course, no idea what it meant, and did not care. But when my name was dragged into it, I was informed of the particulars. One of the editors of the Mercury told me that some time ago he received complaints from different actresses, who informed him that an individual called upon them with notices cut out of the Mercury, offering for $50 to get them similar notices in that paper. Thereupon, he very properly put a notice in the Mercury, informing anybody "whom it may concern" that no person from the Mercury was authorised to go on such errands, and that the person who did call evidently was not connected with the Mercury, and was simply a blackmailer. In consequence of this timely notice, he received a note, apparently written by a lady—and as he thought by Miss Abbott—urging him, as he had undertaken the good work of protecting people against wandering blackmailers, to expose the attempt to blackmail Miss Abbott, which was stated in the note, and which the Mercury published. It was, however, found that the handwriting of the note in question was small and by no means like Miss Abbott's handwriting, which I showed him. The very moment this notice appeared in the Mercury, a slip (alluded to in my first letter to the Sun) was sent there with a note requesting insertion of the same, giving my name as that of the blackmailer wanted. The slip being on the face of it a gross, contemptible libel, the editor threw it away, and, of course, denied his powerful publicity to the vulgar liar. The following, from the Sunday Times, shows, in the same manner, how respectable papers judge the affair:—

"What would otherwise have been an uneventful week in dramatic circles has been enlivened by a couple of bits of 'Scan-mag' in the cases of Abbott-Lake-Engel blackmail affair and the Shook-Gilmore lawsuit. Regarding the former, anonymous articles were sent to the press (we received one of them), saying that a critic of one of the papers had written two articles on Miss Abbott, one in praise of her artistic merit, the other, to the contrary, condemning her, showed them to Mr Lake, offering to publish the first and suppress the other for fifty dollars; the offer being refused, the unfavourable one appeared. Since its appearance, charges have been made that Mr Engel, of the Arcadian, was the critic in question, which charge Mr Engel emphatically denies, under his own signature, in yesterday's Sun. The accusation, being anonymous, is naturally to be taken cum grano salis, while the denial being bold and under signature we are glad to believe, and cast our vote in favour of, Mr Engel."

What is not clear in this case is this assertion of the papers: "We are informed that while Mr Lake furnished the story for publication, he refuses to tell who the would-be blackmailer was, or what paper he represented." I do not see that Mr Lake informed or furnished himself any story; I have not seen that he comes forward denying anything. I have asked to see the note giving the information about that double paragraph being brought to Mr Lake's house, but it cannot be found. I can, therefore, not say how far Mr Lake is implicated in the affair, or that he did participate in it to any extent. If he did, it is simple cowardice not to come forward and to say, "That is what I know of the case. Here is the proof-sheet of the two articles, and such is the name of the man who, for such a sum, offered publication of either of the two articles." And then another question is this: It is alleged that the man has been kicked out of the house. Well, did he or did he not publish the article threatened with? To write to a paper on purpose to publish a story, and then not to be able or willing to substantiate it, is evidently reprehensible. The story, as told, is excessively improbable, and, I repeat it, my belief is that it is not true, because the man would have been paid. Mr Lake went to the reporter of a great daily paper who was said to be accessible to such courtesy, a man whom I do not wish to denounce, but since, to my certain knowledge, he had several times taken money, I sent Mr Lake to him. With what effect is stated in above letter to the Sun. The man had become so notorious at his office that they sent another reporter by the side of him, and of the two reports usually published the other one. He, therefore, declined taking the money, but Mr Lake evidently would have been willing to pay. The writer in question is no longer in connection with the paper, or, for aught I know, with any paper in this city, so that no suspicion can attach to any present writer. The other man has so publicly and so recently been held up for blackmailing that not much harm can be done by this additional proof. Besides I will give Mr Wetherell, if he chooses to see it, the name and address of the journalist in London to whom he offered $50 as a regular salary for "taking care of the press" for Miss Abbott.* The offer in this case was indignantly declined, but although I cannot see where there is the harm, when people wish a singer to succeed, that they should buy her dresses and diamonds and articles, where articles are to be bought, still I cannot but stigmatize as a contemptibly mean proceeding that they go and raise a fuss about paying journalists and allow the suspicion to swim in the air as a vague possibility over the head of any body who writes; and when a scoundrel comes out for the sake of raising a scandal and making a few dollars by throwing his own dirt on an honourable name, that those who surround Miss Abbott, if they have, as it is stated, furnished the story for publication, should not come forward honestly and show the offered proof and show up the man who brought it to the house. My connection with the whole affair, as I stated, was only that of a friend and a musician, who, it was well known to Miss Abbott, was on intimate terms with the greatest singers of the time, on account of good advice they received from him. I would have been happy to advise Miss Abbott. But it did not come to all that, because I have not since seen her; so that the man, whatever be his name and standing, be he wealthy, respected, contemptible, a beggar, an inflated office-boy, or a millionaire—whoever says that I took, or tried to take, any amount of money, under any pretext whatever, says a barefaced, deliberate falsehood. Miss Abbott's second letter, written in a very modest and in her usual very kind manner (alluded to about her satisfying my opinion of her singing in Marguerita), reached me Tuesday, April 28th, consequently after her three concerts in Chickering Hall, and her début in the Figlia del Reggimento at the Academy—clearly, therefore, long after the time the alleged blackmail was to have taken place. This is only one more, although unnecessary, proof that the allegation that my name had anything to do with it is an absolutely groundless, dishonourable invention.

That a paper like the Sun should allow itself to be covered with that slime is certainly to be regretted, but it is not always easy to believe that a daring liar would risk to publish a statement so base and baseless. Anyhow, I might as well mention that Mr Byrne, of the Dramatic News, and Mr Read, of an illustrated weekly, were both named as the one. I know neither of them sufficiently to form an opinion about the likelihood of their being implicated, but I have heard that Mr Read has been acquitted by Mr Lake. Since, to the best of my belief, never any double proof, as alleged, was taken there, nobody can be guilty of having anything to do with it. I spoke about Miss Abbott, with all her defects as a singer, and her excellent qualities as a lady, several times—always what was, to the best of my belief, absolute truth: and I defy anybody on earth to show me that I did not do so with any artist or artistic performance, in this or any other paper wherever I wrote.

In conclusion, I beg to ask the reader and my friends in the press: Is it to be tolerated that in journalism, in honest, straightforward, meritorious journalism, where a man knows his business thoroughly, writes to the best of his recognized abilities, with impartiality and honesty—that despicable vermin should be allowed to throw lying accusations on his honourable name, and that scandal-mongers should jump at the opportunity to propagate what would otherwise be hidden in forgotten and never-to-be-seen papers? Is it not every honest journalist's business to disapprove of such proceedings, and loudly to protest against the unexplained dodge of a man who raises a fuss about a story which he cannot show to have ever happened, and against the scandalous endeavour of the journalistic vermin to take advantage of the opportunity, and increase the scandal by a series of gratuitous, barefaced, impudent lies!

NEW JACOBITE SONG.

Sound the Slogan!*

Sound the Slogan! fire the heather!	On his head be tens of thousands!
Spring to arms, ye sons of Gaël!	Bribes all loyal hearts defy;
Strike for freedom and Prince Charlie,	Gather, gather, round his standard,
Let thy foes before thee quail!	All who dare to do or die!
'Tis your rightful King who calls you!	Leave the fields and flocks untended;
Can the fearless clansman stay?	Let the bridegroom leave his bride—
"Never!" glens and mountains echo—	Onward! sons of Scotland, onward!
Speed with fiery cross away!	Haste to join your Prince's side!
On, on, to deeds of glory!	On, on, to deeds of glory!
On to fields of deathless fame!	On to fields of deathless fame!
On, on, Prince Charlie calls you!	On, on, Prince Charlie calls you!
On, in love and honour's name!	On, in love and honour's name!

OPERA IN FRANCE AND NORTH GERMANY.

Reminiscences of 1873.

BY MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

Early in 1851 arrangements were completed for the foundation of a third French lyric theatre, a home for which was found in the Théâtre-Historique, built in 1847 by the celebrated author, Alexandre Dumas, for the presentment of his own plays, but which, as a pecuniary speculation, had completely failed to realise the intentions of its proprietor. The shape of what in these days is termed the auditorium of the Théâtre-Historique was novel, being a broad oval, in which the spectators were brought close to a stage in itself very spacious, and affording scope for any amount of spectacular effects. Excellent as the results of this style of architecture proved, being not only pleasing to the eye, but satisfactory to the ear, it has never—the new Théâtre Vaudeville excepted—as far as the writer is aware, been adopted elsewhere. Here, then, the Opéra National, for so it was called, opened in the autumn of the same year, under the management of M. Edmond Seveste, a man of considerable literary distinction, long since deceased. Appealing, by the remoteness of its situation, in the Boulevard du Temple, and by the lowness of its prices, more exclusively to the bourgeoisie class, the new establishment maintained at first a struggling existence; and, had it not been for the energy of its director, whose health at last gave way altogether, just as he was beginning to reap the fruits of his praiseworthy efforts in the cause of art, it would probably have soon ceased to exist. The repertoire, too, was very circumscribed, owing to the rights prescriptive of the Opéra-Comique, which rendered it impossible to mount any of the popular compositions of Auber, Hérold, and others. But these very disadvantages, which at the commencement caused the new venture to look so hopeless, in the long run told immeasurably in its favour. The beaten track could not be followed; a new one must be found. The theatre, if it was to live at all, must do so by the production of new works and the introduction of those whose composers belonged to other countries. And how well the scheme prospered, how consistently the leading idea—at any rate during the days of the Second Empire—was carried out; how high the Théâtre-Lyrique, as it was soon re-christened, limited though it was to a certain extent in its orchestral and choral resources, has stood in the estimation, not only of the Parisians, but of all musical connoisseurs throughout the world, are so many facts which have long since been universally admitted. The opening performances were not brilliant. The weekly treasury showed a beggarly account of empty boxes, and an equally bare attendance in the rest of the seats. The new singers, pupils of the Conservatoire,—with the exception of Meillet, a barytone, who afterwards rose to eminence, and Mdlle Duez, who too soon disappeared,—did not please. The inaugural opera, Mosquita, an inferior novelty by an inferior composer, Boisselot, was a fiasco, though an adaptation of Rossini's Barbiere, given on the off-nights, went better—as how should it fail to do? The attention of the public was first aroused by the production of La Perte du Brésil, by Félicien David, whose compositions have stood high in France, and been heard with interest elsewhere, since his melodies, though slight, are invariably pleasing, his orchestration graceful, and his power of giving local colouring, especially when the scene is tropical or oriental, remarkable. Witness Le Desert, Cristofa Colombo, Lallah Rookh, and the above. La Perte du Brésil was a complete success, and was followed up by the introduction to the French stage of Mdlle Caroline Duprez, daughter of the famous tenor, who had already sung in Italian here and in London. It would be impossible to follow every detail in the history of the new theatre from then to the present time; but some few of the leading incidents may, as far as memory can supply them, be given. In 1853 Le Bijou Perdu, by Adolphe Adam, introduced to Parisian audiences Mdlle Marie Cabel, the dazzling brilliancy of whose vocalism at once took the town by storm. Here also Mdlle Viardot, by her performance of Orfée, created, or rather revived an interest for the almost forgotten composer Glück. It is to this theatre that Gounod in a great measure owes his fame, for if previously, and with justice, looked upon as one of the most rising composers of the day, it was not until the production of Faust that his name became thoroughly established. Even Wagner, to whom, on the getting up of Tannhäuser at the Grand Opera, with the avowed support of many leading members of society, it was unhesitatingly told by the public that “they would have none of him,” was at least received and cherished here, where his Rienzi and Lohengrin were given with decided success. It was at the Théâtre-Lyrique that Marimon and Marie Sass first worked their way up, that Nilsson laid the foundation of her world-wide reputation: and during the leaseholdship of M. Carvalho it long held a permanent attraction in that most consummate and exquisitely-finished vocalist, Mdlle Miolan-Carvalho, whose Cherubino, Pamina, Reine Topaze (in Victor Massé's fancifully named opera), Marguerite, and Juliette, were impersonations never to be forgotten by those who witnessed them. Owing to alterations in the Boulevard du Temple, the original Théâtre-Lyrique had been pulled down in the midst of all these triumphs, and its company removed to a new and exceedingly beautiful building in the Place du Chatelet, which in its turn was destroyed by the Communists in 1871. Pending the re-construction of this building, which will, it is said, be effected next year, a remnant of the old troupe has found a temporary home in the little Salle d'Athénée, situated in the Rue Scribe. The most important event, since its re-opening for the winter, has been the revival of Le Bijou Perdu, interesting as associated with the earliest successes of Marie Cabel. The plot of Le Bijou Perdu is of a nature which will not bear translation, and, as such, was justly censured by the English critics on the introduction of the opera, with its brilliant prima donna, to our St James's Theatre in the summer of 1854; but from first to last the interest is thoroughly sustained, its repulsive character softened by the tact with which all French actors, and they alone, whilst giving due point to the humour of the situations, appear capable of toning down and almost removing their often gross indelicacy. The music, though bright, is utterly trivial, and in one part only, the second finale, the charm of which is irresistible, has the composer shown himself worthy of such works as Le Châlet and Le Postillon du Lonjumeau, or the ballets La Fille du Danube and Giselle. The personnel of the Théâtre-Lyrique,* as at present constituted, is not strong, but scope is here afforded for the merits of a clever comedian, Lepers, a pleasing tenor, Jouanne, whilst there is a decidedly attractive Toinon in Mdlle Singelée, a piquant actress and a pretty woman, whose vocal merits are great, her facility of execution seemingly altogether without limit.

A fairy fleet came sailing
Over an opal sea,
A fleet of fleecy cloudlets
Spreading their sails for me.
With the angels' breath to waft them
Over the swelling tide,
Ever they sped and hastened,
Seeking to reach my side.

My weeping eyes had watch'd them
Sail from the setting sun,
With an angel child to guide them
Sitting in every one.
I gaz'd at the holy children,
Perchance one might be mine.
Oh! why was that sea so distant,
I could not reach its line?

So high, and so cruelly distant!
Yet I pierced its mighty space
With a cry soon heard and answer'd
By a child with an angel's face.
Who bent o'er his tiny vessel,
And stay'd the swelling sail,
And whisper'd to me, “O mourner,
So weary, and sad, and pale,
Your tears are the adverse current
I try to stem—and fail!”
I know not if I have dreamt it,
This strange, sweet phantasy;
But now the stretching Heavens
Seem ever a sea to me,
And, when the cloud-fleet cross it,
My tears they never see!

MUSIC A SCIENCE OF NUMBERS.

BY WILLIAM CHAPPELL.

The subject which I submit for your consideration this afternoon is the influence of numbers in music, as in the various combinations of consonances and dissonances which we hear every day, and to show how these are explained by the fundamental laws of the science.

Although music has appeared to many persons a difficult subject, it is really one of the most easily intelligible and one of the most firmly grounded of sciences. It is purely a science of numbers.

The consonances which charm the ear, such as the octave, twelfth, fifth, fourth, and the major and minor thirds, have two concurrent sets of vibrations; the one set produced by the lower string or pipe, and the other by the upper. Although they vibrate at different rates, yet there are periodical coincidences of vibration between them, and these coincidences sound with much more power upon the ear than the vibrations which are non-coincident, or sound apart. It has been calculated that two hammers striking simultaneously upon an anvil have, through the greater displacement of air, fourfold loudness, instead of merely double. The same law applies to musical sounds. Coincidence of vibration is more briefly expressed by its synonyme, "consonance;" and all non-coincident vibrations are included in "dissonances," meaning only that they sound apart. In a musical sense, dissonance is the medium between concord and discord, running from one into the other; for, in the most pleasing intervals, there are some non-coincident vibrations, and when these become very numerous, they overpower all concord. This will be shown in the sequel.

Suppose we take one long pianoforte string or an organ-pipe. The lowest sound it can produce will be that of its whole length, and this may be made the foundation of an entire scale of consonant notes, for every aliquot part of the length, being such as will measure without any remainder, will be also a multiple of the vibrations of No. 1. Thus No. 2, the octave, is half the length and vibrates twice as fast as the whole string. No. 3, the so-called twelfth, or octave and fifth, is a third of the length of No. 1, and it vibrates thrice as fast. Then, if we sound No. 3 with No. 2 instead of No. 1, we throw off the lower octave and have the fifth only, or 3 to 2. It is essential for consonance that the intervals should be aliquot parts of No. 1, for if otherwise, we should only create discord. The musical law is expressed very simply, that the number of vibrations is in inverse ratio to the length of a string.

The scale of all consonances is called the harmonic scale, copies of which are before you. It is exemplified by string or pipe. Let us consider, first, the Æolian harp, on which the winds alone produce the consecutive sounds. The strings are tuned in unison, except the two outmost, one on each side, and those are covered with wire, and tuned an octave lower. When the wind blows quickly enough to sound the bass strings, which we will suppose to have tuned to C on the bass clef, with 128 vibrations in a second of time, it is the whole string which sounds first, and the rapidity of the wind must be doubled before the harp will sound any change of note, and that note will be the octave above the first. It has already been said that the octave is produced by half the length of a string, and that it vibrates twice as fast as the whole—but mark the coincidence between the music and consecutive numbers; 1 and 2 have no note between them, although the sound jumps from the whole length to that of the half! When the bass strings sound the half length they have divided themselves into equal halves by a node, and that node creates tension in opposite directions, the one ventral segment pulling, as it were, against the other. These self-forming nodes may be easily seen by daylight, and at night by throwing a light upon the string. They were shown at our first conversazione in these rooms by Mr Spiller, and at the Edinburgh meeting of the British Association by Mr Ladd. The gust of wind which sounds the octave, or half length of the bass strings of the Æolian harp, sounds at the same time the whole length of the gut strings, because they are tuned to that pitch. Then, as the wind rises, subdivision goes on in both with every multiple of 128 vibrations for the bass, and of 256 vibrations for the tenor strings.

The reason for tuning the Æolian harp to a low pitch is, that the strings may be more easily acted upon by the wind. We read, poetically, of hanging one in a tree, but it requires a much stronger draught than it will get there, except during a hurricane, when no one will care to go to listen. Our late lamented Vice-President, Sir Charles Wheatstone, F.R.S., fixed a single violin string under a very draughty door, as an Æolian harp; and he calculated the increase of draught caused by lighting a fire in the room, and by the opening of an outer door, by the rising pitch of the note. The varieties produced by this string have been described as "simultaneous sounds," but they were purely consecutive. Anyone may satisfy himself that it could only be so, by repeating the experiment with a good violin string. The change of note is simultaneous with the change of nodes in the string. Mere undulations, or irregularities of vibration, will not change the note, but injure the quality of the tone. All the curves that a string may describe in vibration have been calculated by mathematicians, but only when nodes are formed are they of any importance in music.

Often have I experimented upon harmonics or natural sounds, in former years, and have watched the changes of node, and have heard the simultaneous change of note. The experiments may be tried by any one who has access to a harpsichord, or a very old grand pianoforte. The tension is too great in modern instruments to allow free play to the string. Raise the damper and strike one of the longest uncovered strings with a hard pianoforte hammer near the bridge. The changes follow in numerical order, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, as in the paper before you, and the sounds ascend by octave, fifth, fourth, major and minor third, harmonic seventh, to the third octave, and then to the major and minor tones. It is difficult to attain the highest of these numbers, but the harmonic seventh, No. 7, is readily distinguished by its unusual sound.

In the Æolian harp the rising pitch of the sounds is caused by the increasing rapidity of the wind; but it is not so on a pianoforte. It is there due to gradual contractions of the string till it ceases to vibrate, and sinks to rest. The vibrations of a long string are widely discursive, but they become gradually more and more contracted as the nodes of the string diminish in length. The point to be remarked is that the sounds jump over intermediate discords—all are consonances—all aliquot parts: all the sounds are multiples of No. 1. It matters not whether it be wind, string, or pipe; in each of them Nature teaches us the scale which is to resolve all musical doubts, all disputed chords. She indicates all the bases for musical intervals, the more remote ones adapted only for melody, and the nearest for consonant harmony.

To prove the case further we may take an illustration from a pipe. It must not be from those which have lateral openings, or keys, because they shorten the column of air artificially, but from such instruments as the coach horn, or hunting horn, the so-called French horn, or the trumpet without valves.

The fundamental tone, No. 1, or lowest sound it can produce, is derived from the whole column of air within the tube. To produce No. 2 the rapidity of the breathing must be doubled, and then the column of air within the horn divides himself into two equal halves, and the sound is an octave above; so that, if the first note be tenor C with 256 vibrations in a second of time, this treble C requires to be blown at the rate of 256 vibrations to produce it. Here, again, we arrive at the identification of sounds with numbers; for, just as there is no intermediate number between 1 and 2, so is there no intermediate sound between 1 and 2, its double in vibrations, produced by half its length, upon the horn. The numbers run both ways. They are fractions as to length of tube, and multiples as to vibrations. Again, just as there is an intermediate number between 2 and 4 (the second octave), so is there one intermediate sound, and one only; it is No. 3, which is produced by a third of the length of the tube, and is the fifth above No. 2. The fifth and fourth divide the vibrations of the octave equally between them, so that the fifth is three times No. 1, and the fourth immediately above it is four times. This, notwithstanding the diminution of the musical interval. The names which we have adopted for musical intervals are usually calculated from the keynote, as from C to E a third, from C to F a fourth, and from C to G a fifth, but these names are not real quantities and are rather confusing than an assistance. The octave is not an eighth but half, and the double octave is not a fifteenth, but a quarter of the length of No. 1, and vibrates four times as fast. Octaves are powers of 2, thus 2, 4, 8, 16, and 32 are successive octaves. But the octave 4 to 8 has only four sounds, and these are our major and minor third, and two others, divided by the harmonic seventh, which we do not use. From 8 to 16 are eight sounds, of which we use three, the major and minor tones, and the so-called diatonic semitone, as from B to C. It is really the smallest of the eight tones, and not a semitone. The next octave is from 16 to 32, and that is all of semitones, while 32 to 64 is all of quarter-tones. After that, the octave is divided into eighths, sixteenths, and thirty-second parts of tones, among which it is only useful to note (and that only among musicians and mathematicians), that the so-called "comma," having the ratio of 80 to 81, is the eighth of a tone above the third of any key—as it is above E in the key of C. We have lately had mathematicians among us who are not musical, and who have, therefore, proposed to divide an octave into "twelve equal semitones." This is pure geometry and not music. In music there cannot be even two equal semitones within an octave. If our friends will only change their theme from twelve equal semitones into twelve equally tempered semitones, and give us their experience of the proposed sounds when heard with the bass (which seems not to have yet been taken into account,) we shall gladly avail ourselves of their research, on the grounds of modern expediency. In the meantime we must be content to leave the tempering of a scale in the hands of experienced practical men, who, judging only by their ears, as they always will, have hitherto satisfied our immediate requirements.

The interval of a fifth is 2 to 3 in ascending and 3 to 2 in descending, but, as the figures are usually placed over the upper note in scales, the 3 is written above the 2 as in the scale in your hands (the third of them), where it appears over G, referring to C as 2.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Judging from the unanimous satisfaction expressed by the audience assembled on Monday to hear the most familiar and popular, if not exactly the best, of Verdi's operas, the director of Her Majesty's Theatre may be congratulated upon an undertaking which bids fair to be artistically successful and remunerative into the bargain. Because a large number of amateurs as partial to Italian operatic music as any of its special promoters during the regular season are prevented, through circumstances needing no explanation, from indulging in this exotic luxury at a period when all the world of fashion is in town, there seems no intelligible reason why they should be deprived of it altogether. The director hints thus much in his announcement and in his spirited resolve to try the experiment. The argument put forth in the second paragraph of his statement is not quite so clear. Dwelling upon the impracticability of presenting new or unknown works in the recognized season, he believes that a favourable opportunity will now be afforded for departing from the ordinary routine by which no operas are presented to the public but those with which it is already thoroughly familiar. The general conviction, however, is that precisely the "thoroughly familiar" will be most likely to attract at reduced prices in the winter; and Mr Mapleson himself would appear to have borne this in mind, seeing that he advertises but two novelties, one of which, by the way, can only be accepted as a "novelty" on the strength of certain modifications found expedient by the composer himself after its production at St Petersburg, for the Imperial lyric theatre of which capital it was expressly written. Here reference is meant to Verdi's Forza del Destino, which Mr Mapleson himself was first to introduce into this country at the old theatre in the Haymarket. The absolute novelty to us will be the Ruy Blas of Signor Marchetti, according to all accounts decidedly successful in various towns of Italy. It is to be hoped that an English verdict of approval may endorse that of Signor Marchetti's native country. At all events, his music will be quite new to our amateurs and connoisseurs.

In view of the actual series of performances certain alterations have been devised in the auditorium which in no way detract from the general opinion that the new Her Majesty's Theatre is one of the prettiest, if not one of the most strictly commodious, houses of entertainment the capital can boast. The entire centre of the grand tier of boxes has given place to a handsome "dress circle." The rows of stalls are reduced to eight, the remainder being devoted to what is ordinarily termed the "pit." Into the question of charges for admission it is not within our province to enter; nevertheless, it will hardly be out of place to suggest that a glance at the stalls and pit on Monday might lead to a suspicion that the prices—for the pit at any rate—are too high. The galleries were crowded; and from this department, as might have been expected, came chiefly the uproarious applause, "re-calls," and demands of "encore."

The Traviata was just the work to select for such an occasion; and seldom has its tuneful, spirited, and sometimes essentially dramatic, music been more heartily appreciated. The performance, it may at once be said, was remarkably effective. The leading characters were all more or less efficiently sustained by artists to whom the opera presented no sort of difficulty, and who, by the way, were one and all attached to Mr Mapleson's company during the summer of the present year. Then the orchestra, between fifty and sixty in number, with Signor Li Calsi, a thoroughly experienced conductor, at their head, and Mr Weist Hill, ably supported by Mr Amor, as principal violin, was in every respect competent, having no insignificant share in the successful result. The chorus, too, was highly efficient; and what opportunities Verdi has given to that important feature of his score need not be insisted on. The heroine of the evening was Mdle Caroline Salla, one of Mr Mapleson's most valuable recent acquisitions. All the praises awarded to this lady's talents and endowments some months ago were fully justified on the present occasion. Although French by birth and training, Mdle Salla is rapidly acquiring the Italian method, which, once obtained, is the surest passport to the loftiest sphere of operatic song. Her Leonora is thoughtfully conceived and thoughtfully carried out—so well-balanced, indeed, as to satisfy the most exacting taste. Her vocalization is not yet perfect, and she should be warned against straining those notes in the higher register so lavishly taxed by Verdi—never famous for taking into account the physical resources of those charged with the representation of his soprano and tenor parts. This alone prevented her singing in the "Miserere" from being as irreproachable as her acting, in depreciation of which not a word can be justly written—for Mdle Salla is an actress of the genuine stamp. The scene, however, to which Signor Fancelli, the imprisoned lover, lent important aid, was encoored with enthusiasm, and repeated accordingly. Signor Fancelli's Manrico has been often described; and it is only requisite to add that in the lachrymose andante, "Ah! si ben mio," with its fiery sequel, "Di quella pira," he obtained the usual applause, added to a double re-call. Mdme Demeric-Lablache, by her forcibly dramatic impersonation of the witch, Azucena, also won the cordial approval of the audience; while Signor Galassi, as the Conte di Luna, was honoured by the never-failing encore for the air, "Il balen del suo sorriso," which he gave with strongly marked expression. The subordinate characters of Inez, Ruiz, and Fernando were allotted to Mdle Bauermeister (always welcome), Signors Rinaldini and Broccolini. The descent of the curtain was followed by reiterated plaudits, the leading artists being twice summoned before the lamps. It was altogether a most successful performance. As Mr Mapleson announces a fresh opera for every evening in the week, we must reserve future criticism for a general notice.—Times.

DORA SCHIRMACHER AT THE LIVERPOOL PHILHARMONIC.

To Mdle Dora Schirmacher, a young lady of whom artistic Liverpool may be proud, the place of honour in the concert scheme was allotted, a position fully justified by her really splendid playing. Her début, some three years ago at the musical festival, gave promise of great things to be expected, and those anticipations were to the highest degree realized by her performances last evening. Her studies in Leipzig (where, at the Gewandhaus Concerts, her public successes have been great) have brought out her inborn powers, and it may now be unhesitatingly stated that Liverpool has added in her person another true artist to the great world of music. Schumann's grand concerto, noticeable, perhaps, more for the opportunity given to the performer to display the power to overcome the greatest difficulties than for catching popular ears, was played by Mdle Schirmacher with an originality of reading, an élan and aplomb, to be envied by players having the advantage of more years and enlarged experience. All the inner passages were delightfully brought out, whilst signs of the very best taste in giving expression to the composer's ideas were abundant. In her two selections from Chopin the first proved a splendid sample of cantabile playing, whilst the second was simply a wonderful display of digital dexterity. The young lady's success was undoubted and marked, and it may safely be prophesied that a great career is before her.—Liverpool Courier, Nov. 7.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1877.

DEATHS.

On October 18th, at Hastings, JOSEPH KIRKMAN, Esq., of Soho Square and Sunny Side, Gold Hawk Road, after a short illness, in his 88th year. Friends will kindly accept this intimation.

On October 20th, at Colmar, Alsace, Madame STOCKHAUSEN, the once celebrated singer of Swiss and Tyrolean melodies, aged 75.

On October 26th, at Cologne, Herr PAUL LUTGEN, aged 65.

On October 26th, at 27, Lorne Gardens, Hanover Gate, in his 21st year, GEORGE, the only son of ADOLPHE POLLITZER.

On November 2nd, after very great suffering, Herr CASPAR SUPPUS, violinist, aged 77.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

PAUL MOIST.—Anaxagoras was not Anaximander, nor was Anaximander Anaximenes. These were Greeks. As well say that Averroes was Albohatus, and Albohatus Avicenna. These were Arabs. Ask Dr Francis Hueffer, who can tell you about Cornelius—the musician, not the painter.

DR GLUM.—No. Melkym Chacknazarian. Dr Glum is wrong about Dittersdorf. The composer of the Battle of Prague was Ditters, who signed himself "Kotzwara." Ignace Pleyel's "German Hymn" is an air with variations. His Concertante is quite a different thing. Ignace was a pupil and (in London) weak rival of Haydn. He wrote many quartets now unremembered. Camille Pleyel, the pianoforte manufacturer in Paris (husband of Marie Pleyel, the great pianist), was his son.

POLKAW.—Percy Bysshe Shelley has only left us five sonnets—"Ozymandias," "Lift not the painted veil," "Ye hasten to the dead," "Political Greatness," and "To Byron." Read them attentively. All are fine, but "Ozymandias" is a masterpiece. Read also the sonnets of Wordsworth.

At the Key and Vulture—Uttolizer.

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—I can't!

DR STUMP.—You must!

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—I always thought that a pillar stood fixed as Cardinia—

DR STUMP.—The goddess? You mean Carna—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—Cardinia. She presided over hinges; but August insists that "the principal melody" * * * is, so to say—

DR STUMP.—"So to say"—good as "the mobbed Queen"—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—"So to say, the pillar of the whole structure" * * * on account of its reintroduction in most of the principal movements—

DR STUMP.—"Most of the principal movements"? How many principal movements?

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—I heard a great many too many, and was on the look out. But August says, "the soft melodious flow of orchestral sound"—

DR STUMP.—"Soft melodious flow" is good—a "soft flow" excellent, without "melodious"; a "soft flow of orchestral sound," "a flow of sound," in fact, is judicious.

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—But how can "a pillar" be "reintroduced"? And how can a pillar "lead very effectively into its succeeding movement"? I thought a pillar was a stand-still—

DR STUMP.—As a stone—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—Or a sponge—

DR STUMP.—With no mouths—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—A sponge is all mouths. Ask Académus, who wrote about Schubert's symphony—

DR STUMP.—And a pillar cannot be a movement. Ask Sir Flam-borough—

Wraith of SIR FLAMBOROUGH HEAD.

SIR FLAMBOROUGH (pondering).—By Jove! What does August mean by "after an extension of some twenty pages of the score"? Where's Arthur?

Lightning and thunder.

VOICE OF ARTHUR (from Purgatory).—Let me alone. I must come to the end of my "D," or I shan't get hence. You can't extend one page of the score, much less twenty. Let me alone!

SIR FLAMBOROUGH (shivering).—Oh, don't! "A tremolo E" what's that?

VOICE OF ARTHUR.—"A delicious rebelfry" * * * "a sudden stop through a sort of monologue." Let me be quiet and finish my D.

SIR FLAMBOROUGH (pondering).—Oh, blessed voice!

[Wraith vanishes.]

Pause.

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—You see, I can't go.

DR STUMP.—You must—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—After what Arthur has declared?

DR STUMP.—Certainly. Leave Arthur to his "D." Besides, August says—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—"A. M."?

DR STUMP.—August says that the "sort of monologue"—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—What sort of monologue?

DR STUMP.—Pooh! The "sort of monologue"—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—"Monologue phrase"—

DR STUMP.—Monologue phrase seems to say—"I, Hercules, son of Jove"—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—What Hercules? There were forty-three of that name—

DR STUMP.—Hercules, Jove's son by Alcmena—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—Poor Amphytrion! Poor Iphiclus! Fortunate Eurystheus! Ask Huetter—

DR STUMP.—The "sort of monologue phrase seems to say"—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—According to August's interpretation, or that of Monsieur Saint-Saëns?

DR STUMP.—Bother Monsieur Saint-Saëns! According to August, the "sort of monologue would seem to say, 'I, Hercules, son of Jove, will not join the riotous train of Bacchus'—"

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—The choice of Hercules?

DR STUMP.—The choice of Hercules.

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—Hercules was a muff. Virtue and pleasure may assort.

DR STUMP.—You must go to hear Saint-Saëns, if only for "the last point of the prefix," to which August refers.

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—"The last point of the prefix" is good. I've heard it once, and don't want to hear it twice, that "point of the prefix."

DR STUMP.—But Saint-Saëns—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—Who, by the shade of Heliogabalus, is Saint-Saëns?

DR STUMP.—He that represents flames by "little flickering mordants"—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—Bites?

DR STUMP.—"Mordants in the wood wind"—

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—"Wood wind" is good; so is "flickering mordants." But seriously, what is Saint-Saëns?

DR STUMP.—"Something about Wagner," according to the Baron Charles Mouton de Kenni.

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—I can't!

DR STUMP.—You must! You shall have a preciput.

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS.—Preciput be blowed! I went!

VOICE OF ARTHUR (from Purgatory).—Ach Teufel! Donner und Blitzen! I shall never finish my "D." (Lightning and thunder.) Where's Head?

WRAITH OF SIR FLAMBOROUGH (faintly, from afar).—Ubi!

PROFESSOR FOURLEGS and DR STUMP (in unison).—Both this old inn! It's haunted. (Exeunt hurriedly from Key and Vulture.)

To Dr Francis Hueffer.

Schluss folgt.

RONCONI.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Your correspondent, "D. P.," has made a note upon my article on "Opera in France," &c., to the effect that I had forgotten "the brief reign of Ronconi." Had he carried his eye a few lines above, he would have seen that the management of the Théâtre-Italien by Ronconi was duly recorded in its proper place—i.e., immediately preceding that of Mr Lumley. Signor Corti had the theatre for the season of 1852-3; Ragani for 1853-4 and 1854-5; and Calzadò undertook the direction in the autumn of 1855.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

14, Arlington Street, Nov. 6, 1877.

[How about Bagier?—D. P.]

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

It is to be hoped that Arabella Goddard, in the course of her tour in the British isles, may not come across Dr Hans von Bülow, at Glasgow. She might prove that the "petticoat" was better than the "swan-tail" and "opera hat." Gounod promised to pick up all the notes that Arabella let fall during her performance of a concerto at the Crystal Palace. At the end, when Arabella asked for them, the gallant Frenchman said—"Madame, j'ai les poches vides." Had Dr Hans von Bülow asked the same favour of the composer of Faust, that composer would, at the conclusion, in all probability, have said—"Monsieur, j'ai les poches remplies. J'en ai même plein le gilet."

MILAN.—The first appearance of Adelina Patti at the Scala, as the heroine of the Traviata, was an overwhelming success. More next week.

It is pretty generally known that the musical papers left by Mendelssohn at his death were ceded by his heirs to the Royal Library, Berlin, on condition that the State should give 4,200 marks annually for distribution among students of music. After the papers had been handed over to the authorities of the Library, one of the heirs became incapable of managing his affairs, and the guardian of his children, who are minors, has protested against his wards' share in the papers being given up without a pecuniary equivalent, which he estimates at 21,000 marks. His claim will be paid by the Government, and an item for the amount inserted in the next budget. The students' allowance will, however, be diminished in consequence 1,050 marks a year.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

NORTH BRITTON HALL.—The third of the series of concerts, under the direction of Mr Richard Mackway, took place on Monday evening, when several duets, trios, and rounds were sung to the satisfaction of the audience. Messrs Richard Mackway and Prestridge gave, with effect, Benedict's "The moon has raised" (Lily of Killarney); Mr R. Mackway sang Ascher's popular "Alice, where art thou?" gaining unanimous applause, as did Mrs Prestridge in Randegger's "Cradle Song." Misses Julia Craven, Louise Stevenson, Messrs H. J. Whittingback, and Sidney Mackway were the other vocalists. Mr Robert Goodwin accompanied the music.

MR JOHN CROSS, a young and rising tenor singer, gave his "first concert" on Monday evening, the 20th ult., at Barnsbury Hall, Islington, which, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, was well attended. Mr Cross sang, with taste and feeling, "Home of my heart" (Lurline), and was called upon to repeat Ascher's "Alice, where art thou?" Mmes Tennant, Lisé Thomas, Cooke, Messrs Rawlinson, Hicks, and Norman were the other vocalists. Miss Lizzie Dell and Mr John Jefferys were the solo pianists. Mr Jefferys also accompanied the vocal music.

MR SYDNEY SMITH gave his first pianoforte recital on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 7th, in Willis's Rooms. The vocalists were Mdle Ida Corani and Mr Cummings; the pianist was Mr Sydney Smith, assisted by a pupil; the accompanists being Sir Julius Benedict and Mr W. Ganz. The following is a list of the pieces played by Mr Sydney Smith with his well-known execution and expression:—

Prelude and Fugue, in D major (Bach); Gigue in G minor (Handel); Sonata in A major (Scarlatti); "Cynthia," Serenade, and "Souvenir de Bal," Valse Caprice (Sydney Smith); Fantasia on Wagner's opera, The Flying Dutchman (Sydney Smith); Impromptu, in G flat (Chopin), and Air Hongrois (Liszt); "Undine," Study, for the Left Hand alone, on "Com' è gentil" (by request), and "Le Bivouac," Caprice Brillante.

Mr Sydney Smith's new compositions, "Cynthia," and "Souvenir de Bal"—the first an elegant serenade, and the last a brilliant valse caprice—are, judging from the effect they produced upon the audience, likely to rank with the most admired of the pianist-composer's works. The applause, at the conclusion of each, was hearty and unanimous. Mr Sydney Smith did not fail to let his admirers hear some of their old favourites. He gave them "Undine," "Le Bivouac," and his famous study for the left hand (introducing "Com' è gentil"), with so much effect that he had great difficulty in resisting the evident wish of the audience to hear them over again. Besides the pieces named, Mr Sydney Smith played, with his clever pupil, Miss Annie Wilson, the first movement of Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, and Thalberg's Concertante Duet on Themes from Norma, arranged for two pianofortes. Mdle. Ida Corani sang a cavatina by L. Rossi, an aria by Ricci, and "The Page's Song" (one of the recent popular contributions to the repertoire of the Promenade Concerts at the Royal Italian Opera House), composed by Signor Arditì. After each performance, the young and clever vocalist received well-merited applause. Mr Cummings, always welcome, gave, with artistic expression, Beethoven's "Adelaide," a charming song of his own composition, "Star Gazing," and Mr Roeckel's "Only for thee." Mr Ganz was accompanist.

A CONCERT was given by Sig. Jervis Rubini in the Vestry Hall, Chelsea, on Thursday, November 1, before a numerous audience. Amongst the vocalists was Miss Matilda Roby, whose rendering of Signor Fiori's "Beloved" deserves special commendation. Able assistance was given by Miss Helène Arnim, Messrs Rudland, Rubini, Kruse, and George Weige. Mdle Vittoria de Bono performed some violin solos in a highly satisfactory manner, and Mdle Laura Fioretti and M. Emile von Koettlitz, pianists, contributed solos and duets, which added materially to the pleasure of the evening.

PROVINCIAL.

GLASGOW.—On Saturday, November 3rd, the City Hall was crowded. Mdme Sinico-Campobello, Miss Emma Howson, Messrs Campobello, Hilton, and Shakespeare were engaged as vocalists, and M. Niedzielski as violinist. "The most artistic singing of the evening," says the Glasgow Herald, "was displayed by Mr William Shakespeare, in Handel's 'Deeper and deeper still.' Many of the passages were delivered with a breadth of phrasing and conception such as are but rarely heard. His rendering of Bennett's charming song, 'Maiden Mine,' was equally fine. A popular item was the duet for Mr Shakespeare and Mr Hilton—'Love and War'—of course, encores. It is gratifying to find that the endeavours of the directors of the Abstinents' Union to give concerts supported by such distinguished artists meet with their just reward."

Will of Teresa Tietjens.

The will and codicil, both dated August 21, 1877, of Mdle Teresa Carolina Johanna Tietjens, late of No. 51, Finchley New Road, St John's Wood, who died on the 3rd ult., were proved on the 26th ult. by Alfred Markby and Charles Green, the executors, the personal estate in England being sworn under £16,000. As the accounts as to the disposition of her property which have already appeared are very misleading, we now give a correct abstract. The testatrix bequeaths to her sister, Henrietta Bell, £1,000; to her sister, Augusta Theresa Kruls, £200; to her cousin, Emma Drögemöller, £500; and to her executors, £100 each, all free of legacy duty. Her freehold house, No. 51, Finchley New Road, her freehold ground-rents in Belsize Road, and her leasehold house, No. 53, Finchley New Road, the testatrix leaves upon trust for her said sister, Augusta Theresa Kruls, for life, and at her death to her (testatrix's) niece, Augusta Kruls, absolutely. All her furniture, plate, household effects, jewelry, laces, horses, and carriages, she gives to her two nieces, Augusta Kruls and Maria Bevigiani; £5,000 is left upon trust for her brother, Peter Tietjens, for life, and after his decease to all his children. The residue of her real and personal estate she leaves upon trust for her sister, Augusta Theresa Kruls, for life, and afterwards for her three children, Fritz Kruls, Augusta Kruls, and Maria Bevigiani. Any property or interest given to any female is to be for her separate use, and free from the control, interference, or debts of any husband. The testatrix declares that she is a naturalised British subject, and domiciled in England.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.—The prospectus for the 46th season has just been issued. The season is to commence on Friday, 23rd November, with a performance of Mendelssohn's St Paul, Mmes Edith Wynne and Patey and Messrs Vernon Rigby and Santley being principal vocalists. This will be followed by Handel's Judas Maccabæus, on 14th December, and the same composer's Messiah on 21st December. The after Christmas concerts will be devoted to Mendelssohn's Elijah, Crotch's Palestine, Costa's Naaman, Haydn's Creation, and Macfarren's St John the Baptist. The great novelty of the season will be the production, for the first time in England in a complete form in the concert orchestra, of Rossini's celebrated oratorio, Moses in Egypt (Mosè in Egitto). Sir Michael Costa continues as conductor, and the principal vocalists already engaged are Mdmes Lemmens-Sherrington, Edith Wynne, Osgood, Blanche Cole, Anna Williams, Julia Elton, and Patey; Messrs Vernon Rigby, E. Lloyd, Cummings, L. W. Thomas, and Herr Henschel, and Mr Santley.

LISZT AT ROME.*

The other day at a service held in the church of Santa Maria dell' Anima to celebrate the Saint's day of the Emperor Franz Joseph of Austria, the Abbate Liszt was conspicuous above anyone else for the number of his decorations. We saw only his breast; if we had gently raised his short cloak, we might, perhaps, have perceived the distinctive mark of a chamberlain, a key fastened or embroidered on the right hand side of his cassock, for the reader must know that Liszt is a chamberlain at the courts of several reigning princes, one of these courts being that of Saxe-Weimar. People have not forgotten the first time he displayed all his decorations. It was on Easter Sunday, in the basilica of St Peter, on the occasion of his first visit to Rome, some fifteen years ago. He wore a dress coat and white necktie and followed the procession, creating a profound impression on the crowd. He attended at this epoch the Cartani saloons, the rendezvous of all the literary and artistic celebrities of Rome, and the saloons of the Princess Rospigliosi, originally Duchess of Cadore, where there was a great consumption of wit every evening. He soon became the lion of the season. Whenever the Princess gathered her intimate friends around her, and Liszt promised to make one of these privileged beings, the Princess never failed adding, in the form of a postscript to the cards of invitation: "M. Liszt will be with us." Whereupon her friends flocked around her. Liszt is averse to playing at parties for the behoof of amateurs. One evening, when he had gone to one of the excellent dinners given at the Academy of France by M. Schnetz, its director, the French Ambassador, M. de Grammont, I believe, who was one of the party, begged Liszt to sit down at the piano. Liszt refused point blank; the ambassador, however, was not disconcerted. "Monsieur Liszt," he said, "in the name of the Emperor, I ask you to take your place at the piano." "I bow at the name of the Emperor," replied Liszt, "and I obey." But he rarely played more than a single piece. One evening he dined at the table of a duchess, who thought she might ask him to play something. He did so. Not satisfied with this, the lady asked him to play a second time. This was too much for Liszt, who observed that he had fully paid for his dinner.

Liszt's visit to Rome was made for an object which he pursued with great activity. He wanted to obtain from Pius IX. a divorce for the Princess von Sayn-Wittgenstein, whom he wished to marry. The report had already got bruited about that the Pope had granted the divorce, when one fine day Liszt left, without saying good-bye to any one. His marriage had ended in smoke, seu fumus in auras, and his friends received a visiting card bearing the words: "Abbate Liszt, the Vatican." He had actually installed himself at the Vatican, where he followed up the object he had in view. The post of master of the Sistine chapel had been vacant since the death of the celebrated Bazili. Liszt contended for the honour of replacing him. But at the Vatican the music of the present is preferred to the music of the future, and the pianist's application remained unheeded. From the Vatican he passed to the Monastery del Rosario on Monte Mario, whence he used to drive down of an evening to town, reading his breviary by a lamp which he had had hung up inside his carriage. At present he is the guest of Cardinal von Hohenlohe, at the Villa d'Este, Tivoli.

ALEXANDRA PALACE CONCERTS.

The Classical Saturday Concerts of the Alexandra Palace, which had been for awhile suspended, were re-commenced on Saturday last with every prospect of success. The musical direction has been confided to Mr Frederic Archer, the able organist of the Palace, who has succeeded in collecting a fine orchestra of fifty-two performers, with Mr A. Burnett as leader, MM. Zerbini (viola), Boumann (violin), Radcliff (flute), Horton (oboe), Tyler (clarinet), T. Harper (trumpet), Hutchings (bassoon), Mann and Waterson (horns), C. Harper (contrabasso), Hughes (ophicleide), and other artists of well-known ability. The first half of the concert consisted of selections from Mendelssohn. The performance of the A major symphony sufficed to show the excellent quality of the orchestra and the remarkable ability of the conductor. Mr Archer was evidently master of the score; a finer performance of the symphony it would be difficult to conceive. The beautiful second movement, andante con moto, was encored. The presto saltarello was taken rather more rapidly than usual, and with good results. The execution of the overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, with which the concert began, had the strings been completely audible in the ppp. parts, and the bass trombone less predominant in the tutti, might have been pronounced almost faultless. In Weber's Oberon overture, Mr Mann and Mr Waterson greatly distinguished themselves in the horn passages. The Alexandra Palace Choir gave the choruses from Mendelssohn's unfinished oratorio, Christus, and the triumphal chorus from Gounod's Reine de Saba, in only a few instances showing that further rehearsal would have been advisable. A duo concertante for flute and pianoforte, composed by Mr F. Archer, admirably played by that gentleman and Mr Radcliff, is nevertheless more appropriate to a drawing-room than to so large an arena. The principal vocalists were Mrs Patey, who gave "O rest in the Lord" delightfully, and Mr Pearson, who sang "The Garland" and "Eily Mavourneen" with much taste. The audience, numbering over 3,000, were hearty in their applause. The concert ended with the Coronation March from Meyerbeer's Prophete. The Saturday Classical Concerts will be continued at intervals of a fortnight, and on the intervening Saturdays Handelian performances are to be given in the Central Hall by the Alexandra Palace Choir, accompanied on the great organ by Mr Frederic Archer.—Globe.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

One might reasonably conceive that those who manage the music at Sydenham have enough to do, in order to keep before them the whole range of classic art. But with all this, they contrive to have an eye upon the calendar. Not an anniversary of importance escapes them, and so surely as the time of an illustrious birth or death draws near, so surely do we receive an intimation from the Palace that it will meet with a formal recognition. Saturday last was, within a day, the thirtieth anniversary of Mendelssohn's death. On Nov. 4th, 1847, the overworked brain of the most popular and, in some respects, the greatest composer of his time ceased to labour, while as yet work lay around unfinished, and the sanguine soul, forgetful of the worn-out body, was looking forward to even higher things. And on the 3rd of November immediately past some thousands of amateurs, belonging to the people who appreciated Mendelssohn so well, gathered to hear in memoriam one of his greatest works. It is something for a man's fame, not only to endure for a generation, but to be a power at the end of it; and this is the best answer to all the silly folk who, because every hero must needs be the butt of a lot of unheroic carpers, chatter deprecatingly about the author of Elijah. In view of the place Mendelssohn retains among his brethren, the very force of contrast reminds us of Wagner's sneer concerning him—"Having nothing to say, he said it in a gentlemanly manner." So, then, is it to "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal" that the world has listened for thirty years without finding out its hollowness and emptiness? And, having for all that time worshipped what it thought to be a god, has the world really adored a genteel tailor's dummy? So says the Oracle of Bayreuth; but the weight of evidence is against him, and for the present we shall go on esteeming the gentlemanly nothings of Mendelssohn, even as a select few regard the rugged and ponderous utterances of his detractor.

The Mendelssohn programme of Saturday included, first, the overture to St Paul; next, the air, "Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets," from the same oratorio; and, lastly, the Lobgesang. . . . It was gratifying to hear the prelude to St Paul so well executed; it was gratifying to hear Miss Mary Davies—who would be a great singer if nature had given her adequate physical power—deliver the touching air with so much pathos; and it was, above all, a treat to receive the symphonic movements of the cantata as rendered to perfection by the band. The solos in the

Lobgesang were entrusted to Miss Robertson, Miss Mary Davies, and Mr Barton McGuckin, at whose hands they had a satisfactory measure of justice. Music of this kind does not show off Miss Robertson's distinctive qualifications, but the young lady acquitted herself throughout with intelligence, and should be specially commended for observing, in the short solo, "The night is departing," the precedent first set, in Exeter Hall, by Madame Nilsson, who made it fall on the ear as though sung in the distant heavens. Mr McGuckin did good service in the great scena, "The sorrows of death," of which he showed an artistic comprehension, and for the interpretation of which he possesses adequate vocal means. Mr Manns, as usual, conducted the instruments admirably

The novel feature at this concert was a concerto (MS.) for violin and orchestra, written by Herr Max Bruch for Señor Sarasate, who played it on Saturday for the first time in public. Herr Bruch himself conducted, so that the work was heard to the greatest possible advantage, and, we must add, made a legitimate impression. Although based, as to structure, upon classic forms, it is in certain respects a very individual composition. Thus, the first movement is an adagio instead of an allegro, and the second a semi-rhapsodical recitative instead of a carefully wrought-out adagio. The finale is a rondo in the old and well-established form. Taken as a whole, the aim of the concerto is not pretentious. Instead of a symphony with violin solo, such as Beethoven wrote, Herr Bruch has given us a solo in three movements, with orchestral accompaniments and interludes, secundum artem. He was, perhaps, wise to aim no higher, because then he might have missed his mark, whereas now he has hit it. All the movements are interesting, and adapted to display the soloist; but we like best the adagio, which, in its alternation of tender pleading and passionate remonstrance, brings to mind the chief and most touching characteristic of Schubert's genius. Señor Sarasate played admirably; with no great power of tone, it is true, but with real taste, and perfect mastery over the resources of his instrument. Both composer and executant were twice called back to receive the plaudits of the audience.—Daily Telegraph.

Hans von Bülow and Cherubino.

(From the London "Figaro.")

I have received a good-humoured and quite characteristic letter from Dr Hans von Bülow, and of which I append a translation. The occasion for Dr von Bülow's courtesy has passed, but both the letter and its enclosure are so exceedingly characteristic that they will still be of interest to all. There are some points on which I must confess I am not in agreement with Dr von Bülow. But that he can write a capital letter there is no question whatever. I fear I did contribute to Dr von Bülow's "bad humour," but I fancy the contest hurt neither of us:—

"DEAR CHERUBINO,—Some years ago you did me the honour to ask me to add my autograph to your collection of celebrated and more or less guilty criminals. I abstained at the time from acceding to your caprice, as I was in a very bad humour. Confess, my dear sir, that you had done your best to contribute to it.

"To-day, as I no longer dispute the palm with the half-dozen petticoat pianists about whom St James's Hall goes mad, and only considering London as a station on the road to Scotland—moreover, appreciating very highly the political tendencies and social wit of the London Figaro—I cannot resist the inclination to repair my former puerile but honest incivility. If this does not suit you, light your cigarette with the enclosed scrap, and throw it into your fireplace. America has so pachydermatized me that there is no longer a chance of wounding me by such proceeding.

"Your very humble servant,

"HANS VON BÜLOW.

"Sydenham, November 6, 1877.

"Napoleon III., amongst other good things, has emitted the axiom that 'one destroys only that which one replaces.' Replace, then, as soon as possible, in the interest of good music, Messrs W. C., A. M., Dr. W., by Messrs Henry Gadsby, Charles Hallé, Arthur Sullivan. Everybody will be gratified, and the intelligence of the minority will be as well satisfied as the instinct of the majority of His Majesty the Public.

"Hans von Bülow.

"Sydenham, 6th November, 1877."

[Now, ye time-serving, virtuoso-hunting "petticoat pianists," say a word for yourselves. Arthur Chappell won't do it, if you don't; but "Cherubino" will. If not, an appeal should be made to Anton Rubinstein, who is certainly not of the "petticoat" order of pianists.—E. J.]

BURNAND ON'S BOX.

(To the Editor of "The Theatre.")

SIR,—In The Theatre of the 30th I find:—"The Musical Box at the Gaiety still refuses to 'go,' and will soon give place to the promised version of La Cigale." This statement is incorrect, and is unfair both to the actors and to my adaptation of Le Homard. I admit that the works might have been a trifle stiff on the two first representations, when, perhaps, either the Musical Box wanted oiling, or the audience had not been sufficiently wound up. But I saw it last week, and, so far from refusing to "go," it was "going" immensely. The laughter from a crowded house was hearty and continuous, and there was a genuine "call" for the performers. I am not saying anything about the merits or demerits of this nonsensical trifle, which is capitally acted all round. All I do say is, that I have seldom heard a farce go better than the Musical Box on the night in question. I am told that this was not an exception, but that it goes equally well every night. Of course, my Musical Box will be withdrawn when La Cigale is ready, as the latter is a three-act comedy-drama. With this and a short lever de rideau, and the burlesque to finish, the programme will be full enough in all conscience. Had the Musical Box "refused to go," it would soon have gone—out of the Gaiety bill; Mr Hollingshead being about the last manager in London to run a failure.—I remain, sir, faithfully yours,

F. C. BURNAND.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Since the date of my last letter there has been no lack of musical entertainment in this city. Mr Hallé's weekly concerts have recommenced, and the twentieth season of these justly-renowned performances seems likely to be as brilliant as any of its predecessors. The band was never so strong, and one realizes in listening how great is the advantage of constant practice, without which it is, of course, impossible to secure those lights and shadows of orchestral effect which never fail to gratify experienced amateurs. At the first of these concerts, a fortnight ago, Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, Beethoven's Festival Overture, and a new overture, The Normans, by Dietrich, were in the programme. Mr Hallé played, with the orchestra, Chopin's Spianato and Polonaise, and, as a solo, Raff's Menuet and Tambourin in B flat. Herr Henschel was the singer. Last Thursday Mendelssohn's St Paul was given, with Mmes Sherrington and Patey, Messrs Guy and Henschel, as principal singers. Herr Henschel's delivery of the solos of St Paul created a great sensation. It is long since Germany has sent us so finished a vocal artist. Perfect phrasing—in fact, an irreproachable method, combined with rare dramatic instinct and unflinching taste—enable this young artist to achieve the highest kind of success. The performance of St Paul was gratifying in other respects, and the choir well drilled by the zealous chorus-master, Mr Hecht, had been strengthened by the addition of nearly fifty boys, whose fresh voices told well in the chorales.

At the Concert Hall, the band of which has been considerably augmented, there was an interesting concert last week, the chief orchestral feature of which was a Suite by Lachner. Mlle Mehlig played one of Chopin's concertos, and Miss Gaetano was the singer.

Mr De Jong's second fortnightly concert was very well attended. In addition to the orchestral performers, the singing of a vocal party, including Mdme Sinico, Miss Howson, Mdle Franchi, Messrs Shakespeare, Hilton, and Campobello, gave great pleasure.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company is attracting large audiences this week at the Prince's Theatre, and among the novelties promised are Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor and Macfarren's Robin Hood.

The Kennedy's Scotch entertainments have proved very popular in Manchester. Since John Wilson's time we have never heard the songs of Scotland so admirably sung, and Mr Kennedy combines humour and pathos so artistically that he would have achieved a great success on the stage, had his ambition turned in that direction.

Herr Max Bruch, the distinguished German composer, visited Manchester about a fortnight ago. He was entertained at dinner by the Liedertafel, and attended a conversazione of the St Cecilia Society, where he accompanied Herr Straus in a Romance for the violin.

ITALIAN OPERA IN LIVERPOOL.

In these days of higher musical development and the Wagnerian "Tone Drama," with its ghouls, goblins, ghosts, mythological birds and beasts, patent fog, concealed orchestra, and all its other aids to a proper and well-regulated intellectual emotion, it is almost a condescension on the part of a musical critic to sit through the meanderings of an old-fashioned work like an opera by Rossini, Verdi, Mozart, Meyerbeer, Auber, or even Beethoven. Doubtless these were all great men, but their ideas of musical drama were decidedly illogical. They wrote melodiously, and observed the laws of musical form and development; their music gave pleasure, either in or out of the opera, and people came away from hearing it with its melodies still haunting the willing mind. But this is all being changed, and the prophets teach us that melody is vulgar, that form is a mere antiquated embarrassment, and that, for philosophical reasons, exaggerated fairy tales make a better foundation for the construction of a "tone drama" than do the merely human incidents which constitute the plots of most operas of the past. But, as we are writing for many who are not yet quite educated up to this belief, and who don't think it a sin to enjoy music which they can follow and comprehend, we feel no compunction in recording the success of the short season of Italian Opera at the Alexandra Theatre. The works chosen for representation were well rendered, and included Il Trovatore, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Le Nozze di Figaro, Un Ballo in Maschera, Il Flauto Magico, and Der Freischütz. The great merit of the representations has been in the excellent all-roundness of the various casts; and, to particularise, we should have to give a perfect catalogue of names, a great many known to Liverpool opera-goers, and a few not known. Foremost among the latter are Mdle Caroline Salla, who appeared on Monday night as Leonora in Il Trovatore; and Mdle Anna de Bellocca, who essayed the part of Rosina in Rossini's delightful Barbiere. The former with a very fine voice and finished style, surmounted the difficulties of the exacting part allotted to the heroine in Verdi's opera with the greatest success. Mdle de Bellocca is also a highly cultivated vocalist. We have to welcome the reappearance of Signori Bettini and Foli in Mr Mapleson's company—the one for his voice, and the other for his perfect vocalisation. Band and chorus were excellent and responded to the baton of the able conductor Signor Li Calsi, with intelligence, the general result being an ensemble seldom surpassed on the provincial stage. The mounting of the several operas was exceedingly good, and reflected credit upon the resources of Mr Saker's establishment.—Liverpool Porcupine.

SONNET.—THE SKY SONNAMBULIST.*

Oh spirit of the night, why dost thou roam
That cold immensity of calm, the sky?
What crazy dreams have led thee from thy home
Of the Western slumbers? Do thy fancies fly,
With sleep's strange wings, to piercing heavens' dome?
And, revelling free beyond, does thy heart sigh
For Liberty's twin sister, Love? Dost yearn,
Oh splendid slave, whose daily couriers burn
Their path through beauty—yearn'st for sympathy,
That wire of the heart, without which no delight
Is pure? A mortal thou couldst not discern
For littleness; and whom thy mournful light
Makes sleepless, his yearnsharing soul doth turn
On thee, and seek desire's content to learn.

"BUY A BROOM."

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—The following extract from Parke's Musical Memoirs, Vol. II., p. 229, relates to the subject of your correspondent's query:—

"1826. Vauxhall Gardens opened for the season on the 20th of May. The new managers engaged the following eminent performers: Mdme Vestris, Mdme Cornega, Miss Stephens, &c., as singers, and Mr Bishop as composer and director. Bishop's talent lay dormant nearly the whole of the season; he produced nothing but a ballad, called 'Buy a broom.'"

The words of this ballad were by J. R. Planché. It was published in 1826 by Goulding; but as the title-page states that it was "sung by Miss Love at Vauxhall," it would seem not to have been adopted by Mdme Vestris until afterwards.—Yours truly, G. A. C.

WAIFS.

It is stated that Verdi is busy on a fresh opera.

Professor Julius Stern is progressing favourably.

Ole Bull, after visiting Milan, is now at Brussels.

Sylvia is a hit at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna.

The Circo Milano, Turin, has been sold to a tramway company.

Gounod's Faust was performed at the Grand Opera, Paris, for the 550th time, on the 6th October.

Mdle Marie Dumas resumed her Sunday morning matinées at the Théâtre-Lyrique on the 4th inst.

The hundredth performance of Paul et Virginie at the Théâtre-Lyrique took place on the 3rd inst.

The Pope has created Sig. Augusto Moriconi, organist of St Peter's, a knight of the Order of San Silvestro.

The Schubert Society held their first meeting on Wednesday, for the practice and trial of new compositions.

Signora Teresa Singer has gone to Naples, where she is to make her début at the San Carlo as the heroine in Norma.

Herr Albert Parlow, of Stettin, is about to make a tour through Germany and Belgium with his orchestra of 130 musicians.

The health of Sig. Coppola has lately occasioned serious anxiety. The veteran composer is more than eighty-six years of age.

M. Faure left Paris a short time since for the Hague, whence he intended visiting Brussels, to sing in Faust and Hamlet.

Mad. Marchesi has resigned her professorship of singing in the Vienna Conservatory and accepted a similar post at Brussels.

Under the signature of "Italicus," the King of Sweden contributes excellent musical criticisms to one of the leading Stockholm papers.

"Lord, have mercy on us, miserable singers," would be an appropriate opening prayer for many churches where they have congregational singing.

M. Gevaert, director of the Brussels Conservatory, lately made a short stay in Milan. He is collecting materials for his History of the Music of Antiquity.

The first performance of the New York Oratorio Society this season is announced for the 15th inst., Judas Maccabæus being the work selected for the occasion.

Dr Gunz has been created an honorary member of the Dutch Matschappij tot Bevordering der Toonkunst, and invited to visit Rotterdam to receive his diploma.

Herr Johann Strauss's new work, La Tsiganne, which is really the music of Die Fledermaus fitted to a new libretto, has been successfully produced at the Théâtre de la Renaissance.

Mad. Marie Roze will sail early next month for America, to fulfil her engagement as a member of the Strakosch company, which will include also Mad. Ilma di Murska, Miss Kellogg, and Miss Cary.

Messrs C. Kegan Paul & Co., are about to publish a volume of sermons by the late Charles Kingsley, entitled All Saints' Day, and other Sermons, which will contain his last sermon preached in Westminster Abbey.

Miss Blanche Lucas, who has been singing lately at Messrs Gatti's Promenade Concerts, Covent Garden, is—says The Courier—"established in public favour, her appearance being always the signal for prolonged applause."

Macfarren's Opera company commenced a six nights' engagement at the Alexandra Theatre and Operahouse last evening, with Verdi's Il Trovatore. Further particulars next week.—Choir. [Who's Macfarren?—D.]

Signor Schira's opera, La Selvaggia, already received in various towns of Italy with such unanimous favour, is to be immediately produced at the Liceo, at Barcelona, after Gounod's Faust and the Huguenots of Meyerbeer.

M. Visentini has opened a subscription for thirty nights (Thursdays), extending over seven months, at the Théâtre-Lyrique. The price for an admission to the avant-scènes is 1,800 francs, while an orchestra-stall costs 250.

The season was inaugurated at the Théâtre-Italien, Paris, on the 4th inst., with Pohuto, the principal characters being sustained by Mlle Urban, Signori Tamberlik, Pandolfini, and de Reszké, with Sig. Usiglio as conductor.

Among the novelties promised this winter at the Czech Theatre, Prague, are Zavis, a four-act romantic opera by Rozkosny; Selma Sedláčková, a two-act comic opera, by Dworák; and a new version of Smetana's opera, Die Vdova.

Herr Johann Strauss has left Paris for Vienna. He will return, however, accompanied by his brother, Herr Eduard Strauss, to the former capital during the Grand International Exposition and bring with him his famous Vienna Orchestra.

ZARÉ THALBERG.—Many offers have been made to this charming and accomplished prima donna to sing at the Liceo, in Barcelona, where she now resides, previous to her return to fulfil her engagement with Mr Gye, at the Royal Italian Opera. Up to this moment, however, she has declined all propositions.

Sig. Sivori and Herr Raphael Joseffy, the Hungarian pianist, commenced on the 1st inst. a concert tour through Italy. The tour will last till the middle of next April. [Why don't Joseffy come to London, and match himself with our Bülows, Rubinstains, &c. We would back him against any of them, now that Tausig is gone.—D. P.]

Among the artists secured by M. Strakosch, for his European and American tour, is Mlle Estella de la Mar, who has received her artistic education at the expense of the King of Holland, and is a pupil of M. Georges Cabel's. Though only 17, she is to be paid 200,000 francs for her five years' engagement, and her stage-name is to be "Faustina" (after Boccaccio?).

In our obituary of this day we record the death of Herr Caspar Suppus, the violinist, a native of Mayence. He came to this country with Herr Schumann's German opera company, in 1840, when Mr Ganz, the father of Mr Wilhelm Ganz, was conductor. Herr Suppus died on the 2nd November, at 24, King Street, Soho, at the age of 77, leaving a widow (aged 82), totally unprovided for.

The following novelties will be produced this winter at the Paris Opéra-Comique: Une Nuit de Noces, three acts, words by MM. Sardou and de Narjac, music by M. Deffès; Suzanne, three acts, words by MM. Cormon and Lockroy, music by M. Paladilhe; Pépita, two acts, M. Delahaye; Le Chariot, one act, words by M. Daudet, music by M. Léon Delahaye; one act by M. Théodore Dubois; and three acts by M. de Narjac, with posthumous score by Grisar. To this list must be added the revivals of Le Déserteur, Cinq-Mars, Le Songe d'une Nuit d'Été, Les Mousquetaires de la Reine, L'Étoile du Nord, and La Perle du Brésil. [Not a word about Auber! Fi donc! The Parisians don't appreciate their really great composers.—D. P.]

The organ belonging to the New Public Halls in Glasgow is to be formally "opened" on Monday evening, November 19th, by Mr. W. T. Best, of Liverpool. The opening of the Halls themselves is to be the great event of the approaching musical season in Glasgow, and is likely to be a particularly imposing affair, all the tickets having, I hear, been bought up in view less, I suspect, for the benefit that is to be done to the cause of music than to basking in the presence of Her Royal Highness, the Princess Louise, Marchioness of Lorne. Musically and naturally, it seems a pity that the enterprise is to be begun with a performance of The Messiah rather than of Professor Macfarren's Lady of the Lake, especially as the oratorio is to be given at any rate in Glasgow on New Year's Day. Religiously, however, the scheme could not have a better benediction than will be pronounced by the hallowing strains of the great Handel.—Choir.

LEIPZIG.—Herr Franz von Holstein's romantic opera, Die Hochwälder, was successfully produced at the Stadttheater on the 23rd ult. The composer was called on after the first, third, and fourth acts. The performers were called at the end of every act.

ROME.—On the occasion of a dinner given by Herr von Keudell, to the German Ambassador, Liszt took part with his former pupil, Sig. Sgambati, in his "Faust Symphony."

COLOGNE.—Herr Langenbach with his orchestra from Bohn has been giving concerts here every Thursday. The Creation was performed at the first Gürzenich Concert, the vocalists being Mad. Walter-Straude, from Bâle, Mr Candidus, from New York, and Herr Schelper from Leipzig.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

More about Blackmailing.

Under the various titles of "Journalistic Comity," and "Keep on lying, something will stick," we read the following in the New York Arcadian of Nov. 1:—

When we suspended The Arcadian during the three summer months, and announced that we would resume publication on the first Thursday in September, nearly all the papers announced the fact, some with kind remarks, some without remark. Sole and alone, Mr. Byrne, of the Dramatic News, announced that The Arcadian was busted, that the editor was not sick in health, but sick of losing money, and that the paper would not appear again. He therefore deliberately stated an untruth, to throw the suspicion of untruth upon us. When, in September, we resumed publication as promised, and all the papers gave us so extremely kind notices, Mr Byrne was accidentally introduced to us, and we asked him why he had made such a malicious and untrue statement at the time? He replied:—"I really believed it to be true; but in the next number of the Dramatic News I will correct it and announce your resumption." Needless to say that he never did, though he made an unsolicited renewed promise for the number after the one alluded to. When the advertising puff of Mr Lake burst over the papers "that somebody tried to blackmail Miss Abbott," a story which certainly never happened, and which they come out with now after seven months, because she is just making a tour in the country, some papers observed an expectant silence, some instantly repulsing the calumnious lie that we had anything to do with it. Alone in the whole press, Mr. Byrne, of the Dramatic News, again took the matter up in a doubtful manner, and not daring to say the thing was at all probable—the lie being too glaring to be propagated—he pretended not to know what to believe; but he insinuated that the existence of our paper was put in jeopardy, unless we could prove that we had nothing to do with an affair with which certainly nobody had anything to do.

The proof of an accusation lies with the accuser. We said what we had to say: that, except once at the house at dinner, we never came near the place, that we had no paper at the time, and could not propose to publish a good or a bad article. We have not seen Miss Abbott or Mr Lake for seven or eight months, and we were consequently quite out of the question—even if there was anybody in it. This is conclusive for any honourable man—not so for Mr Byrne. Still, if we understand the expression: blackmailing, rightly, it is the act of a man who tries to get in exchange for publishing an article a certain big or small sum. But when he cannot publish anything, the blackmail is simply impossible, we should think, because what should and what could the people be asked to pay for? Every one of our acquaintances saw the truth clearly. Mr Byrne, an intelligent man, saw through the whole advertising dodge from the beginning; but it suited his purpose to ignore the truth and to pretend to believe what he knew was not, and could not be true, because it furnished him the means of throwing a doubt upon the editor of a paper which got criticisms and news that his paper cannot get, and which he therefore would be very glad to get rid of! We are neither so petty nor so jealous as to say deliberate untruths, because it might increase our sale. The fun of it is, that the first news we got about the whole matter was that Mr Byrne was the man "wanted;" but when we stated this fact we instantly added, that, disbelieving the whole story, we were sure nobody could be guilty of what had never been done. Sic vos non vobis.

We have received too many letters to pass them over, asking us how we could condescend to answer a charge made by so disreputable parties, when any enemy we may have, became such simply from our telling always the truth. Other correspondents advised us to smash the nose of the partner who had one, and to break the bones of the Chipan-no-nosey—the other man. That would just be playing their little game; to get a few dollars somehow, when the very foundation of the dirty paper they immortalize themselves in has been started with money got for assault and battery. Again, we are asked why do not you write to Mr Lake or to Miss Abbott, and make them state that they never made an accusation against you. To this we say that Mr. Lake does not admit that he has anything to do with the whole report, but that neither he nor Miss Abbott will ever write that to us; because they are too happy to let a doubt hang over the head of the man who, although he knew that a rich fool had declared he would puff Abbott on the community if it cost him 50,000 dols., never took any notice of this fact, but stuck to his opinion unmoved, and that opinion not favourable to the ideas of the man who pretends that "there is no Nilsson and no Patti who can compare with her." The old dodge, whenever any critic will not do what singers, or people infatuated with them, want him to do, "Oh, he writes her down because I did not pay him," is too thin to serve now, and the whole affair is quite clear.

After Miss Abbott had proved her mediocrity as a singer in three concerts and two operatic performances, we began publishing in The Arcadian some retrospective criticisms, among these the question of sending girls to Europe, there to study singing. Therein we demonstrated that Miss Abbott had learned nothing worth mentioning, nor did two other American girls, who have, however, nobody to force them, with 50,000 dols. power, upon the community; and we showed that her ordinary quality of voice and her defective studies did not entitle her to any position above the one she occupied before she left for Europe. Barely was that article published, when we received a letter in the handwriting of Mr Rose, though not signed by him, to say we had made enemies of the whole clique patronising Miss Abbott, because we had expressed an opinion different from theirs. And we live in a free country! Anyhow, there was not the slightest hint at a suspicion of money, although the letter was bitter enough. Just what this meant now becomes apparent, for, after seven months, somebody is denounced in the Mercury, for having gone round to actresses trying to blackmail them, when a note purporting to come from Miss Abbott is sent to the editor of the Mercury, but not in her handwriting, as is now shown; who it comes from, nobody knows:—notice how they all proceed anonymously, just like people who say the truth fearlessly—and telling a story which, on the face of it, is a lie, because no journalist would even before his printer give himself away with such a double-faced article. Once the lie started of an attempt never attempted, it only remained to find some organ mean, dirty, dishonourable enough to publish the second lie, for which the first one had been launched, the name of the men who are accused of doing what never had been done. After all these honourable proceedings are completed, they hide behind the screen of their anonymous cowardice. Let the papers call them liars, cowards, anything; but nobody comes forward and says: "Here I am; I said so." Of course not! They know too well that they would confess to having said an indefensible lie, and that they would be taken to task and punished for the libel. So they find it a great deal more convenient to launch the malicious calumny, and then to wait. "Somebody will still believe it," but that is not so; the truth leaks out, the lie is disbelieved, and, as Voltaire said:—

"There will always be somebody smarter than you; that is all the world!"

In my dreams, with grim gloating)
Ha! ha! ha! In the depths below
He rots—No! The curdling blight!
I quaff the cool blasts as they blow;
That wine lends a leaping delight!
Your health vis-à-vis: in the flow
Of the storm we will skip to and fro.
Not a star from the firmament shone,
The moon by black clouds was bound;
Little light for the deed to be done,
But the dumb-looming snow on the ground, [alone,
When I brought him out here all
And smote him as dead as a stone.

Of snow-hidden ice a thick band
Lay hard on the pool, but I smashed
A hole with my bare bloody hand,
And in it his body I dashed. . . .
They missed it, but said, "Here shall stand
The gallows tree, high o'er the land."
My death eye it snowed again,
In a suit of pure white I was wound;
It ceased on a limitless plain
Of calm.—
The past it was drowned,
For me, with its joy and its pain,
And I writhed and wept on my chain.
Even now do my cold tears flow,
Quietly splashing the scum
Of the deep glassy water below:
While a skinny old bird doth come
And tickle my skull—"Oh dark crow,
These bones were pick'd clean long ago."
Around is the raving grey sky,
Around is the raving grey heath:
See-saw, many feet high,
And the same in the pool beneath.
Many feet low and high,
I swing in the windy night sky.

SIG. BRIGNOLI IN AMERICA.—Signor Brignoli appears to have stopped growing old several years ago. He has lost none of his voice this long while, and time of late seems to have affected him only as gin and water affected Silas Wegg—it has "mellowed the organ."—New York Tribune.

QUITE ANOTHER THING.—When General Gourko recently reported to the Czar that he had captured seven tabors of Turkish infantry, his Majesty, turning to his favourite aide-de-camp, General Tikal-tobieski, said, "I am much pleased about the tabors, but what about the loot?"—Liverpool Porcupine.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A series of six festival concerts, under the management of Mr Rea, was given last week in the Newcastle Town Hall, in aid of the Infirmary for the sick and lame poor of the counties of Newcastle, Northumberland, and Durham. This excellent charity being in debt, the assistance of music was invited to relieve its pecuniary embarrassments. A long list of patrons, including titled, wealthy, and distinguished persons of the neighbourhood, was secured. If the duties of patronage are fulfilled by merely granting the right to publish names, then those elevated personages advertised performed their part in a worthy scheme; but if personal attendance or active co-operation was understood and undertaken, then assuredly many of the patrons failed in their responsibilities, for the assemblages (particularly on the Messiah night) were too meagre to admit the idea that they were earnest in the cause of the charity, or felt interest in the sublime strains of the greatest of oratorios. Doubtless, the patrons have other ways and opportunities of helping the funds of the Infirmary, yet it is to be regretted that on this occasion they proved such unreliable allies to music in the cause. Time was when the artist needed the name of a patron, wherewith to pass current in society. Happily, those days are past and gone; no credentials but merit are now necessary to gain admittance, and secure the favour of the great art-loving public. Charlatans often steal into momentary notice at the expense of charity. Calamity—whether of famine, fire, flood, or pestilence—befals a neighbourhood, arousing the slumbering instincts of Christian charity, upon which virtue's humbug trade; nobodies rush to the front, announcing to a credulous public that they will give their disinterested and distinguished services at some entertainment for the benefit of sufferers. The only benefits accruing from such exhibitions are reaped by the projectors, either by gratification of vanity, scrapings of petty cash, or advancement of self-interest. The concerts conducted by Mr Rea were so admirable, as not to need any extraneous help. Worthy in themselves, they were worthy the cause they so eloquently pleaded. The programme embraced music appealing to a class wider than the limited circle of fashion—unto all with souls attuned to divine harmony.

The "series" opened with the Messiah, a work consecrated by genius, and dedicated by custom to the holy cause of charity. Whenever the generosity that springs from piety needs calling forth, its strains are heard, for, in its entirety, it echoes the angels' song, "Glory to God; peace on earth; goodwill towards men." The performance, on the whole, was excellent. Amongst the executants the choristers must be mentioned, for they did credit to Mr Rea, their indefatigable teacher. There is no department of work undertaken by provincial professors more valuable than that of organizing and training choral bodies. By doing this they prove the most effective agents for diffusing a love for, and practice of, good music among all communities. Doubtless, Mr Rea has experienced difficulty and worry in this branch of his professional duties, but the efficiency of his choir, their docility and attention in following every beat of his bâton, and the enthusiasm of their efforts, must have repaid him for trouble and time expended. The sopranos and basses possess excellent voices; neither are the tenors behind in merit; though the contraltos, as in many choirs, are weak, and scarcely maintain the balance of tone. All, however, were accurate and earnest. "For unto us" was encored, and the "Hallelujah" was worthy of the honour of a like distinction. The tempi throughout were somewhat faster than usual, and lessened the dignity of certain numbers. Whenever a feeling of hurry is felt, reposeful enjoyment is destroyed. Brevity of pause between each number is commendable; it promotes continuity; yet speed will not remove that heaviness complained of in these rapid times. If Handel's oratorios are too long for present taste, let numbers be omitted, and the interest quickened in the remaining pieces by greater variety of power—by light and shade; but do not destroy the majesty of their movements. The soloists were Mme Edith Wynne, Miss D'Alton, Mr E. Lloyd, and Mr Lewis Thomas. Mr Lloyd gave a vigorous and most effective rendering of "Thou shalt dash them," which the audience thoughtlessly wished repeated.

On Tuesday evening Smart's Bride of Dunkerron was given for the first time in the north. The merits of this high-class work have long been recognized by musical students; and it has also received the approbation of the public. Amateurs of Newcastle are indebted to Mr Rea for this opportunity of hearing it. Such opportunities are scarce, as a first-rate band is necessary to do it justice. This essential Mr Rea provided by engaging an orchestra of fifty London performers, led by Mr Pollitzer, and comprising such well-known names as Roberts, Woolhouse, Reynolds, Radcliffe, Barrett, Tyler, Pheasant, &c. Smart's charming instrumentation was, therefore, in capable hands, the only fault observable being an undue display of force. The players found they had something to play, and went at it with might and main. The music of The Bride of Dunkerron may prove Smart's chef d'œuvre. Thoughtful, earnest, and scientific, it seizes with dramatic instinct upon the vivid points of the story, and utilizes scholarly resources to heighten passion and situations. The trio and chorus (No. 10) "Where art thou?" is an evidence of such skill. A melody of intensity is varied to suit the sentiments of the three characters; interwoven with subordinate motives of a kindred nature, it is sustained by orchestral figures, consistent and continuous, at the same time subservient to the general effect, the climax of which is reached when the chorus enters with themes relating to the catastrophe of the story. Combinations so skillful are rare. The principals were judiciously selected, being Mme Edith Wynne, Mr E. Lloyd, and Mr Lewis Thomas. Mme Wynne gave the soprano part with great expression. The choristers were, excepting in one number, efficient, especially so in the "Chorus of Sea Maidens." At the termination of the cantata Mr Smart, who was present, was called out from amongst the audience, and cheered with an enthusiasm that made the blood tingle in observers; the effect it had upon him was seen in the glow of delight, that sent the blood mantling over his cheek. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, containing music by Nicolai, Sullivan, Mendelssohn, Weber, Auber, and Mozart. Mendelssohn being represented by the Pianoforte concerto in G minor. Mr Rea played the lovely and ever varied music allotted to the piano with the ability of an experienced executant, and with the ardour of a lover enraptured with the mistress of his soul. He was loudly and deservedly applauded.

Rossini's Sabat Mater was given on Wednesday evening to a much larger audience than was present on either of the preceding nights, and the prospects of the financial success of the concerts became brighter. It was not only a large but an enthusiastic audience. The Italian melodies seemed to go straight to the hearts of the listeners, kindling unwonted pleasure. The band and chorus were excellent, performing the finale, "Amen, in sempiterna secula," with unusual accuracy. The principals were Miss Anna Williams, Miss D'Alton, Mr E. Lloyd, and Signor Foli. "Cujus Animam" was delivered with great breadth of phrasing and beauty of voice by Mr E. Lloyd, who wisely declined to repeat the exhausting effort. Mme Wynne and Mr Bernard Lane joined the above named vocalists in the miscellaneous second part. Mr Woolhouse also assisted by playing, with considerable success, a violoncello solo, "Souvenir de St Petersburg," by Servais. Thursday evening was devoted to Elijah. The part of the prophet was undertaken by Sig. Foli, whose depth and quality of voice called up memories of Staudigl, Formes, and Weiss—earliest representatives of the grandest part ever composed for a bass. The orchestra was efficient, and the chorus, always competent, was sometimes grand, the tempi never failing to be suitable and correct. A still larger audience was present on this occasion. Is Elijah to supersede the Messiah in popularity? Mme Patey received quite a demonstration when she came on the platform, in the second part, which she justified by singing beautifully, and rewarding her admirers with a repetition of "O rest in the Lord."

The novelty of the week was reserved for Friday evening, when Dr Armes (organist of Durham Cathedral) made his first appeal to a concert-public by introducing his cantata, Hezekiah, written specially for the "Infirmary Concerts." The managing committee must be congratulated upon having at hand such an able and ready friend, and the neighbourhood upon possessing a composer of such strength. Dr Armes, who framed his own libretto entirely from Scripture, showed true modesty and sound judgment in limiting the text to a simple narrative of events; thereby avoiding temptations to expand the subject into the dimensions of a musical drama, embracing characters and incidents that would tax untried talents too severely. Modern theorists insist upon musicians being their own poets; Dr Armes has, to some extent, fulfilled this requirement, by being his own compiler. Taking from a mass of materials that which suited his musical proclivities, he left untouched that demanding musical treatment in a branch of the art not within his absolute experience. Sound and learned music, in the shape of services, anthems, and organ fugues, has been familiar to him from childhood; whilst dramatic music has been merely a study, not a daily and hourly practice. Hezekiah proves Dr Armes to be a composer with leanings towards the ecclesiastical school; yea more, it places him amongst the highest of the clever and active young men now leaping and capering upon the whilom drowsy organ-stool. The first few bars of the cantata set the hearer at his ease. He was immediately aware that the composer is no novice in contrapuntal art, and assured that the science of harmony is familiar to him. He sees that the music has the dignified mien and majestic carriage of the fathers and nobles of the art. Everything, then, is taken for granted as sound and scholarly; science is at the helm, though the craft may not be wafted or impelled by genius. The ancient lines upon which musical fabrics were usually erected are now called into question. It is contended by some that the placing together of separate pieces—solo, duet, trio, and chorus—is false to nature and art. The walls of the chambers of melody and halls of harmony, with the connecting passages of recitative, and every other arbitrary partition, they would break down, contending they form prison cells where genius is chained and kept in servitude. "Music," say they, "should not copy the architect, nor any other worker, but go to nature. It should not build, but grow like the tree of the forest. All parts should be related and tied together as intimately and naturally as root, branch, stem, leaf, and blossom, all vivified with the glorious currents of poetic life." Dr Armes does not affect to have caught the spirit of these modern doctrines, but inclines rather to old forms. He has built; but the building is well-constructed, harmonious in proportion and style. Unlike some composers of the composite order, who build one room Purcell, another Handel, a whole storey Mendelssohn, daubing the outside with Wagner stucco, and proclaim to a gaping world something new, Hezekiah has unity, whether or no that unity may spring from individuality. Dr Armes conducted with ability. The vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Mme Patey, Mr E. Lloyd, and Mr Lewis Thomas. To the tenor is allotted the music assigned to the title rôle, and Mr Lloyd gave it with a fervour and dignity that made the part stand out in all necessary prominence, heart-broken utterances being relieved by manliness of voice and style which secured general sympathy and appreciation. The chorus and band did their duty nobly. The composer received an ovation at the termination of his work. Such applause should be an incentive to further efforts and greater successes. A series of well-chosen songs, by the above-named artists, joined by Miss D'Alton and Mr Bernard Lane, followed. The choir gave Mr Rea's charming part-song, "Parted." The quality of this composition would have justified Mr Rea in placing something more considerable of his own in the programme; but he is an artist as modest as true. Mr Pollitzer played his own Romance and Polonaise with effect. This gentleman is also a real and unaffected artist. Saturday evening's programme was of a popular order, giving delight to a large audience. The "classical," however, was not forgotten, inasmuch as Mr Walter Bache played Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, while the orchestra gave a fine performance of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony. Mr T. A. Alderson did excellently throughout the week as organist and accompanist; and it need not be said that Mr Rea conducted with untiring zeal and consummate tact. P. G.

November 12th, 1877.

The programme of the first of the concerts at the Chatelet, so admirably directed by M. Colonne, was a long one, made longer by the intolerable system of encores. The selection included Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique," the fourth movement (Marche au Supplice) being encored and repeated. On the back of the printed programme were unfolded the poetical ideas which originated this extraordinary work. Could not Chopin have made us feel the force of an idea of that kind in one of his waltzes or nocturnes better than Berlioz, with his five movements and the help of two bells? Merely a suggestion.* The piece next in importance was C. Saint-Saëns Concerto "en sol mineur" (G minor—"By Abbs!"), played by Mme C. Montigny-Rémaury. This lady, who has a light, facile finger, and considerable powers of execution, was most deservedly recalled for her spirited and intelligent performance. Moreover, she played "sans book." Perhaps, by-and-bye, we shall have conductors and men at arms performing their allotted tasks "sans book." An intermède from Gluck's Orphée was the occasion of exhibiting the talent of the chief flautist in the orchestra, M. Conté, who played well and with deserved success some ballet music from Rameau's Fêtes d'Hébé (the latter part encored). Die Zauberflöte (divine Mozart!), and the Wedding March from A Midsummer Night's Dream, with which Mendelssohn (like Meyerbeer, in another way—see Le Prophète), seems to have fixed the boundaries of the "Marches" (King Arthur's "Marches"), completed the programme, and left the hearers satiated "at the full." P. G.

*[By no means. The suggestion is a bad one. Compared with Berlioz, Chopin was a morbidly sentimental flea by the side of a furiously roaring lion—or a corner in a garden (where sensitive plants, convolvuluses, and other timid flowers of weakly nerve, abound) to a vast, unshaven, impenetrable forest, infested with savage beasts, whose hunger and thirst must be incontinently appeased.—P. MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

At Mr Hallé's concert last week, Spohr's "Power of Sound" was the symphony of the evening, and a finer performance of this interesting, and presumably great work, was never heard in Manchester. Mr Hallé played Mendelssohn's Rondo Brillante in E flat with the orchestra, and several solos from Chopin. The overtures were Weber's Oberon and Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris, with Wagner's ending; and the singers of the evening were Mdles Friedländer and Redeker, both of whom are always welcome here.

Mr De Jong's concert, on Saturday, was very well attended, the attraction being a troupe of travelling artists, of whom Mme Trebelli was the most famous, and, as might be inferred, without the names of the others being given, the most accomplished. Mdle Basillet did not quite fulfil the expectations raised by the announcement that she was "the eminent soprano from St Petersburg." Miss Annie Williams, always pleasing here, and Mr Barton McGuckin has been a great favourite since his first appearance in Manchester. Herr Conrad Behrens, the popular basso, Mr E. Cowen, and a clever violinist, M. Jaquinot, were also of the party.

At the Prince's Theatre crowded houses have assembled nightly, to hear the Carl Rosa opera company. Maritana, The Bohemian Girl, Satanella, and Faust are still attractive, and Macfarren's Robin Hood has been given for the first time in Manchester. But the most brilliant success of the engagement has been Nicolai's The Merry Wives of Windsor. This brilliant and sparkling opera is admirably put on the stage, and the principal parts are all admirably supported. Mr Aynsley Cook's Falstaff is more than clever, and Mr Lyall, as Slender, is a Shakespearian study. Miss Gaylord's Mrs Ford is one of that accomplished lady's best impersonations; and Miss Yorke, Miss Cora Stuart, Mr J. W. Turner, Mr Ludwig, and the other actors all deserve commendation. Prediction is proverbially unsafe, but I shall be astonished if, when Mr Carl Rosa next goes to London, The Merry Wives of Windsor does not prove one of the most attractive operas in his repertory. Let us not forget to add that Mme Blanche Cole is singing splendidly, and that in Maritana, Marguerite, Maid Marion, and Satanella, her brilliant vocalization has been as much admired as ever. Mr Packard, too, is received with well-deserved favour. To-night Mme Blanche Cole will sing in The Crown Diamonds.

To-morrow night Judas Maccabeus will be given at Mr Hallé's concert, with Mme Nouver, Mrs Knox, Mr Lloyd, and Signor Foli as the solo singers.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.

Programme of Organ Recitals by Mr Frederic Archer.

MONDAY, OCT. 29th.—Sonata, in D minor (G. Merkel); Allegretto, in D (Frederic Archer); Prelude and Fugue in G major (Book II., No. 7) (J. S. Bach); Grand Fantaisie de Concert (J. Callaerts); Overture, Stradella (Flotow).

TUESDAY, OCT. 30th.—Grand Chœur, in E flat (A. Guilmant); Pastorale (P. Trillat); Adagio and Allegro (Second Symphony) (Haydn); Selection, Lara (Maillart); Overture, Il Templario (O. Nicolai).

WEDNESDAY, OCT. 31st.—Sonata, (No. 2) (Hamilton Clarke); Allegretto Scherzando (Sonata, in D, for piano and cello) (Mendelssohn); Schiller March (Meyerbeer); Andante con Moto (Second Symphony) (A. Hesse); Overture, Der Schwedensee (R. Emmerick).

THURSDAY, NOV. 1st.—Grand Chœur, in D (A. Guilmant); Serenade, in F (Hamilton Clarke); Selection, L'Étoile du Nord (Meyerbeer); Toccata and Fugue on the name BACH (J. A. van Eyken); Overture, Egmont (Beethoven).

FRIDAY, NOV. 2nd.—Fantasia, in C minor (H. Berens); "La Pastorale" (A. Maily); Prelude and Fugue, in E major (E. F. Richter); Selection, Dinorah (Meyerbeer); Overture, Justin (Handel).

SATURDAY, NOV. 3rd.—Sonata (No. 1) (Mendelssohn); Andante (Sonata for cello and piano, in B flat) (Mendelssohn); Selection, Elijah (Mendelssohn); Overture, Athalie (Mendelssohn).

KÖNIGSBERG (PRUSSIA).—The first Orchestral Concert, under Capellmeister Hillmann, took place at the new Bourse, on Tuesday, the 6th of November. The second part of the programme contained Beethoven's Second Sinfonie (in D major). The introduction of a soloist on so exceptional an instrument as the harp proved a matter of congratulation for the concert direction, and might be imitated with equal results elsewhere. Mr Lockwood, a recent acquisition of the director of the opera (Herr Stägmann), played the difficult but effective fantasia of Pariah-Alvars, dedicated to Thalberg, with such finished execution as to win a general and deserved re-call.

MUSIC A SCIENCE OF NUMBERS.

BY WILLIAM CHAPPELL.

And now for the practical use of these figures, for, although the harmonic scale may be referred to, they are most easily remembered. All young pupils are taught the difference between an octave, a fifth, a fourth, and a third, upon the pianoforte, and it is only to associate the numbers with those intervals, to find out the best bass, and every admissible bass. All octaves are in the ratio of 2 to 1, whether it be 4 to 2, 8 to 4, or 16 to 8. All fifths are in the ratio of 3 to 2, all fourths in that of 4 to 3, all major thirds 5 to 4, and minor thirds 6 to 5.

For instance, in the key of C, C to F above it is a fourth, and F is No. 4, therefore, the F, two octaves below, is the consonant bass; whereas, if we strike G with the C above, C becomes the natural bass to that interval. The most consonant basses are always found in the lowest numbers, because the proportion of consonant vibrations is there greatest. Thus, from D to G is also a fourth, in the key of C, but the numbers are 9 to 12, with a remote bass in C, and there will be 21 vibrations, of which only two will coincide in every cycle—1 of the 8, with 1 of the 9. Then, the proportion of non-coincidence will be so great as to make the sound unpleasant to the ear. But as 9 to 12 is in the ratio of 3 to 4, we have the best bass in these lowest numbers, and take G. By the various basses to intervals we modulate into other keys.

At the International Exhibition, held at South Kensington in 1862, Mr Saxe, the eminent inventor of Saxe Horns, exhibited an immense horn with an exceedingly long coil of tube, and, perhaps, standing six feet in height. When asked by the jury the object of this excessive size and length, he answered "C'est pour jouer dans le cinquième étage"—"It is for playing in the fifth octave," and he produced with facility any of the sixteen tones and semitones of that octave from it. Half the length of any open conical tube is expended upon its second note, the octave. No human power could have blown the low notes of that horn. Supposing it to have been tuned to the lowest C upon the pianoforte, with thirty-three vibrations in a second, as the usual French pitch, it would have had 66, 132, 264, and 528 for his first, second third and fourth octaves, while his fifth octave would commence on treble C, with 528, and extend to C above the lines with 1056 vibrations in a second of time. It would thus be within the power of the lungs. He utilized only from the 16th to the 32nd part of his enormous tube, but it gave him the command of the semitones.

This great encumbrance of length is not necessary in a cylindrical stopped tube. It will take up its own octave according to the ratio of its length to its diameter. We have here an example, in a resonating tube invented by Sir Charles Wheatstone just fifty years ago. The lecture for which he invented it was afterwards reported in the twenty-fifth volume of the Quarterly Journal of Science, Literature, and Art, January to March, 1828. Both he and I knew Eulenstein, an accomplished musician, whose admirable skill in playing upon the Jew's harp was the inducing cause of that particular lecture. Eulenstein had a peculiar facility for contracting and expanding the cavity of his mouth, through the pliability of his very thin cheeks and by the management of his tongue, so that he could fit them for any harmonic note within a certain compass. Wheatstone then gave the law, that a perfect harmonic scale might be drawn from a single tuning-fork, or from the vibrating tongue of a Jew's harp, by resonators adapted, or adapting themselves, to multiples of the original number of vibrations. "I took," said Sir Charles, "a tube, closed at one end by a movable piston, and placed before it the branch [or prong] of a vibrating tuning-fork of the ordinary pitch—C. The length of the column of air [within the tube] was six inches. On diminishing the length of the column of air to three inches [by moving up the piston], the sound of the tuning-fork was no longer reciprocated [in unison], but its octave was produced." "It is, therefore, evident from experiments," says he, "that a column of air may vibrate by reciprocation, not only with another body whose vibrations are isochronous [or in unison] with its own, but also when the number of its own vibrations is any multiple of the sounding body." Again, he says: "No other sounds can be produced by reciprocation from a column of air, but those which are perfectly identical with the multiplications of the original vibrations of the tuning-fork or the tongue of the Jew's harp." I produced the original tube in this room about two years ago, to check a recent theory—that resonators strengthened the ear, and answered only in unison, and Sir Charles ordered this one for me, made by Mr Groves, under his own superintendence. The improvement in this is, that the piston now works in a groove and is not liable to stick. Two octaves are produced from the tongue of one Jew's harp as rapidly as the piston can be moved up and down. There is no slurring between one sound and another, but clear jumps from one multiple to another, and every one of them may be arrested and heard by itself by checking the piston. But, although I am glad to produce this tube before those who were not present on the last occasion, and to do honour to the memory of our eminent vice-president, who declined to refer in any way to himself, I have another motive also. This is a principle which has never been utilized. We have had pipes stopped at the top, like the usual pitch-pipe, but they have been found too slow in action to be suitable for any other purpose. This is rapidity itself, and might surely be utilized for some such purpose as pedal pipes for an organ. The piston can be balanced outside to the greatest nicety, and one such pipe will take the scale of C, and another that of F. All that is required is to blow across the top in the manner of the Pandean pipes, or, as it appears, better still, to set free a fan or cogged wheel at the mouth tuned to each of the two fundamental notes. The wheel might be set free by the action of the foot upon the pedal. It is now well known that the length of a 32 or a 16 foot pipe may be greatly reduced by breadth of scale. We Europeans have made little, if any, use of resonators, and yet they have been long in use in Java. The drawing on the wall is of an instrument, brought from Java by Sir Stamford Raffles more than half a century ago. There is one of the same kind in the British Museum. But this is perhaps of greater interest, as it may have suggested to Wheatstone the principle of the resonating tube. The natives of Java cast metal plates which they suspend in a row upon strings, and strike them with drum-sticks, which are fitted into circular heads. As all cast metal is more or less false in tone, owing to inequalities and lack of homogeneity, they place some of the largest bamboos, cut to short lengths, and placed upright, under the metal, to make the true sounds of these resonators overcome the false harmonics of the metal plates.

Resonators were used in the theatres of ancient Greece—we here find them used in Java; but these powerful auxiliaries to tone still await their development in modern Europe.

And now, in conclusion, permit me to draw your attention to a harmonium with two keyboards, the upper one having four octaves of our scale tuned without tempering, and the lower with the five octaves of the harmonic scale, and the sixteen notes in the fifth octave. Much has been said of the harmonic scale, and this is perhaps the only instrument on which the harmonics can be fully heard and sustained for experimental use.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

Le tour du Monde en 80 jours has proved such a "grand spectacle," that the managers have decided to give it a run of twenty-eight consecutive nights, and one or two afternoon performances. It is magnificently mounted. The troupe of artists, the ballet of thirty, the scenery, machinery, costumes, and the elephant, are all from the theatre of the Porte St Martin, Paris. The first night it began at 7, and the curtain fell at 1.35 a.m. on Sunday morning. The Salle Monsigny has been crammed on each of the four representations, and the "regisseur" has a hard time of it, from 10 till 4 daily, booking places a week in advance. La Belle Hélène "came off" on October 27th, when Mlle Flachot delighted every one by her impersonation of the heroine. Don César de Bazan and Latude (a long drama) are the only other novelties since I last wrote.

As we are likely to be "going round the world" every evening for seven hours (beg pardon! eighty days) for the next fortnight, I do not expect to have anything to write about, so pray don't send me to the right about, if you do not hear from me till December.

I hear that M. Brasseur, of the Palais-Royal, Paris, is retiring shortly from the stage, and is making "ses adieux" in La Cagnotte, La Mariée du Mardi Gras, Le Carnaval d'un merle blanc, Le plus heureux des trois, et Doit on le dire? and that Gil Perée, of the same theatre, is very ill with typhoid fever.

Boulogne-sur-mer, 7th Nov., 1877.

WEIMAR.—M. Camille Saint-Saëns has been stopping here to superintend the production of his opera, Samson et Dalila, at the Grand-Ducal Theatre. The first performance is fixed for the 18th inst. He has, also, been playing at Leipsic, Warsaw, Breslau, Cassel, Brunswick, and other towns.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The 20th season of these excellent entertainments, which have done so much for the progress of musical taste in a serious direction, began on Monday night, at St James's Hall, in the presence of a numerous, attentive, and thoroughly art-loving audience. Conspicuous among the rest were the shilling tenants of the orchestra, who time out of mind have constituted a solid bulwark, and by their keen appreciation of the "chamber-compositions" of the great masters exercised a sympathetic influence. Mr Arthur Chappell has acted prudently in allowing no encroachment whatever upon the privilege of those who were really the first and have remained the most constant among his supporters. Without the "shilling orchestra," the Popular Concerts would hardly have maintained the high position universally accorded them. The aristocratic and fashionable world came after, not leading, but led by less pretentious members of the community—which in the case of Italian opera, now so generally popular with all classes, was precisely the reverse. It is, however, in any circumstances, gratifying to observe that such music as, from November in one year to mid-spring in the year following, may be heard, week after week, in St James's Hall, obtains at this period, and has for many years enjoyed, unanimous recognition. This, in the instance of the Popular Concerts, could never have occurred had the scheme upon which they were originally instituted been once departed from, or, in fact, in any material sense disregarded. Happily their founder, wise in his generation, believed that there existed in London a public not only able to understand but likely to support such entertainments; and thus the quartet, sonata, and all the diversities of this especially engaging form which the plastic art of music is enabled to assume, no longer appeal exclusively to a privileged few, but to the enquiring and anxious-to-be-instructed many. In accordance with his almost invariable custom, on the first night of a new season, Mr Arthur Chappell's programme was made up of recognized masterpieces, with artists in every way competent to give them due effect. There were two quartets for stringed instruments, a trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and a pianoforte solo—not, be it understood, a mere vehicle for the exhibition of pretentious "virtuosity," but a classical piece from the pen of a classical composer. The quartets were the first of Schumann's "Op. 44," and one by Haydn in B flat, in its way never excelled even by that genial and prolific composer—as truly "Father of the Quartet" as he was "Father of the Symphony." Schumann's work—styled "in A minor," though the allegro and adagio are both in F major—is, perhaps, the best of the series of three (his only attempts of the kind that are known) inscribed to his contemporary and intimate friend, "Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy." Though placed before, instead of after, the quartet by Haydn, the elder composer fairly stood his ground, if only on account of a more spontaneous flow of melody, and, with less apparent labour, far greater power of development, derived from a mastery of the art of counterpoint to which Schumann could lay no equal claim. The quartet players on the present occasion—Mdmé Norman-Néruda, acknowledged "Queen of Violinists," and, by the way, a somewhat formidable rival to the accepted "Kings," of the instrument she professes, Herr L. Ries, who has held the post of second violin since the Monday Popular Concerts were set on foot (February, 1859), Mr Zerbini, not only a perfect master of the viola, but an accomplished musician in the bargain, and Signor Piatti, who now, as for very many years past, stands alone among violoncellists—were equally at home in Schumann and in Haydn. A more deeply considered—a finer execution, in short—of each quartet could hardly have been dreamed of, even by their respective authors. Schumann's work, with its earnest thought and occasional reminiscences of Mendelssohn, has never been more thoroughly enjoyed. Those who left the hall before that of Haydn lost a treat which all who stayed to hear it, from the first note to the last, fully appreciated.

The pianist was Mdlle Anna Mehlig, an artist of superior attainments, not less conversant with Beethoven than with Mendelssohn, whose wonderful Trio in C minor (No. 2), in which she was supported by Mdmé Néruda and Signor Piatti, began the second part of the concert. Mdlle Mehlig selected for her solo display the ingenious variations composed by Beethoven on themes already employed in his music to the ballet of Prometheus, and used some time later, to still higher purpose, in his magnificent Eroica symphony. They present many difficulties, but none such to give the slightest trouble to the fair German pianist, whose admirable performance, listened to with evident interest, won general and well-merited applause. There was no other solo. The vocal music, exclusively German and contributed by German artists of acknowledged repute—Mdlles Friedländer (soprano) and Redeker (contralto)—comprised two duets by Mendelssohn and two by Rubinstein, all extremely well sung. The accompaniments to these were played by Sir Julius Benedict in the finished manner for which he is eminently distinguished. It may be remarked of this programme that every piece, vocal and instrumental, the Moldavian Rubinstein's duets excepted, was German, and that the performers, vocal and instrumental, were exclusively foreigners. The fact gives rise to considerations not undeserving future comment. Viewed as a whole, however, the 593d "Popular Concert" was fully worthy its precursors, and calculated to maintain the repute of an institution which has taken firm root in the public musical mind.

The first Saturday concert is announced for the 17th inst., when, among other things, Mdmé Norman-Néruda is to lead Schubert's charming "Styrian quartet" in A minor, into the feeling of which she enters so heartily.—Times.

DR BUNNETT.

(From the "Eastern Daily Press.")

At a preliminary meeting, held at the Guildhall, the Mayor of Norwich (R. Coller, Esq.) in the chair, it was unanimously resolved to give a complimentary concert, for the benefit of Dr Bunnett, in St Andrew's Hall, on the 28th inst. It was felt that Dr Bunnett was entitled to some mark of sympathy in not obtaining the post of Cathedral organist after a faithful and most successful deputyship of more than a quarter of a century, and that without such expression of public sympathy he would appear to remain under an undeserved censure. A committee was then formed to carry out the project, which included the names of the Mayor, Deputy Mayor, Clara Sewell Read, Esq., M.P., and the most influential people of the city; Mr Alderman Howlett as hon. treasurer, and Mr Charles E. Noverre as hon. secretary. The committee have already secured the services of Miss Blanche Lucas (soprano) and Miss Annie Buttwerworth (contralto). Sir Julius Benedict has consented to come from London and conduct, and also play in a pianoforte duet with Dr Bunnett. Mr. H. Kingston Rudd and others have also offered their services, and Messrs Broadwood & Sons have volunteered to send one of their concert grand pianofortes expressly for the concert. Further arrangements are being made to insure for the concert a complete success in every particular. It appears vain to hope the Dean will reverse his former decision. One gentleman from Halifax has already been down, but his visit proved unsuccessful. Negotiations are, however, it is believed, opened with another gentleman, which, it is currently reported, may result in the appointment being filled. We are quite confident that no one but a third or fourth-rate musician, or one of small experience, will come to Norwich under the circumstances.

NAMES OF COMMITTEE.

HAMBURG.—Herr Franz von Holstein's historico-romantic opera, Die Hochländer, has been produced at the Stadttheater with complete success. The composer and author—for Herr von Holstein has written both libretto and music—had to appear repeatedly on the first night.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Faithful to his pledge, the Director of Her Majesty's Theatre gave his subscribers no fewer than six operas last week—and each, it should be added, with a certain general efficiency. The Trovatore, with which the projected series of representations began, was followed by Lucia di Lammermoor, the part of the heroine being sustained by Mdle. Alwina Valleria with her accustomed ability and success. It is no little to say in favour of this clever lady that whenever, in no matter what circumstances, her aid may be required, she is always prepared. With such competent and willing artists at hand, the manager can rest assured that the doors of his establishment will be open to the public for some kind of entertainment more or less acceptable. Their value, if only on that account, is genuine. But opera-goers need scarcely be reminded that Mdle. Valleria has merits claiming independent recognition; and a strong sense of this was manifested in the hearty approval bestowed on her impersonation of Donizetti's most romantic heroine. Beyond stating that the other conspicuous parts in Lucia were entrusted to Signors Fancelli (Edgardo) and Galassi (Enrico), it would be superfluous to add one other word about an opera which, though unequal in various respects, has, since its first production at Naples more than 40 years ago, kept a place in the Italian repertory wherever Italian music is esteemed.

As Mdle. Anna di Belocca was indisposed on Tuesday, which explains why Lucia was substituted for Il Barbiere, so Mdle. Mila Rodani, another young singer of charming promise and already admitted talent, was indisposed on the following evening. On this occasion, however, there was no necessity to change the opera—Un Ballo in Maschera—an experienced and invariably ready artist being again at disposal, in the person of Mdle. Bauermeister, who sustained the part of Oscar—not merely with credit to herself—but to the satisfaction of her hearers. This was fortunate for Mdle. Caroline Salla, who thus enjoyed an opportunity, in the character of Renato's unhappy wife, for renewing the favourable impression created by her Amelia on the occasion of her début at Her Majesty's Theatre in the spring and summer season. That the young French lady is an actress of the true stamp was shown both in the scene of the stolen interview with Duke Riccardo, who so unworthily requites the services of his truest friend, Renato, and in that where Amelia is compelled by her husband to draw the paper which affords its vengeful recipient the privilege of assassinating his liege and master. In both instances Mdle. Salla was admirable. A little more physical power alone is wanting to enable her to become a lyric comedian of the first rank; and even this may be attained. It is long since a stranger at once so accomplished and so sympathetic has appeared among us. A new tenor, moreover, who assumes the stage-appellative of "Runcio" may also thank Mdle. Bauermeister that the Ballo in Maschera was not laid aside for another work. "Signor Runcio," then—since as such we are bound to style him—achieved a real success. He is the fortunate possessor of a tenor voice, the quality of which, from the very beginning, invited attention; and, what is of equal consequence, it appears to have been cultivated in the right direction. Without being prepared to offer a definite judgment as regards the absolute claims of this new tenor, or speculating with confidence upon the chances of his future career, any well-instructed amateur must have felt that the necessary means were there, and that if Signor Runcio, not quite persuaded of his own absolute perfection, as happens frequently to beginners (tenors especially), thinks seriously of studying his art, the fairest prospects are open to him. Taken as a whole, his Riccardo the other night would fully justify such an opinion. Signor Runcio's voice is at present inadequately developed; but its tones are seldom otherwise than agreeable, while he has the rare merit of discretion, never over-exerting himself, and thus never open to the charge of exaggeration. To have written thus much amounts to something more than ordinary praise of a young aspirant; and when it is added that Signor Runcio bears himself well on the stage, and seems to enter with earnestness into the spirit of the words he has to deliver and the character he endeavours to portray, no more need be added—at least for the present. He was received with general acceptance, and, in our opinion, deservedly so. At the same time, doubtless, he will shortly challenge consideration in another part, not necessarily more important, but of a different complexion. It will suffice to add that Signor Galassi was the Renato of the evening, Mdme. Demerio Lablache being Ulrica; and that the execution of the music, under Signor Li Calsi's superintendence, was almost uniformly excellent. The famous quintet, "E scherz' od è follia," in which all the chief artists took part, obtained its customary encore. The next opera was Rigoletto, noticeable, as before, for the thoughtful and elaborate impersonation of the Court Jester by Signor Del Puente, the other leading parts falling once again to Mdle. Valleria (Gilda) and Signor Fancelli (the Duke), Mdme. Lablache assuming that of Maddalena, while the subordinate characters were in more or less efficient keeping. To Rigoletto succeeded Le Nozze di Figaro, in which a fresh new-comer, Mdle. Parodi, made her début as the Countess, singing with taste and feeling both the airs, "Porgi amor" and "Dove sono," in the latter of which she was, with justice, greatly applauded. We hope to hear more of this lady. The other parts were in more or less experienced hands. Mdme. Marie Roze, for example, was Susanna, and Mdle. Anna di Belocca played the sprightly page, Cherubino, in the sprightliest manner, looking the character, as may be readily imagined, and winning an encore in the always attractive romance, "Voi che sapete!" The most marked vocal success of Mdme. Marie Roze was in the soliloquy of the garden scene, "Deh vieni non tardar,"—unanimously applauded. The Figaro was Signor Galassi; the Count Almaviva, Signor Del Puente; the other personages being represented with equal care and intelligence. But Mozart's inimitable work has of late years, happily, become almost as familiar as the most widely-known of bond fide Italian operas; and to do more than reiterate the fact of its being ever welcome is unnecessary.

The opera on Saturday evening was Robert le Diable, with a cast little different in its important essentials from that of last summer, when Mdle. Caroline Salla was the Alice. For example, we had again Signor Fancelli as Robert, Signor Foli as Bertram, Signor Rinaldini as Raimbault, Mdle. Valleria as Isabella, and Mdme. Kati Lanner as the Abbess, in the scene of the resuscitation of the nuns. There remains, therefore, only to speak of the one novelty in the cast—the Alice of Mdme. Marie Roze. The career of the young French lady selected expressly by Auber to undertake the leading part in Le Premier Jour de Bonheur, one of the freshest and most genial, though one of his latest operas, has been uniformly successful; but it is only of recent years that she has devoted herself to opera in which the higher dramatic attributes are indispensable. Her Alice may be pronounced her worthiest achievement in this new line, and certainly justifies friends and admirers in believing that she is destined sooner or later to make it her own. Mdme. Roze being only engaged for a month at Her Majesty's Theatre, and subsequently going to America, it was but fair that she should be allowed this opportunity of exhibiting the versatility of her powers. That her assumption of Alice was highly approved by the enormous audience crowding the theatre on Saturday night was evidenced by the frequent applause. In her first air, when Alice communicates to Robert his mother's final bequest, she made an impression not to be mistaken; while in the cavern scene (Act 3) in the soliloquy, "Nel lasciar la Normandia," she strengthened that impression, which the subsequent interview with Bertram, where Mdme. Roze's acting was both earnest and intelligent, further confirmed. The succeeding trio (unaccompanied), in which Robert, as well as Bertram, takes part, was equally successful. After this it may be well understood that the grand final trio (Act 5), the culminating point of the opera, was effective in comparison. In short, Mdme. Roze may be congratulated on a performance more than ordinarily good of one of the most difficult parts in the modern lyric repertory. She must strive, nevertheless, to reach still nearer the goal she clearly now aspires to. She has genuine intelligence, added to proportionate physical resources, to the further cultivation of both which she must apply herself with artistic perseverance. Mdle. Valleria was encored in "Robert, toi que j'aime," and fully earned the distinction.—Times.

Mr. Mapleson continues the nightly performances of Italian opera, so as to show that, in the absence of a "star," he is alive to the value of a good ensemble. The parts in each work are so well filled that none, save the unreasonably exigent, can fail to derive enjoyment from them, and there is little doubt that the manager will obtain the support of all amateurs who love opera for its own sake rather than for the sake of those who may chance to be famous among its interpreters. Il Barbiere had been announced for Tuesday night, with Mdle. de Belocca as Rosina, and Sig. Bettini as Almaviva, but neither of these artists was able to appear, and, in the emergency, Mr. Mapleson put up Lucia, with Mdle. Valleria as the heroine, Sig. Fancelli as Edgardo, and Sig. Galassi as Enrico. Mdle. Valleria again asserted her value as a clever singer and an acceptable actress; one, moreover, who shows good judgment by never pretending to do that which lies beyond her powers. Her means are considerable, as we have often pointed out, and she uses them well, while carefully refraining from putting upon them an undue strain. On this occasion she several times won the attentive regard of the audience, who did not fail to bestow genuine applause. The other principal artists engaged upon Donizetti's well-worn opera have played in it so often that it will suffice to speak of them as sustaining their several reputations, and helping in the old measure to attain a good general result.

Un Ballo in Maschera, one of Mr Mapleson's revivals last season, was produced on Wednesday, the part of Amelia being sustained by Mdle Caroline Salla, who, if we remember rightly, made her début in it. Again this accomplished young lady achieved a success beyond the power of cavil. That her efforts were appreciated to the full extent of their worth we do not say, but worth does not depend upon acknowledgment, and Mdle Salla's representation of the unhappy heroine deserves to be accounted of uncommon value. The artist's success in the trying third act was gained by means of good singing and intelligent, often powerful, acting, while in the scene of the fatal lottery Mdle Salla deepened the impression previously made, and won the plaudits of every amateur in the house. Mdme Lablache did good service as Ulrica, and Mdme Bauermeister, in the absence of Mdle Rodani, through illness, sang Oscar's music very acceptably, though she lacked the necessary sprightliness of manner. Signor Galassi was a familiar Renato, and not less welcome than familiar; the conspirators were represented by M. Gonnat and Signor Franceschi, and the part of Ricardo served to introduce a débutant, Signor Runzio, who promises to be a tenor of much value. Signor Runzio has a fairly good stage presence; though showing no signs of being a great actor, he goes through the business of his part like an artist of intelligence and experience; he has an agreeable voice, sufficiently strong, and at the same time flexible, and he sings as one trained upon a good legitimate method. We must, of course, know more of this gentleman before presuming to estimate his exact worth; but it is something that he should have created a desire to know more, and won, at a stroke, the favourable consideration of his audience. His future appearances cannot fail to command attention. The general performance of Un Ballo under Signor Li Calsi's direction was satisfactory; but we do not approve the introduction into the ball scene of some commonplace, not to say vulgar, dance music for an object scarcely worth the risk of censurè.—Daily Telegraph.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

The second town in the kingdom has at length removed one cause of self-reproach. Till last night Glasgow had no public hall worthy, by reason of dimensions and general convenience, to be the meeting-place of its citizens. The want was sadly felt in connection with musical gatherings, and as long ago as 1871 steps were taken towards the erection of a suitable building. Obstacles, however, stood in the way of immediately carrying out the scheme then proposed, and the festival of 1874 had to be held in the old and inconvenient City Hall, amid the odours of onions, cheese, apples, and other miscellaneous wares, collected in the market underneath. The promoters of the new public edifice, however, persevered in their enterprise, and now the resolution of a few private persons, unaided by public funds of any sort, has endowed the town with a really splendid and commodious building, well situated, and adapted for all sorts of gatherings, and not over a market. The new hall includes many apartments; in them the Glasgow folk will be able to dine and dance and make speeches to their hearts' content, and with an amount of convenience altogether foreign to past experience. But here I am only concerned with the music-room, which is one of the finest as well as one of the largest in the Kingdom. Its length is 185 feet including the recess wherein stands the back gallery, the width is 75ft, and the height 58ft, this measurement being larger than that of the Manchester Free Trade Hall, the Town Hall of Leeds, and both St James's and Exeter Halls, in London. At public meetings the apartment will accommodate 3,800 persons, but the directors do not propose to admit anything like that number when concerts are given, recognizing the fact that the mind can hardly be free to enjoy itself, when its close ally, the body, is uncomfortable. They have a second set of benches, allowing more ample space and making fuller provision for corporeal ease; but even under these circumstances the hall will receive 2,300 persons, each one of whom is guaranteed a fair share of space by arm-rests between the seats. The interior decorations are said to be as yet unfinished, and their prevailing loudness of colour may receive some modification; while, in any case, the Glasgow climate will speedily tone down whatever at present seems glaring. Among the conspicuous features of this imposing room is an organ of 64 sounding stops, built by Messrs T. Lewis & Co., London, and having a case about which many diverse opinions are likely to arise in point of general design and of detail. This erection so harmonizes with the architectural plan of the interior that, apart from a moderate show of gilded pipes and a plentiful display of emblematic figures, its real character is not very clearly suggested; but if the musical effect of the instrument suffers no harm, the architect may be permitted to do what he likes outside, and there is every reason to believe that the organ, even should it offend some eyes, will please every ear. In regard to the important matter of acoustics, the hall is credited, as far as it has yet been tried, with success, and on this account the Glasgow amateurs should present a thank-offering to the goddess Chance, who has bestowed upon them a prize in what is avowedly a lottery, and who, moreover, has crowned her goddess by the gift of an efficient ventilation. Seeing how many able architects have tried to secure like results, as the inevitable outcome of a theory, and have wofully failed, there is cause, indeed, for gratitude. Henceforth, Glasgow, where music has long been making real progress, can put forth all its energies under fitting conditions, and amateurs everywhere will expect to see the Triennial Festival become a permanent and flourishing institution.

The inauguration, as it is called here, of the new building took place last night with a performance of The Messiah, before a crowded and brilliant audience. With a Royal Princess residing not far away, it was to be expected that the canny qualities of Scotchmen would suggest the desirableness of securing her presence, with a view to utilizing the strength of Scottish loyalty. This was done accordingly, and the opening ceremony took place in presence of her Royal Highness the Marchioness of Lorne, who, accompanied by her husband and Lady Elizabeth Campbell, arrived in Glasgow from Roseneath, yesterday afternoon, and in the evening were the guests of Sir Jas. Watson. On reaching the hall, where the royal party received military honours from a guard of Highland volunteers, a simple and appropriate incident took place, namely, the presentation to the Princess of a silver gilt casket, containing a programme of the concert and a description on vellum of the building. The presentation was made in a brief speech by Mr John Matheson, jun., Chairman of the Executive Committee; and, after a still more brief acknowledgment, the distinguished visitors were escorted to the great hall, where they were received with every mark of respect, the chorus singing the "National Anthem," accompanied on the organ by Mr Best, in a style more fanciful than effective. This formal welcome over, the oratorio began, and in course of time, when the Princess had been sufficiently stared at after the manner of Britons, it received attention.

As the present musical resources of Glasgow will come under review later in the week, apropos to doings of more import than a performance of The Messiah, my present task is a light one, being simply to state that Handel's masterpiece was, on the whole, effectively rendered, though not without here and there a blemish; that the soloists, Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdme. Patay, Mr Lloyd, and Signor Foli discharged their familiar task with success; and that the audience went away gratified with the entire proceedings. To-morrow evening Professor Macfarren's cantata, The Lady of the Lake, will be produced for the first time in public, and on Friday Herr von Bülow conducts a Beethoven concert.—Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, 14th November.

DEATH.

On November the 14th, CHRISTOPHER LONSDALE, Esq., of 26, Old Bond Street, in his 83rd year.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SIR FLUFFAM OF SWAFFAM.—If Mr Gale were a composer, and called on 500 times after his last new opera, we undertake to say that he would answer the calls, and make the bows, so expeditiously as not to prolong the duration of the performance five minutes. Sir Fluffam is altogether wrong about G. F. Pinto, who only left one concerto for the violin, which it is a pity M. Sainton does not know and play.

DR GLUM.—Our correspondent asks—Is "Runzio or Runcio the correct orthograph?" We can only reply—"Whichever you please, Dr Glum."

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1877.

FROM time to time, mankind is visited by a scourge in the shape of a disease. Now, the calamity will assume the shape of the plague; anon, it will crop out as yellow fever; then, Proteus-like, it will be transformed into cholera. Nor is it the material world alone that suffers from attacks of this description. The realms of art are also subject to fierce epidemics, and among the latter we will mention a complaint which may be termed "protonyctiasy," or, expressed in more homely language: "firstnightism," and which specially affects the lyric drama. It was first wafted to our shores from abroad, perhaps from the Continent, and presents several points of resemblance to bunkumitis, so universal, unfortunately, in America. Despite the attempts of all sensible persons to stamp it out, it has developed among us to an alarming extent. The symptoms are too well known to demand minute description here. A new opera is produced, after a preliminary flourish of mysterious paragraphs in various newspapers, and of flaming posters upon innumerable walls. The house is crowded by an audience mostly made up of the composer's friends and admirers—worthy members of society, gushing over with enthusiasm, but lamentably deficient in discrimination, or wilfully perverse in not making the slightest use of it. Scene after scene, and act after act is applauded, till the house rings again, and the glass-drops of the chandelier vibrate like so many aspen leaves. The singers are vociferously applauded, and summoned to the front, on every possible pretext; and occasionally, it would almost seem, on no pretext at all. To do them justice, they are by no means lax in obeying the summons. The members of the orchestra are applauded; the conductor is applauded, and honoured with a call; and the scene-painter is applauded and similarly distinguished. By-the-way, we may be permitted to observe, as a fact worthy of remark, that scenic artists, when responding to the flattering invitation of the public, frequently display a marked predilection for appearing in their working suits of coarse canvas, splashed all over with huge daubs of colour. This is, of course, because they are taken quite unawares. As their modesty never allows them to suppose they have done anything to deserve so high a compliment, their managers really ought to tell them to prepare themselves for such a contingency, by donning a costume more appropriate, in our opinion, to the occasion, though less like the garb of a house decorator and grainer on wood. As for the composer of the new opera, who shall describe the honours showered upon him! The calls before the curtain, the clapping of hands, the stamping of feet, the waving of handkerchiefs, and the flourishing of hats! But to study protonyctiasy in its greatest virulence, we must see it raging in an Italian theatre. There it is, indeed, something terrible.
The public behave, for the time, as though demented. Not only are all the symptoms we have mentioned, as marking the disease in London, to be found among the children of the Sunny South, but they are found there awfully intensified. To instance the recall symptom alone. The composer has to appear, not merely two or three, but from thirty to forty, times; and ingenious gentlemen, with a calculating twist of mind, have amused themselves by reckoning how far a composer walks, in one evening, when thus continually advancing from behind the first wing to the float, and back again. The distance might not appear much to Mr Weston or Mr Gale, and no doubt those gentlemen would, at the shortest notice, or at no notice at all, be prepared—if we may be allowed an expression more emphatic than refined—"to do that little lot on their head." Still, an ordinary pedestrian might well feel somewhat tired, and inclined to sit down, after traversing it. But, just as we may pluck the flower: safety, from the nettle: danger, the composer may, in ninety cases out of a hundred, console himself for his unwonted fatigue by the reflection that he will not be required to go through it a second time. Like the rivers of Southern Europe, the torrents of Southern enthusiasm, when swollen to the utmost, soon subside, and leave the poor composer high and dry in the midst of utter indifference, exactly as our usually more sober Thames carried a coal-barge, last winter, over the towing-path between Richmond and Isleworth, and deposited it in the midst of the Deer Park, never to be thence removed, save after being broken up.

But what we must particularly deplore, in connection with protonyctisy, are its after-effects, and notably the suspicion which follows in its train, as certainly as ankylosis follows rheumatic fever. We will give a case in point; and, indeed, it was this very case which suggested to us the foregoing medico-lyrical disquisition. To adopt the measure of time generally supposed to be patronised in all compacts by which Dr Faustus and other misguided beings have bound themselves, for a consideration, to the Evil One, about "a year and a day" have elapsed since Herr Ignaz Brüll first produced, at Vienna, an opera entitled Das goldene Kreuz. The accounts we received of it bore, as we thought, such signs of protonyctisy, that our suspicion was immediately aroused, and we put down the success achieved by the new work as a first-night triumph of the ordinary kind. But we were mistaken. Das goldene Kreuz had really hit the public extremely hard; it made its way through Germany, from town to town, and from capital to capital, with marvellous rapidity. The composer, a very young man, and, before then, utterly unknown, to the general public at least, suddenly found himself famous. He had flown in a month or two up to those giddy heights, and that allegorical temple, which others reach only after toiling for years along a rugged road strewn with all kinds of obstacles, and beset by every sort of pitfall and disappointment. There is nothing so successful as success. It is not surprising that managers should have been eager to secure Herr Brüll's services, or that Herr Brüll should have been perfectly willing to listen to the offers made him. The result is a fresh work from his pen. His second venture, Der Landfriede, an opera in three acts, was performed for the first time at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, on the 4th October; on the 18th of the same month, it was played at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin; and on the day following, the 19th, at the Theatre Royal, Munich, being received at all three with every mark of favour. Such a thing is almost unprecedented in the annals of the German lyric stage, and would seem to mark the inauguration of a railway system of success in these matters.

We heartily congratulate Herr Brüll, both for his sake and our own. The discovery of every new composer of merit is a public benefit. But there is an old saying: Chat échaudé craint l'eau froide. We may be over-sceptical, but from certain letters we have received, and from various criticisms we have perused, we fancy we can detect the presence of protonyctisy. We trust we are mistaken, and that Der Landfriede is all that Herr Ignaz Brüll's admirers represent it. We shall be among the first to rejoice at such a result. Meanwhile, in the interest of all concerned, we would venture to give the young composer, in perfect sincerity, a piece of advice: let him not be in too great a hurry to produce his third work. According to all we can gather, his second would have lost nothing by his spending a little more time on it. If it is true that,

"There is a tide in the affairs of man,

Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune," it is no less undeniable that, if we are in too great a hurry to seize the opportunity, we may slip into the stream and, like Piesco, when heading his conspiracy at Genoa, perish miserably, at the very instant our prospects are brightest.

DR HANS VON BÜLOW.

The fiery Doctor of the keys has confided another secret to our pleasant contemporary, the Figaro. Read "Cherubino":—

"Herr Dr von Bülow has written an article in the Leipziger Signale for next week on Herr Max Bruch's violin concerto, recently played at the Crystal Palace. Dr von Bülow's present opinion of it is that the concerto is a 'not transformable reformed fiddle mountain mouse.' From this I gather that he and I hold a very similar opinion concerning it, although, of course, Dr von Bülow expresses that opinion in more elegant language than I can hope to do. However, Dr von Bülow has at least the courage of his opinions, and in these days of milk and water, honest outspokenness is interesting, even when tinged with the eccentricity of genius."

Dr Hans von Bülow seems to take a pleasure in being chaffed by "Cherubino." He is in good hands, and we commend him to St Cecilia, when next he goes to Rome, and assists the Abbate Liast in kissing the toe of "Pio Nono."

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

A FEW weeks ago we quoted a paragraph from Land and Water which we inadvertently neglected to acknowledge. What will be thought of an American journal (The Wisconsin Appropriator), which absolutely transplants the paragraph from our columns without mentioning the name of the original thief! We live in a perplexed world.

"LE ROI EST MORT," ETC.—Two "Go's." At the Alhambra King Indi-go went so well as to be, now, King Indi-gone altogether; and in his place Madame An-got is started, an' go-ing all right.—Punch.

GUSTAVE DORÉ, who, besides being a great painter, is passionately fond of music, has purchased a villa in the neighbourhood of Paris. On the façade of the villa, the visitor perceives a peculiar inscription: the notes representing the words: "Do Re Si La Do Re." Translated into everyday French, this represents: "Domicile à Doré," or, into equally everyday English: "Doré's Domicile;" but it is impossible to render in the latter idiom the pun expressed in the artist's mother tongue.

THE London Musical World, an old-established paper, which combines the experience and calm of old age with the irrepressible vigor of youth, brings a controversy about the right way to say: "Music-critic," or "Musical critic." Let them come here, and the affair will be decided very soon. "Music-critic" is a man who criticises music; "Musical critic" is a critic who is musical. In England, where they don't admit that a man can be a "Music-critic" without being musical, they may fight about the expression; but here, where a man is a "Music-critic" by the simple fact that he writes about music, and mostly is not only not musical, but knows no more than any shoeblack about music, we would have to say: "Mr P. and Mr S. are 'Music-critics'; Mr H. and Mr E. are 'Musical critics.'"—New York Arcadian.

ONE day, as Mrs Mathews informs us, her husband and Incedon were travelling together on the top of a stage-coach, soon after the death of Incedon's first wife, to whom the singer had been devotedly attached. A very consumptive-looking man was also a passenger. Incedon's heart was touched by the poor fellow's sickly appearance, and he entered into conversation with him. He enquired after his companion's health, and learned that the object of his pity was going home to be nursed by his friends. When the coach stopped, Incedon, addressing the invalid for the last time, said: "My good man, we're going to leave you. It's my opinion, my poor fellow, that you're bespoken; you're now, I take it, as good as ready money to the undertaker, in fact, you're booked, so there's a seven-shilling-piece for you, and, when you go to heaven, and see my dear sainted Jane, pray tell her you met me, and that I'm well." The invalid stared, took the money with a humble bow, but made no reply to this extraordinary address, which he doubtless supposed to come from a lunatic.

KELLY, the well-known singer and composer, was celebrated for his "bulls." Looking through a hole in the curtain at Drury Lane Theatre one evening, he turned to the author of The School for Scandal, who happened to be standing near him, and said quite seriously: "Mr Sheridan, you can't stick a pin's head into any part of the house; it is literally choke full; but how much fuller will it be to-morrow night when the King comes?" On another occasion, as he and Mrs Crouch were performing together in Lodoiska, they were the victims of an accident which nearly proved fatal. As it was, Kelly was so much injured as to be obliged to lie up for some time. After his recovery, he met his gifted manager, whom he rather puzzled by suddenly asking: "Suppose, Mr Sheridan, I had been killed by the fall, who would have maintained me for the rest of my life?"

A FAIR and distinguished musician, M^{me}. Boiss, whose exquisite taste in art is well known to amateurs of curiosities, has just enriched the museum of the Paris Conservatory of Music with a charming Italian spinette. The instrument, in an admirable state of preservation, and ornamented with fleurs-de-lys, bears the date of 1564, and was given in 1575 by Henri III. of France to Baltasarini, better known as Beaujoyeux, a name he owed to his good spirits, and composer of the Ballet comique de la Reine. The spinette is the more interesting historically because it corroborates an assertion made some time since by M. Gustave Chouquet. That gentleman, in his Histoire de la Musique dramatique, cited an authority proving F. J. Fécis wrong in stating that Baltasarini did not visit France before 1577. As early as 1568, the musician was valet-de-chambre to Catherine di Medici, who soon afterwards created him intendant of her musical establishment. We now know that Beaujoyeux enjoyed the favour of Henri III., as well as that of the Queen Mother, and we must, perhaps, conclude, from the present made him by the French monarch, that he played not only the violin, but the harpsichord likewise.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

ON Saturday evening last another of the series of ballad concerts, under the direction of Mr W. Bevan, was given in the new and capacious Assembly-rooms of the Kilburn Town Hall, a building well calculated for music, the acoustics being all that could be desired. The programme was varied and satisfactory. The West London Orchestral Society, consisting of forty amateur players, well drilled and evidently up to their work, under the leadership of Mr W. R. Cave, gave Boieldieu's Overture to La Dame Blanche; the first movement of Mozart's Symphony in D; Hermann's Overture, Couronne d'Or; Mendelssohn's "Cornelius" March; and Gungl's brilliant set of waltzes, "Grafton-Berger," in a style creditable to all concerned. Miss Saidie Singleton, of the Royal Academy of Music, sang Randegger's "Peacefully slumber" (re-called) and Balfe's "I'm not in love, remember" (encored), to the evident delight of the audience. Miss Webster, a pupil of the London Academy of music, who possesses a fresh and charming soprano voice, sang Horn's "Cherry ripe," and songs by Taubert and Sullivan, in all of which she met with general approbation. Mr Steadman, the well-known tenor, gave "Tom Bowling" and "The Thorn" exceedingly well, and was loudly applauded, Signor Monari-Rocca singing, with more than usual effect, some popular buffo arias. Mr A. J. Barth played Pauer's pianoforte fantasia, "The Cascade," and also accompanied the vocal music. Mr W. Bevan has reason to congratulate himself on the success of these concerts.

PROVINCIAL.

MR C. HALLE AND MADAME NORMAN-NERUDA gave a pianoforte and violin recital in the concert-room, on Saturday, when there was a large and fashionable attendance. Mr Hallé played upon one of Messrs Broadwood & Sons grand concert pianofortes—a powerful instrument. The programme consisted of compositions of the greatest composers, and the artistic performances of Mr Hallé and M^{me} Neruda won enthusiastic appreciation. The recital was in every way successful.—Malvern News, Nov. 10.

MACFARREN'S LADY OF THE LAKE.

(From the programme of the Glasgow Choral Union.)

The cantata of The Lady of the Lake was composed, at the request of the Glasgow Musical Festival Executive Committee, expressly for performance at the opening of the New Halls in Glasgow. The Commission was proposed at the beginning of 1874; much time was spent in the selection of the subject, more in the adaptation of the poem to lyrical purposes, and the composition was completed in January, 1876, timely for the proposed Festival of that year.

OPERA IN FRANCE AND NORTH GERMANY.

Reminiscences of 1873.

By MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

The Opera-Comique, the handsome but ill-ventilated Salle-Favart, in the Place Boieldieu, has lately been giving Le Pré aux Clercs, the swan-song of the lamented composer, Hérold, who, within a few weeks of its original production, died in January, 1833, just when he was beginning to realize the expectations of his numerous friends, and the results of his own labours and aspirations. Notwithstanding a certain dryness which more or less characterizes all his compositions, and so detracts from their beauty, Le Pré aux Clercs is a very fine opera, well meriting adaptation and translation to our Italian stages; for the music attracts by its vigour and originality, whilst the story is interesting, and lends itself readily to those opportunities for spectacle which year by year appear to be more imperatively demanded by London audiences. The tenor air, "O ma tendre amie," in the first act, is charming; the duet, "Les rendez-vous de noble compagnie," of a breadth and brilliancy worthy of Rossini. The bravura, "Jours de mon enfance," as a combination of pure melody and florid difficulty, is unsurpassed. The trio, "C'en est fait," in the third act, is delicious. The performance on this occasion gained nothing from the cast, which was, on the whole, decidedly inferior, with the exception of the Mergy (Duchesne), and Isabelle (M^{me} Miolan-Carvalho). The latter incomparable artist is at present engaged here; and though now in the autumn, or, more correctly speaking, the Indian summer of her career, is singing with nearly all her former fluency, grace, and charm. Le Pré aux Clercs is now withdrawn to insure the proper preparation of Auber's L'Ambassadrice, which will be the next production. In the interim Richard Cœur de Lion, by Grétry, has been revived. The firm lines, intellectual forehead, and benevolent features depicted in the bust of Grétry, which stands in the foyer of the Opera-Comique, render it difficult to believe, what his biographers assure us, that whilst one of the most prolific composers—on one occasion he produced no less than five operas in a year—he was one of the most intolerant and egotistical of men, avoiding the society of his fellow-musicians, despising and denying their merits, living surrounded by a circle of sycophants, who believed in his music alone, to the exclusion of all other compositions. Yet he was the contemporary of such men as Cherubini and Gluck, Mozart and Beethoven. Of the sixty-seven operas which emanated from his pen, the majority are now forgotten, though a very few may now and then be heard. L'Epreuve Villageoise, a charming little operetta, was frequently given as a l'été de rideau in the late Théâtre-Lyrique, and Richard Cœur de Lion is from time to time heard. On its reproduction at this theatre in 1841, the instrumental score was revived and enriched by Adolphe Adam, and was included, as thus arranged, by Mr Mitchell, in his excellent series of French representations at the St James's Theatre, during the early months of 1850. Subjoined are the original and present casts :—

	1784.	1873.
Richard	Philippe	Duchesne.
Blondel	Clairval	Melchissidec.
Le Seneschal	Courcella	Nathan.
Florestein	Meunier	Bernard.
Williams	Narbonne	Neveu.
Antonio	Rosalie	Nordet.
Marguerite	Colombe	Thibault.
Laurette	Dugazon	Isaac.
Beatrice	Desforges	Rizzio.
Mathurin	—	Davoust.
Colette	—	Nadaud.
Mathurine	—	Decroix.

The plot turns upon the captivity of Richard in Austria, and his rescue by Blondel. Florestein, governor of the castle, is in love with Laurette, daughter of a valiant Crusader and Welsh knight, Sir Williams (!) whose achievements in Palestine did not prevent him from being outlawed on his return, and who has therefore conveniently taken up his residence in the neighbourhood of his sovereign's prison. Here also is staying a certain Marguerite, Comtesse de Flandre, who (Berengaria of Navarre having been apparently ignored by the librettist) is represented as the betrothed wife of the English king. Blondel, having discovered the object of his search, inveigles Florestein into a clandestine meeting with Laurette outside the castle walls, whereupon the latter is promptly arrested, the liberation of Richard as speedily effected, and, on the fall of the curtain, the various personages, including, of course, "Sir Williams," are all, like the good people in fairy tales, to live happily together ever after. There is also a pretty underplot relating to the golden wedding of an old village couple, and the betrothal of their grandchild, Colette, with Blondel's page, Antonio. As regards the music of this most interesting revival, the orchestral writing, even with the skilful augmentations of M. Adam, may sound thin and old-fashioned to the present generation, accustomed to the elaborate scoring and over-scoring of more recent composers; but, notwithstanding, the vitality of the old opera is wonderful, whilst its melodies are as genuine and fresh as if written yesterday. Respecting instrumentation, there is an interesting anecdote related by M. Fétis of Grétry. An argument having arisen one day in the saloon of the Opera-Comique, where many eminent musicians had met together, as to the instruments which produced the greatest effect in exciting the emotions of the audience, several opinions and theories were put forward. "And what," said the others to Grétry, "is yours?" "Gentlemen," was his answer, "I admire your sentiments, I respect your views, but I know a secret which surpasses them all." "And what, then?" "Truth!" And that this pertinent remark was exemplified in the music of Richard Cœur de Lion cannot be gainsaid. How thoroughly pastoral are the opening chorus, "Colette c'est demain," in the first act; the village fête and rustic dance to celebrate the re-marriage of old Mathurin, with the chanson, "Qu'en dites vous ma commère," in the last! How intensely dramatic Blondel's great air, "O Richard, O mon roi," and the famous duet, "Une fièvre brûlante," for Blondel and Richard! The storm of applause as distinguished from mere claque, which burst forth from every part of the theatre at the conclusion of these last two pieces, was pleasant to hear, and thoroughly deserved. Amongst the rest of the music may be mentioned the quartet, "Ah si c'était le gouverneur," the duet, "Un bandeau couvre les yeux," the air for Blondel, "Que le Sultan Saladin," in the first act; the spirited march which ushers in the second, followed by Richard's air, "Si l'univers entiers," and the trio, "Il faut," at the commencement of the third act. The effect of this revival upon the audiences of the Opera-Comique is indisputable, its success complete, and gratifying to witness, in spite of the melancholy reflection that, wide as has been the spread of musical erudition since the days of Grétry, the inborn gift of melody has increased in no commensurate degree. The majority of the characters in Richard Cœur de Lion are so many sketches filled with that perfection of ensemble found in this house, but calling for no particular remark, with the exception of old Mathurine, a little bit of character-acting, worked up by Mme Decroix with that skill which is so often found amongst the minor artists of French theatres; so rarely in our own. The interest centres in Richard and Blondel. The former was excellently done by Duchesne, a tenor possessing a far greater share of natural endowments than the majority of singers attached to the Opera-Comique; but, though a showy and painstaking artist, his voice sounds as if it had been prematurely forced, instead of properly developed, and his singing is marked by an occasional coarseness, which it can scarcely be hoped that he will now correct, seeing that, after having been several years on the stage, he exhibits exactly the same merits and demerits as at his first appearance. On the other hand, Blondel, originally written for a tenor, finds an admirable representative in Melchissidec, who further shows himself to be an excellent musician, judging by the manner in which he accompanied himself on the violin in "Que le Sultan," and "Une fièvre brûlante." Grétry is said to have sat up all night to compose the latter air, with what result its undiminished popularity is sufficient testimony. It is the keystone of the opera, recurring incessantly during the three acts, and may be considered typical of the all-pervading spirit of loyalty which distinguishes the character of Blondel.*

BENEDICT'S ST PETER IN EDINBURGH.

The music lovers of the Scottish capital continue to vex the soul of Professor Blackie. Unaffected by the reproaches of that redoubtable champion, who would alternate overtures and symphonies with reels and strathspeys, and follow "In questa tomba," with "Jock o' Hazeldean," they persist in cultivating foreign art to the exclusion of that which is national. Here is the Edinburgh Choral Union, for example, going on in its old way, as though the picturesque professor had never uplifted a warning voice, and with eloquent finger pointed out the proper course. No doubt this is provoking, but after all, and apart from any question of comparison, some non-Scottish music may be found worth hearing. So think the members of the Union aforesaid, and so think a goodly number of their musical friends and neighbours. Edinburgh, however, is not well provided with means and appliances for the highest manifestations of the "divine art." Like the much bigger and richer town of Glasgow, it has no resident orchestra, a distinction which, thanks to the German Charles Hallé, belongs to Manchester alone of all provincial places. The fact can never be mentioned without humiliation. Were these huge and wealthy towns of ours on the continent, each would have its band, to say nothing of its opera-house. But it is no use complaining, though doubtless the genuine amateurs of Glasgow and Edinburgh blush for shame when calling to mind that, despite abundant wealth and a population of three-quarters of a million or thereabouts, they cannot give a good orchestral concert without drawing the players from London. In another respect Edinburgh is badly off. To-day Glasgow will open its splendid new Music Hall, but the capital remains satisfied with the small and, for concert purposes, objectionable room in George Street. On the other hand, Edinburgh possesses a choral society of which a good deal might be made in course of time, and it is this association that chiefly upholds the cause of music here, by giving every winter a series of orchestral and choral concerts on a fairly efficient scale.

The first concert of the present season took place last night when Sir Julius Benedict's oratorio, St Peter, was performed. St Peter had been heard before by the same audience, and with emphatic approval, judging from the crowded state of the room at its second presentation. So much the better for the taste and judgment of Edinburgh amateurs, to whose decision all of us that recognize the abounding merit of the work may appeal from the cold neglect of the English metropolis. In London, St Peter seems to be forgotten, and is assuredly ignored. Nevertheless, it contains some of its composer's best music, and may, taken for all in all, claim to rank among the first art creations which the latter half of the nineteenth century has witnessed. About this no difference of opinion can arise where opinion is guided by true culture. The value of the oratorio would perhaps have been greater had not the veteran master shrunk from casting it in a purely dramatic mould; but no such consideration affects the worth of the music per se. In this respect, it may be asked with confidence where among modern productions do we find nobler ideas, a larger fund of melody, more graceful and delicate orchestration, or a plainer impression of a masterful hand? Edinburgh answered these questions indirectly, but with complete significance, last night, when the pick of its amateurs reheard the work with attention and manifest approval. The audience were not allowed to applaud by the rules of the body under whose auspices they had met; but there are better, because less conventional, methods of showing satisfaction than by clapping hands and encores. To these recourse was had, and the "sensation" which ran through the hall at the close of many of the numbers proved how thoroughly the music had been enjoyed. Here let me pay a deserved compliment to the conductor and members of the Choral Union. The music of St Peter is no child's play. It demands both fine voices and instruments, skill of the highest order, without a due need of which even a passable performance cannot be given. This consideration might, under all the circumstances of the case, have diverted the attention of the Choral Union to something less exacting. That it did not so, speaks as well for the courage of the members, as, on the whole, the performance spoke for their ability. But now for the performance itself.

If I have to point out more than one or two shortcomings in what was done last night, I hope no perversive Scot will attribute the fact to the prejudice or arrogance of a Southron. In the world of music we are all one nationality, and so closely bound up together, notwithstanding superficial divisions, that when one member rejoices, the others have cause to rejoice with him. In no spirit of captiousness, therefore, let me plainly indicate faults which here call for amendment. To begin with, the conductor—Mr Adam Hamilton—should master the important art of skilfully wielding the baton in recitative. The elaboration of modern recitative, and the prominence now given to the orchestra in it, casts a heavy responsibility upon conductors, who need for its due discharge the highest qualifications of their craft. Mr Hamilton appears scarcely alive to this fact, and some portions of St Peter were not consequently as well given as otherwise they would have been. Nor can I say that the orchestra, albeit made up of experienced players, was faultless. That the music lacked the familiarity of the Messiah or Elijah is true, but that is no excuse. Nothing, indeed, can palliate that carelessness too often obvious in the ranks of a professional orchestra, especially where the conductor inspires no fear—carelessness that last night found its highest illustration in the gambols of an instrument the performer upon which had missed an entire number. As regards the chorus, let me first of all give well-earned credit to the sopranos, whose energy and skill were beyond praise, never flagging in the discharge of their difficult task, and never straying from a path hard to follow. Their singing was a feature in the performance that none can recall without pleasure. Of the other vocal departments so much cannot be said. The altos were too weak for effect; the tenors lacked quality in a serious degree; while the basses were rough, and wanted precision and decision. Moreover, the chorus, as a whole, lacked finish. Its observance of light and shade left much to desire. Some of the subtler evidences of good training were entirely absent. In pointing this out, however, I do not forget that the season is only just beginning, and that better results will assuredly be apparent later on. The soloists were Madame Nouver, Madame Enriquez, Mr Cummings, and Mr Wadmore, of whom the gentleman carried off chief honours. Mr Cummings puts upon everything he takes in hand the mark of a refined and accomplished musician, and his singing was throughout noticeable for purity of taste in union with well-considered expression. Nothing could have been better than his delivery of the various recitatives and airs, especially of "The Lord is very pitiful," a masterpiece of tender and touching effect. Mr Wadmore fairly made his mark in the music of the Apostle, which he sang with a quality of voice together with an intelligence and feeling suggestive of high hopes for his future career. Madame Nouver was scarcely at home with the exacting airs she had to sing; but Madame Enriquez made a genuine impression in "O Thou afflicted." There only remains to add that the oratorio, some portions being omitted, was heard to the end by most of the audience, who thus gave themselves an opportunity of appreciating the masterly final chorus.—D. T.

STANBRIDGE EAST.—The News and Frontier Advocate of St John's (Quebec) has, in its issue of October 26th, an account of a concert given by Herr and Mdme Bohrer, both well-known members of musical families, the lady (formerly Miss Chatterton) being a harpist of more than ordinary ability. On the occasion under notice she played Godefrid's "Danse des Sylphes" and Frederic Chatterton's variations on The Carnival of Venice, and, with her husband, a grand duet on Irish airs by Oberthur. "The duet," writes the News, "evidently produced a marked effect on the audience, who had hitherto been somewhat cold and undemonstrative, notwithstanding the efforts of the artists, which would have roused many a critical assemblage. Herr Bohrer's playing was excellent, from the Sonate Pathetique of Beethoven down to a valse by Chopin. Miss Lizzie Scott was the vocalist."

MACFARREN'S LADY OF THE LAKE.

(From the "Sunday Times.")

Coming to the subject in hand, we must approach the Lady of the Lake with all the diffidence which an imperfect acquaintance with the matter induces. One hardly would like to criticise a picture from viewing a steel engraving of it, and a scarcely accurate idea of a work for instruments and voices in concert is to be obtained from perusing a pianoforte score. Inasmuch, however, as this is the only clue we have to the structure of the work, it must, for the present, suffice for our guide, rendering us able to give an opinion of the cantata in its principal features, whilst we must necessarily reserve all speculation as to the probable effectiveness of the musical illustration when the all-important element of the instruments appears in connection with it. Mdme Nathalie Macfarren has prepared the book, which is almost a literal transcription from Scott, save where the narrative is made impersonal, or here and there a verb altered to suit the purposes of dramatic characterisation. The task has been deftly and skilfully accomplished, save in one instance, which certainly cannot escape observation. Had the original poem run in the way in which it now appears, Mdme Macfarren, would, we think, have been justified in altering it, as the episode to which we allude is obviously a glaring mistake. We refer to the situation where Fitz-James receives the hospitality of Roderick Dhu—not knowing, of course, under whose roof he is resting. Almost every one knows the lines spoken by Fitz-James:—

"I take thy courtesy, by heaven,
As free as 'tis nobly given!"

Then the poet, to show the true, innate courage of both these men—foes on account of their race, and bitter enemies on account of the feud supposed to be raging between them—makes them "lie peaceful down, like brothers tired," side by side, and sleep till morning, without a thought of treachery or foul play. But it is quite another thing to make both these men boast of this very qualification of bravery (which according to the narrative, they should possess unconsciously), and indulge in a long duet of the lullaby type. It is utterly unlike—not Fitz-James and Roderick Dhu—but two tired men, to sing themselves off to sleep. What the obvious intention of the poet was, is the portrayal of Fitz-James, accepting the situation as it offers, and throwing himself down at once upon the rude couch spread for his slumbers. Dr Macfarren would do well to think over this number, and give to the chorus the narration which now fits so awkwardly the mouths of the two chief persons of the tale. The score contains twenty-four numbers, and the dramatis persone are as follows:—Ellen, the Lady of the Lake, soprano; Malcolm Græme, and Blanche of Devan, contralto; James Fitz-James, the Knight of Snowdoun, tenor; Roderick Dhu, baritone; James, Earl of Douglas, and John of Brent, an English yeoman, bass. There is no overture, its place being taken by a preludary chorus, or "Foresong," as it is termed,—"Harp of the North"—a very charming and flowing melody, albeit the first phrase recalls a snatch of one of the best known of Mendelssohn's Leider ohne Worte. The "local colour" or imitation of the Scotch method is not so apparent here as in the main body of the work, where the peculiarity of the imperfect scale affords abundance of scope for the composer's ingenuity. Both verses of the "fore-song" are mainly identical, though the accompaniment differs in each. It is written in E flat, and has for the second-subject a bold and striking transition into the key of G flat, whence the return to the original tune is most skilfully contrived. Very charming is this number, full of the glamour which the words so ably express. Thus the work starts under the most favourable auspices. No. 2 is a chorus, "The morning sun his beacon red had kindled on the mountain head," in 9-8 rhythm, which has a clever point of imitation at the words, "The deep-mouth'd bloodhound's heavy bay." The introduction of the horn phrase, alluded to in the verses, also is unconventional. The couplet,—

"And when the Brig of Turk was won,
The headmost horseman rode alone—" is given to the chorus in recitative, and then follows immediately the duet for Ellen and Fitz-James, dealing with their first meeting. The opening phrase of this—or rather the symphony—ought to be attentively noted, as this afterwards plays an important part, slightly modified, as one of the principal leit-motives which are to be found in the cantata. After the first part, partaking of a colloquial nature, a change is made at the words, "Silently, silently glides the bark," a pretty though not ambitious movement in 6-8; and the whole concludes with an allegro brillante in the initial key (E major), where Ellen bids Fitz-James enter the enchanted halls. Now follows (No. 4) the chorus, "Soldier, rest," an andante tran- quillo, in A flat, 6-8, to which succeeds a scene for Fitz-James, of a highly dramatic nature, the key note struck in the opening lines,—"In broken dreams the pictures rise of varied peril and surprise." This gives Dr. Macfarren plenty of chance for the introduction of the leading-motives of the foregoing movements, not of the duet only, and for some melodramatic declamation, which savours a little of the incantation scene in Der Freischütz. The restlessness of the dialogue is, however, relieved by a melodious andante soave, in A, 6-8, "The wild rose, elegantine and broom," which gives place again to impassioned utterances, till Fitz-James is supposed to awake, and "his midnight orisons said o'er," turns to rest, and banishes bad dreams. Now comes a very excellently written four-part song, for first and second sopranos and first and second contraltos, "Not faster yonder rowers might," in B flat, 3-4, destined, or we mistake very greatly, to be one of the most popular numbers of the work. No. 7 is a scene for Ellen, in which the duet-motive appears again; after the introductory recitative, "I am anxious for him still," &c., comes a pleasing ballad in D major, 2-4, "For me whose mercy scarce conveys," which gives way to an allegro agitato in the tonal minor, in which Ellen expresses her determination not to wed Roderick, and the principal feature in which is the reiterated syncopation of the rhythm. A brilliant peroration in the major passes for an effective climax, the entire score being of sustained dramatic quality. The boat song, No. 8, "Hail to the chief," is written in E minor, with plentiful use of the Scotch idiom. A short solo is here introduced for Roderick. The whole number will probably be found extremely interesting and effective in performance. No. 9, a trio for Ellen, Malcolm and Douglas, is didactic, and might drop out of the narrative altogether, for all the assistance which it gives the action; per se it is very agreeable, however, and as concerted music is generally more acceptable than solos, it will doubtless have its due weight. In the following section, we find Roderick's proposal for Ellen's hand refused, and hear of the manner in which he is dared to fight by the courageous young Grame. A very marked rhythm pervades this number, which opens with a quartet, and winds up with a duo, or rather dialogue, between Malcolm and Roderick. Here what may be called the "Roderick" motive is plentifully employed.

In No. 11, Roderick declaims the anathema:—

"Woe to the clansman who shall view
This symbol of sepulchral yew,
Forgetful that its branches grew
Where weep the heroes their holiest dew."

The occasion, as all may know, is the sending abroad of the cross of fire to summon the clan McAlpine. The chorus is also employed here, and again in the prophecy which the banshee is supposed to utter—"Who spills the foremost foeman's life, that partly conquers in the strife." Dr. Macfarren has overcome the difficulty, or rather the incongruity of a body of various voices singing a phrase supposed to be uttered by one, by making the choristers sing in unison; but even then this device is open to question, especially when any attempt to realism is made. A few explanatory bars for chorus and Roderick (No. 12) now ushers in Ellen's well known prayer "Ave Maria! maiden mild," the setting of which must inevitably suffer by comparison with Schubert's, though the composer has admirably caught the spirit of the theme. The chorus next describes Roderick's assembly of his clansmen, and with their welcome of their chieftain the first part comes to a termination. The alla marcia is a spirited movement, and the chorus is employed with excellent antiphonal effect; we might wish, however, that something bigger had been done with the welcome of the chieftain by his warriors.

(To be continued.)

VIENNA.—It has not yet been decided who is to be Herbeck's successor at the Society of the Friends of Music, but it will, in all probability, be Herr Helmesberger, who has, by-the-by, been temporarily entrusted with the direction of the rehearsals and concerts. It is also likely that the same gentleman will be promoted to the position of first Court Chapelmaster, and that his own place of second Court Chapelmaster will be conferred on Herr Pius Richter. Another aspirant for the vacant post is said to be Herr Dessoff. The members of the Singakademie gave a performance on the 6th inst., in the large hall of the Academical Gymnasium, to commemorate the thirtieth anniversary of Mendelssohn's death. The programme comprised two eight-part songs, "Weihnachten" and "Am Neujahrstage;" an address by Dr H. Wörz; "Nachtlied," Mendelssohn's last composition; "Rondo Capriccioso in E for pianoforte;" Air from St Paul, "Gott sei mir gnädig;" Sonata in D major for Pianoforte and Violoncello; and three movements from the cantata, Aus tiefer Noth,

A TIETJENS MEMORIAL.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

In due course, no doubt, the cemetery at Kensal Green will add to its historic monuments one in remembrance of the great artist who recently passed from amongst us. But the amateur of the future, who desires to look upon a Tietjens memorial, should not be compelled to go to a place of graves. He should find it in the living and active world where Tietjens herself played so great a part, and amid the scenes in which she was so conspicuous a figure. We are happy to know that some of those who admired the artist in life share our impression as to the most fitting tribute now that she is dead, and that it is proposed to raise funds by subscription for a bust of Tietjens, to be placed in the vestibule of Her Majesty's Theatre. To this end, a committee will probably soon be formed, and contributions invited. Meanwhile, the propriety of the step, and of the particular manner in which it is suggested to be carried out, can hardly fail of general approval. All who have been in sympathy with the career of the regretted artist, all to whom she has ministered in the exercise of her vocation, all who knew the amiability of her personal character, especially her readiness to help in every good work, and all who now lament her death, will give some measure of assistance towards a permanent and tangible memorial of her greatness. She could raise none for herself, because the creations of the vocalist, unlike those of the poet, painter, or sculptor, "melt into thin air" as rapidly as they are poured forth. Her "counterfeit presentment" in marble would be a centre for pleasant memories to gather round years hence, and what place so fitted for it as the house where she began and ended her English career? Should the pedestal bear the inscription "Valentine, 1858; Lucrezia, 1877," recollection now, and history hereafter, will fill up the interval with a list of triumphs more than sufficient to justify the highest manifestation of the feeling which finds expression in "storied urn and animated bust."

THE WINTER SEASON AT WIESBADEN.

(From a Nassau Correspondent).

Wiesbaden, the Queen of German Spas, situated about 2½ miles from the Rhine, build in a high romantic and beautiful valley, enjoyed even amongst the Romans a great fame for its hot springs and their beneficial healing powers. The town itself formerly the residence of the Duke of Nassau, now the seat of the prussian government for the province of Hesse-Nassau, counts according to the last census a population of about 49000 souls. In this number is included a colony of english families, who are staying here all the year round numbering about 900 persons. The influx of strangers, visitors and pleasure seekers is pretty considerable and amounts according to government statistics from 56 to 72000 annually, comprising some of the highest aristocracy not forgetting some of the best english society. Owing to its mild climate, Wiesbaden, is not undeserving known, on the continent, as: "the German Nice" in consequence of which, it is much frequented by invalids. The german emperor even, has for years deigned to stay amongst us for some weeks each year.

His imperial highness the Crownprince and princess of Prussia and Germany with family have only arrived a few days ago with the intention of dwelling at Wiesbaden during the winter. Princess Louise of Prussia, the Langrave of Hesse with suit and other notabilities, have reached this town as well. Wiesbaden is getting more and more an abode of luxury and pleasure. Everything is being done to entertain and amuse the distinguished visitors. Trade and industry are of course very limited at Wiesbaden. There is certainly some commerce in wine, the town being near and in close connection with the Rhinegau.

Entertainments take place in particular at the Cursaal and at the Theatre Royal. At the former place of amusement concerts are the order of the day, some of the most celebrated artists cooperating. On the whole, Wiesbaden furnishes in regard of music the greatest and newest works; I shall report of this more explicitly, in my next. To change the matter of entertainment, sometimes discourses are held by learned men, concerning the newest scientific and artistic matters. The band of the Cursaal is paid by the municipality and is lead under the splendid conduction of the able leader, Mr Lüstner, a gentlemen, who by the bye observed is a violinist of considerable fame. The musical programm, contains the newest pieces and Wiesbaden may congratulate itself in having such an able man at the head of the orchestra. The theatre, a government institution under direct patronage of the German emperor, who annually contributes no trivial sum for its maintenance, is celebrated for its splendid operas. The orchestra upheld by government, consisting of about 70 members, is very ably conducted by the excellent leader, Mr William John, to whose exertions it is due, that the band in question is considered one of the very best in the whole of Germany. This is saying a good deal, for, Germany is the home of all music. By such splendid musical leadership, it is unnecessary to mention that the operatic company is equally excellent. Amongst the songstress deserves to be mentioned before all others, the Prima Donna Miss Rolandt a young lady not 18 years old, a novice who has only took to the stage a few months ago. Miss Rolandt possessing extraordinary musical talents, has a very sympathetic sweet voice of eminent method. She sings nearly 3 octaves with the greatest facility, and brilliancy never singing false. There is no doubt that this young lady will astonish the world ere long. She could even now sing in London with the greatest success, its dramatic songstress, Missis Kebizeck-Löffler, is engaged, this lady is very good in singing Wagner operas having a very good voice.

Miss Pessiak, Miss Muzell and Miss Nesch represent the other principal female singers. The first lady sings pretty well, has a splendid figure and is a splendid appearance on the stage she is a scholar of the celebrated Italian Professor Lamberti. Miss Muzell a lady of some note sings the parts of lighter music, whilst Miss Nesch sings alt and is very excellent. Of singer we will not omit to mention the two tenor Mr Ledérer and Peschiér. The Bariton Philippi indeed a very great artist. Mr Fiehr the Bassist, who sung the roll of Hagen at the Bayreuth festival plays. The choirs are excellent. For the culture of song different societies are uniting at Wiesbaden, particular mention deserves the great Oratorio called Cäcilien Verein conductor Mr Charles d'Estér. Chamber-music, is equally cultivated. Messrs Kebicek, Müller, Knotte and Hertel are arranging quartets very often and it must be said that the marvellous execution is admired very much, and great frequent prevailing its principally such families do reside at Wiesbaden, who have retired from business having formerly lived in great towns, it is evident that the residents have great pretensions and that but first class executions are valued, accordingly but first class performances are given.

During the season the most distinguished artist appear before the public. Not merely stars of this country but artist from all countries, England not having failed in sending its contingent; for instance Madame Arabella Goddard, Madame Lemmens Sherrington, Signor Piatti, Mr Oberthür and others to numerous to mention, have cooperated in concerts at the Cursaal. If reports speak true, even the world renowned Sims Reeves will sing this winter at Wiesbaden.

Wiesbaden Novemb. 1877.

BEAUTIFUL BREEZES.*

PART-SONG.

Beautiful breezes! spirits of air! Hov'ring around us, gentle and fair; Roving like fairies from shore unto shore, [them o'er; Scatt'ring the vapours that clouded Wafting contentment wherever ye go, Fanning the brow that is aching with woe, Chasing the spirit of sickness away, Changing the night of Despair into day. In at each casement, like angels, ye fly, Kissing the cheeks of the babes as they lie; • Copyright.	Whisp'ring sweet dreams in each fair sleeper's ear, Visions of hope, that dispel ev'ry fear. Thence o'er the ocean, all laden with balm, [in the calm; To free the frail barque that lies dead Upwards to heaven then softly ye rise, Quickly before you the dark storm- cloud flies. Beautiful breezes! roam thro' the world, [furred, Whilst ev'ry banner of Freedom, un- flutters before you all trembling with glee, [free. LEWIS NOVEA.

Twenty-five manuscripts had been sent in by the 31st October, the last day that any work could be received, for the prize of 10,000 francs offered by the City of Paris for the best musical composition, to be publicly performed in the Palace of the Trocadéro during the Universal Exposition of 1878. The judging-committee consists of twenty members, ten being elected by the Municipality and ten by the competitors. The first ten are MM. Ambroise Thomas, François Bazin, Hérold, Emile Perrin, Vaucorbeil, Ortolan, Gastinel, Cherouvrier, Banderali, and Le Roux. The members selected by the competitors are MM. Gounod, Massenet, Guiraud, Colonne, Franck, Léo Delibes, Saint-Saëns, Boulanger, Guilman, and Lenepeveu,

THE DANISCHEFFS.

(From the Liverpool "Porcupine.")

This drama deals with Russian social life, and is written by a Russian gentleman in collaboration with M. Dumas fils. The adapter has had a double difficulty to deal with; he has had not only to present in an English form the strange forms of Russian life, but he has had to contend with the double refraction arising from the use of M. Dumas' spectacles in the observation of little-known and half-civilized Russian society. The cardinal point in the drama, upon which the action turns, is the relations that exist between Osip and Anna. United by a forced marriage, by the unexampled generosity of Osip in favour of his master, Count Vladimir, who loves and is beloved by Anna, that marriage remains a mere ceremony; actuated by nobler motives than those of Shakspeare's hero, Osip acts to Anna as Bertram to Helena. There is, however, no moderation in the generosity of Osip. He is all goodness, all self-denial, all self-abasement—very fine qualities in their way, but not natural in such excess. Granting the possibility of his acting so nobly towards the woman he loves, but by whom he is not loved, we think it an unnecessary gilding of gold to make him refrain from all attempts to gain that love; the degrading proposition that his wife should be the paramour of Count Vladimir is accepted humbly by him and submitted to her by his own lips—of course, to be indignantly refused by Anna; but the mere mention of such a thing should not be heard in a high-class drama. There is too great a want of restraint shown in heaping up the measure of Osip's devotedness to an absurd extent; the sublime finally merges into the ridiculous when this victim of circumstances asks forgiveness of the proud Countess, the origin of all the troubles and distress of the piece. This indeed is too much. Certain scenes and characters descriptive of Russian daily life are marked by a fault which, we suppose, must be inevitable in such cases; they partake of the unspeakable dullness and stupidity which they describe. There is a mysterious personage, one Zakaroff, a publican, who deals in bribery, gives away a trifle of 100,000 roubles, which he appears to carry in his coat-tails as petty cash, and in other respects supplies local colour to the piece; an object which is likewise served by the cigarette-smoking of the Princess Lydia, by the presence of Lindver, who does nothing but play the piano, by Princess Borio, who is sleepy and forgetful, and by Dr Koureff, who is sleeping and—sleeps. One feature alone was lacking to the dull, depressing picture of Russian society—the everlasting card-table.

WAIFS.

The Théâtre des Variétés, Montpellier, is burnt to the ground.

M. Faure has been singing with his usual success at the Hague.

Mad. Christine Nilsson has met with an enthusiastic reception at Moscow in Mignon and Faust.

The Russian composer, Tchaikowski, is engaged on a grand opera, with a libretto founded on Pouschkin's Eugene Onegin.

An American musical association, called the Mendelssohn Quintet Club, have made a successful concert-tour through Canada.

M. Alphonse Leduc, well known for his cheap bijou editions of operatic scores, has been nominated an "Officier d'Académie."

Mr Theodore Thomas's series of Orchestral Concerts in Music Hall, Boston (U.S.), was announced to commence on the 14th inst.

Dr Ferdinand Hiller has completed a new oratorio. The eminent composer has been nominated socio illustre of the St Cecilia at Rome.

Herr Hellmesberger will probably succeed Herr Herbeck as conductor of the concerts given by the Society of the Friends of Music, Vienna.

M. Albert Millaud, member of the Paris press, author of the librettos of Madame l'Archiduc and Le Péché Véniel, is made knight of the Legion of Honour.

"Cherubino," in the Figaro, states that Mad. Arabella Goddard is engaged by Mr John Boosey for the Thirteen London Ballad Concerts after Christmas.

A man never realizes the value of a breath, says the Boston Courier (U.S.), until he finds himself unable to whistle after running a block or two to catch a horse-car.

Thirty years elapsed on the 4th inst. since the death of Felix Mendelssohn. On the 1st January next, the copyright of his works expires in Germany, and any one will be at liberty to publish them.

A third supplement to M. Félix Clément's Dictionnaire lyrique has recently been published. It contains a list of operas produced in France during the last three years, with analyses. [Better than the others?—D. P.]

They have found an honest politician in Georgia (U.S.), and propose to blow him up with dynamite, so as to give all the States of the Union a piece each.

M. Lemmens is expected in Paris, where he intends giving a course of instruction on the organ. He also proposes introducing several of his own works to the Parisians as well as a new method of accompaniment for plain-song.

M. Victor Schoelcher has made a second present to the library of the Paris Conservatory. It includes a large number of old English art-journals, with other works equally valuable, among them being Mattheson's Grundlage einer Ehrenpforte.

The Joublochkoff electric light resembles the moon, and there is no smoke or heat from it. "When our theatres are lighted by it," observes the Boston Courier (U.S.) "the young men will have no excuse for going out frequently to get a breath of fresh air."

M. Vergnet, who now sustains the part first played by M. Salomon in Le Roi de Lahore at the Grand Opera, Paris, has signed a fresh engagement for two years with M. Halanzier, at a salary of 36,000 francs for the first year, and 40,000 for the second.

Mlle Caroline Salla replaced Mlle Parodi, as the Countess, in Le Nozze di Figaro, on Thursday night. Mlle Marie Marimon has been added to the company at Her Majesty's Theatre, and will, it is expected, make her appearance on Thursday, in the Sonnambula.

M. Léo Delibes has returned to Paris. He will re-visit Vienna to superintend the production of his new work, Jean de Nivelle, which Herr Jauner is desirous of having performed at the Imperial Opera-house in the above capital at the same time that it is played in Paris.

On Thursday evening there was a "recital" by Dr. Spark, of Leeds, on the large organ erected in the City Temple. Among other pieces, he introduced his "Concertstück," composed for and played by him at the Leeds Festival. Dr. Spark intends also to play his "Concertstück" at the Bow and Bromley Institute this evening.

The Committee of Musical Auditions at the Paris Universal Exposition is divided into six Sub-Committees, namely of: 1. Administration and Finances; 2. Free Societies, French and foreign; 3. Organ; 4. Chamber Music; 5. Orpheons; and 6. Picturesque Music. Under the last head is included the music of Eastern nations, gypsies, and so on.

At a meeting of the governors of the Royal Dramatic College, at the Adelphi Theatre on Wednesday, the 7th inst., Lord Wm. Lennox in the chair, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—"That as it is impossible to keep up the Royal Dramatic College and provide for its inmates, through want of sufficient support, there being at this moment no funds for the current expenses except by selling out the remaining sum of £1,000 in the New Three per Cents., the council do forthwith take such steps as the Charity Commissioners may advise to dispose of the property and to provide for the inmates."

The winter season of Italian opera began at Her Majesty's Theatre with a performance of Il Trovatore, under conditions such as fairly encouraged a hope of success for the enterprise. Mr Mapleson has completely adapted the interior to his new requirements. Having to depend upon the mass of the public rather than upon the aristocratic few, he has made a "pit" by abolishing half the stalls, while the boxes in the grand and first tiers, save a few on each side, have been swept away. The aspect of the house does not, of course, gain by changes like these; but that matters little so long as the humbler lovers of opera are accommodated and content with what is done for them. As regards the stage, it would be absurd to look for the completeness which is a sine quâ non during the regular season. Italian opera is an expensive article, and cheapness can only be gained by a corresponding sacrifice of quality. But if among Mr Mapleson's winter company we find none of the stars that blaze in summer, if his orchestra be fewer in number, and his chorus less strong, it does not at all follow that the performances must be inefficient. Instead of this, it is likely that Mr Mapleson will give his supporters a series of representations valuable on account of all-round merit. He has a good working company, and the orchestra and chorus are equal to their duties, while in Signor Li Caisi he possesses a conductor thoroughly experienced and capable. Assuming that the public, as distinct from the ordinary opera-going classes, really appreciate lyric drama, there is no reason to anticipate anything but success for Mr Mapleson's "experiment."—Daily Telegraph.

BERLIN.—A special morning concert was given on the 4th inst., the anniversary of Mendelssohn's death, by Stern's Gesangverein, under the direction of Professor J. Stockhausen, in the Singakademie. The programme was furnished conjointly by Mendelssohn and Mozart. The principal compositions were the 114th Psalm, for eight-part chorus and orchestra, Mendelssohn; "Sprüche zu Kirchenfesten", Mendelssohn; and Requiem, Mozart. The Berliner Sinfonie-Capelle, headed by Herr Badecke, as conductor, contributed materially to the success of the matinée. There have been numerous other concerts recently. Among the most important may be mentioned the Monday Concerts of Herren W. Hellmich and L. Nicodé, which were inaugurated on the 5th inst. in the Singakademie; the concert of Mad. Clara Schumann and Mad. Joachim, the two ladies being assisted by Herren Joachim and Hansmann; the concert given by Schnöppf's Vocal Association to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation by a grand performance of Handel's Messiah according to the Mozart-score; and Herr B. Bilse's Symphonie Concert, at which two novelties were produced—a "Concert-Allegro, for Violoncello," composed by Davidoff, and played by Herr Louis Lübeck, and a Serenade in F major, by Herr Ignaz Brüll. The last work, consisting of six movements, Allegro, Intermezzo, Scherzo, Andante, Intermezzo, and Finale, made a highly favourable impression, and was greatly applauded.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 873 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. OPERA IN FRANCE AND NORTH GERMANY.

Reminiscences of 1873.

BY MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

CHAPTER I.

The two classes of grand and comic opera at Brussels are united in one home, the Théâtre de la Monnaie, a house corresponding in size as nearly as possible to our Drury Lane Theatre. The decorations, which are distinguished by a profusion of gilding in every part, are rich, but decidedly heavy, and the introduction of satin damask on the elaborately moulded box-panels of the five tiers of open galleries has a most tasteless effect. The interior, however, is luxurious and comfortable in all its arrangements. Those behind the curtain, on the other hand, are anything but satisfactory. The operas of Faust and Les Huguenots will afford a fair specimen of the talents of the company employed in the more important works of the repertory, and which includes as tenors Leroy and Warot; basses and barytones, Bœquie, Rondil, Echetto; soprani, Mesdames Gannetti, Mezeray, Hamackers, and Marie Battu. Mme Marie Battu, who was formerly attached to the Grand Opera in Paris, and to our Covent Garden, may be remembered as a useful and meritorious artiste of the second rank, painstaking and correct in all she attempted, but not interesting. Since her engagement at Brussels Mme Battu has filled the post of prima donna assoluta, and has a great reputation here, but her voice is now much worn, nor has she any particular dramatic ability to compensate for the fatigued condition of her vocal powers. Any one who remembers the Grand Opera some twelve years back will recognize the name of Mdle Hamackers, who in such parts as the Princess, in Robert le Diable; Urbain, in Les Huguenots; the Page, in Le Comte Ory; and Jemmy, in Guillaume Tell, charmed alike by the freshness of her voice and the striking beauty of her face and figure. During the somewhat long interval, time has wrought little change in the personal charms of Mdle Hamackers, whilst it has apparently improved her singing, which is now highly finished, and her performance of Marguerite di Valois would have proved thoroughly satisfactory in any theatre. Mme. Gannetti, the heroine of Gounod's Faust, has true sentiment, and a good method, but is wholly without the power requisite for so large an arena. Of the men, Bœquie has a good voice, and promises well. Rondil and Echetto are respectable—nothing more. Leroy, a young tenor from the Opéra-Comique in Paris is a good singer in light music, but was quite overweighted in the part of Faust. The only member of the troupe with any real pretensions to high excellence is Warot, the representative of Raoul, in Les Huguenots, whose voice is a tenor, pure, sweet, and coming entirely from the chest. Although occasionally given to altering the text of his music, by the substitution of florid embellishments, neither opportune nor in good taste, Warot is an admirable singer and actor, appearing, indeed, a very "Triton amongst minnows" in surroundings of such mediocrity. As for the comic opera here, it is apparently in even a worse plight. Fra Diavolo, provided the rendering be only respectable, is one of those operas which can scarcely help, so to speak, playing themselves, so exquisite is the orchestration, so irresistibly catching are the melodies. But if it were possible for the opera to sound tedious and heavy, the possibility was certainly achieved on this occasion. The Zerlina (Mdle Mezeray) and Pamela (Mdle Aurélie) looked well and acted with spirit, but sang persistently out of tune. The part of Fra Diavolo was well played by Leroy, who, if occasionally given to exaggeration, has at least learnt to sing, and in the lighter music of Auber's captivating opera found a rôle more suited to his means than Faust, appearing to great advantage in the long scena "J'ai révue mes amis," at the commencement of the third act, in which, and in the following rondo, "Il faut nous hâter," his employment of the falsetto, if scarcely legitimate, was at any rate most skilful, and in its effect perfectly charming. The representatives of the other characters were beneath mediocrity, nor would they require notice, but that the singers should be so imperfect in their text as to come to a dead stop, and then take up the music, as best they might, some bars further on; and that such incompetence could actually be tolerated without openly expressed condemnation by the audience, is proof of what the habitudes are accustomed to put up with, and of the state of musical disorganization to which the theatre has been reduced since the time, in 1845, when its company of that day migrated to the old Covent Garden, and by their performance of Les Huguenots, and other masterpieces of the great French school, foreshadowed as it were the lasting popularity which these works achieved on the subsequent foundation of the Royal Italian Opera, as well as amply vindicated the merits of the Brussels Opera in England. The orchestra, though numerous, is sadly deficient as regards many of the leading instruments, and very coarse in its accompaniments. The male voices of the chorus are excellent; indeed the soldiers' chorus in Faust, the "Rataplan" in the Huguenots, were among the few good items in the execution of those operas, but the other branch of this department is very weak. The scenery and dresses were of the shabbiest description; in fact the entire stage appointments of the Théâtre de la Monnaie have a third-rate provincial air, which it is surprising and disappointing to find in the leading musical establishment of so rich and prosperous a country as Belgium. Infinitely more interesting is the clever little company of the Fantaisies-Parisiennes, comprising MM. Mario-Widmer, Jolly, Charlier, Mesdames Luigini, Desclawias, Delorme, who, having returned for the winter to the Alcazar, are giving Adolphe Adam's pretty operetta La Poupée de Nuremberg and Le Roi d'Yvetot (a new and amusing opera-bouffe, for which a young composer named Vasseur has written the music), with all that spirit and perfection of ensemble which rendered their efforts so popular in London during the late summer. There is, indeed, a care and sense of completeness in their performance which may be looked for in vain at the theatre of greater pretensions.

(To be continued.)

SONNET.

TO MILA RODANI.

Nay, not the nightingale, whose flood of song,
Thrilling the summer-silence of the night,
Awakens in a passion of delight
The Eastern Rose to listen all night long—Nay, not this nightingale that sings among
The roses of the valley, was the bright
Rare bird, gold-plumed, whose utmost-faring flight
Led for a space amid our singing throng.

Nay: but a linnet whose notes, silver-clear,
Heard in the North when winter is outspent,
Wakens the violet, she came nigh and lent
The loveliest melody the spring woodlands hear.
A bird whose notes are gracious to the ear
As to a soul a breath of violets' scent.

Belfast, Nov. 26, 1877.

F. F. M.

HAMBURG.—Herr Diener met with an enthusiastic reception at the Stadttheater as Eleazar in Halévy's opera of La Juive, the members of the orchestra being called on by the audience to play several "flourishes" in his honour. He was well supported by Mesdames Robbinssohn and Peschka-Leutner.

MILAN.

(From a Correspondent.)

Mad. Adelina Patti is more popular than ever, and the first four, and "only," performances at the Scala have been supplemented by as many more. Some of the fair and gifted artist's admirers gave her a serenade before the Hotel Cavour, in the Piazza of the same name.—Sig. Ponchielli's new three-act opera, Lina, has been produced with success at the Teatro dal Verme, the composer being called on thirty-four times the first night—twenty-seven times during the performance, and seven after the fall of the curtain. The principal characters were confided to Signore Brambilla-Ponchielli, Riccardi, Signori Bertolasi, and Vincentelli, who acquitted themselves more or less satisfactorily. The orchestra, under Sig. Giraldini, was well up to its work, and the scenery obtained two calls for the painter, Sig. Tencalla.—At the Carcano, Sig. Sacchi's new opera, Cleopatra, has been produced with but very doubtful success.

THE SORCERER.

(From the "Graphic.")

The production of The Sorcerer at the Opera Comique, on Saturday night, was a real success—so real, indeed, as to encourage the belief that it will be lasting. That the work—"comic opera," or whatever special definition it may legitimately claim—is one of singular merit, few who have witnessed and heard it can reasonably deny. With Mr W. S. Gilbert and Mr Arthur Sullivan each at his best, it would be hypercritical to look for failure; and, both conditions being fulfilled in The Sorcerer, the result was what, without risk of disappointment, might have been anticipated. Mr Gilbert has adopted an old and much revered legend—that of the "philtre," or love potion—as the basis of his libretto. His treatment of this legend, however, belongs exclusively to him, and to no other. Nor Thomas of Ercelesbourne ("the Rhymer"), nor Rusticien de Pise, nor Malory himself would have recognised it again. The readers of The Graphic, however—better informed through our last Christmas number—can draw their own inferences. For this reason—to say nothing of the ample details published on Monday by our daily contemporaries, we are absolved from the task of describing the plot. Enough that what, through the agency of Dame Bragwaine, was with fatal results administered to Sir Tristram, son of Meliadus, and to King Mark's wife, "the Belle Isonde" (we use the nomenclature of Mort d'Arthur—our own cherished romance), is by Mr Wellington Wells, chief of an established house of "family necromancers," administered to the whole population of a village with no more fatal results than such as are provocative of mirth irresistible. The secret belongs exclusively to Mr Gilbert, who, in lieu of making folks weep bitterly, compels them to laugh until tears of a healthier sort are engendered—the risum movère, rather than the lacrymas excire, being his especial aim. This he has accomplished with admirable skill, doubly fortunate in his Orphean confederate, Mr Arthur Sullivan, one of the most gifted of Britain's musical sons, whose co-operation with the author of Pygmalion, The Palace of Truth, &c., has—witness the inimitable Trial by Jury, &c.—been already more than once successful. Both author and composer have reason to be gratified with this outcome of their united efforts. The Sorcerer made "a hit—a palpable hit"—on Saturday night, at the Opera Comique, and kept the audience in one continuous state of hilarity. At the same time, let it not be thought that the music of Mr Arthur Sullivan is limited exclusively to parody and burlesque. On the contrary, while it is comic where the pure comic element is essential as Mr Gilbert's own verse, dialogue, and incident, it not seldom speaks eloquently on its own account, forcing, without exaggeration, his subtle confederate to look, in spite of himself, serious—to sob, in short, like Heraclitus, instead of gibe after the manner of Democritus. Mr Sullivan possesses the happy art of assuming gravity while affecting to be gay; and this makes him all the more fitting partner for Mr Gilbert in works like The Sorcerer, where frequently the mock seriousness of that which is spoken and acted constitutes at the bottom what Shakspeare's Nym would style "the humour of it." Half-a-dozen instances might be cited in exemplification, but our space will not admit of detailed criticism, nor is it imperatively demanded. The Sorcerer—book and music—will speak for itself to those who have an innate sense of lively wit and genial humour, while for such as are not endowed with this peculiar faculty an analysis would be of little use. Aristophanes was not appreciated by the untutored mass; and had music in the time of Socrates been an art such as two or three centuries have made it for the actual generation, Aristophanes, disposed to call in its aid, and allowing it to play a conspicuous part, would surely have looked out for some Athenian Timotheus like Arthur Sullivan. Then would the "Birds" have chirped in measured tune, and "Frogs" have croaked in harmony! What more need be added, beyond repeating that The Sorcerer was a brilliant and richly-merited success? A word of general and unqualified commendation is due to the performers, one and all. The leading singers were Mrs Howard Paul, Misses Alice May, Everard, and Giulia Warwick; Messrs George Bentham, Rutland Barrington, Temple, Clifton, and George Grossmith—two of the gentlemen, the second and fifth named, being novices before the stage-lights, although few would have set them down for anything less than adepts. Both chorus and orchestra were in every respect efficient, while the scenery and stage arrangements were equally to the credit of those responsible for their accuracy. Mr Sullivan himself was at the conductor's desk.

(From the "Examiner.")

A philosopher has defined the comic element in art as a "close and unexpected juxtaposition of strikingly incongruous things." Mr W. S. Gilbert, in his dramatic groundwork to Mr Sullivan's new opera, has acted on this suggestion. There is nothing intrinsically ludicrous in the idea of a sorcerer as we frequently meet him on the operatic stage, dwelling in mediæval gloom, and surrounded by the paraphernalia of his trade. But when such a person appears in the broad daylight of the nineteenth century, and in the attire of a highly respectable tradesman, the "juxtaposition of incongruous things" immediately results, and the effect is intensely comic. Any attempt at inventing a new plot or story Mr Gilbert has in this instance abandoned. The idea of a philtre or charm causing passionate love for the first comer and at first sight—of

"The juice which, if on sleeping eyelids laid,
Will make a man or woman madly doat
Upon the next live creature that it sees"— is as old as the sacred legends of India, and as familiar as Shakspeare's Midsummer Night's Dream. The imbrogio which ensues is also more or less identical in each instance. But here, again, Mr Gilbert adds the amusing element of perfectly modern surroundings. The love potion, which turns the collective head of the village of Ploverleigh, takes the form of an afternoon-tea libation, and is, according to Mr J. W. Wells—the Sorcerer's own testimony—"compounded on the strictest principles; on married people it has no effect whatever." All this may at first sight appear to be of the nature of burlesque pure and simple, and such, indeed, the incidents, and especially the final dénouement of the plot, decidedly are. But the story, as we said before, is the least important part of the new drama. It is in the delineation of the characters that the dramatist's gift is chiefly shown, and these are one and all drawn with admirable skill. The silly sentimental lovers, their ceremonious elders, Dr Daly, the lachrymose vicar, and his charming little sweetheart, down to Mrs Partlet, the "eagle-eyed pew-opener," are full of life and individuality. They are seen through the medium of whimsical fancy, which sets at naught the rules of ordinary perspective, but cannot detract from the wonderful realism of the picture.

The character of refined humour as opposed to low comicality is fully sustained by Mr Sullivan's music. That Mr Sullivan is a learned musician, an excellent writer for the orchestra, and a musical humourist of the true order, are facts beyond dispute. But never before have these qualities appeared combined on so important a scale as in the present instance. The finale of the first act is an elaborate piece of construction with as many as nine solo parts, independently sustained, and grouped according to their divergent emotions in the most masterly way. Here, also, we meet, in the whispered "aside" of Alexis and Aline, with as pretty a bit of true sentiment as can well be imagined. The ensemble in the second act, "Oh joy, the charm works well," is equally well constructed, while the quintet of the same act—couplets with intervening bits of concerted music would be the technical description—the lighter vein of comic opera prevails. The introduction to the work also is a charming piece of orchestral writing, in which the composer has largely drawn upon the "Graceful Dance" from his accompaniment to Henry VIII., a circumstance which, by the way, fully confirms our previous remark as to the essentially modern type of that movement. Amongst the happiest touches of humour in the opera is the Handelian character of the music which accompanies the old-fashioned courtship of Sir Mar-maduke Pointdextre and the Lady Sangazure. In other places the claptrap of the modern opera is parodied in the most amusing manner. The preparation of the philtre strikingly recalls numerous "incantation" scenes from popular operas, and such a stanza as—

Now for the tea of our host,
Now for the rollicking bun,
Now for the muffins and toast,
Now for the gay Sally Lunn—is an admirable equivalent for the familiar "andiam beviam" of the lyrical stage. Space will not allow us to touch upon other amusing details in this bright musical conception. Suffice it to say that on the first night the audience was kept in the best of humours during the whole performance, and that at the end the most cordial applause fell to the share of both dramatist and composer. To this happy consummation the admirable performance of the work contributed not a little. The artists had one and all entered into the spirit of The Sorcerer, and not a hitch occurred from beginning to end. Mr Carte, the energetic manager of the Opera Comique, had given numerous opportunities for careful study under the composer's own direction, and the result proved the soundness of the system. Amongst the uniformly efficient cast, we can only refer to the discreet and yet intensely comic impersonations of Mr Wells the Sorcerer, and Dr Daly, the sentimental vicar, by Messrs Grossmith and Rutland Barrington respectively. Miss Alice May well sustained the part of Alice, the heroine, and Mrs Howard Paul was a gracefully dignified lady of the old school. Miss Giulia Warwick (Constance) is both an accomplished singer and a charming actress. She was, indeed, as sweetly modest and "good a girl as ever stepped," to adopt the parlance of the worthy pew-opener. The full success, in which poet and composer and performer share, is equally a matter of congratulation to playgoers. Here is at last a work of entirely English growth, which bids fair to hold its own by the side of numberless foreign importations. Mr Gilbert's dialogue is, as regards true humour, as superior to the ordinary run of French libretti as Mr Sullivan's music is to the clever commonplaces of Offenbach and Lecocq, and it is quite time that our public should realise the fact. Enthusiasts, moreover, may cherish a hope that an early opportunity will be afforded to our rising composer to show his strength on that higher dramatic stage the weakness of which he has so cleverly parodied.

* They are identical.

"The modern English comic opera, the joint production of Mr W. S. Gilbert, dramatist, and Mr Arthur Sullivan, composer, has proved eminently successful at the Opera Comique. In spite of the objections of some critics, I venture to think that now, for the first time, this pretty little house is furnished with a class of entertainment that does not belie its name. The Sorcerer is in truth a comic opera which will compare favourably with the best Parisian bouffes. To be sure, the term "comic opera," as the equivalent of "opera comique," conveys a different idea to musicians and musical amateurs than it does to the ordinary public. But there can be no doubt that the word comic will never bear any technical signification to the majority of English people. Therefore I think there need be no apology made for using it in connection with such works as The Sorcerer. It was but natural that this comic opera should, upon its production, be extensively compared with Trial by Jury. That it should by some be unfavourably compared with the latter brilliant work is also not surprising. Its subject, however, is not similar to that of Trial by Jury, but, indeed, bears a stronger resemblance to Mr Gilbert's fairy comedies. Its libretto is own brother to Creatures of Impulse. But it is given in modern costume. It is impossible to describe the many whimsicalities in which it abounds. They are, however, irresistibly diverting; and Mr Sullivan's music is throughout fresh, spontaneous, and suggestive. The various characters which Mr Gilbert's unique fancy has created in The Sorcerer are well played by the actors and actresses who have been engaged to impersonate them."—London Correspondence of the Liverpool "Porcupine."

IN MEMORY OF JAMES MOTT.

(Late Secretary of the Police Orphanage.)

Ne'er more will throb that heart with vigorous pulse,
A heart nor danger fear'd, nor wily foe;
To perils clos'd, it open'd wide to woe.
No suppliant had from Mott a rude repulse;
Tir'd bounty's lagging steed gain'd fresh impulse
From his quick, guiding word. Each tender mind
Would feel the grief that did his soul convulse,
And emulate his deeds for frail mankind.
His latest hours were spent with charity
To help a stricken artist in distress,
Such calls he answered with alacrity,
And mercy's mission fill'd with gentleness.
The orphan shar'd his tend'rest love and care;
His orphans now need help in their despair.

MR IRVING AND THE PRESS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—My attention having been called to the report of a speech alleged to have been spoken by me at a public dinner at Edinburgh, in which newspaper reporters and critics in general are alluded to in insulting terms, I desire to have an opportunity of putting myself right with you and the members of your staff.

The dinner referred to, at which I was present, was an entirely private one, to which I had the privilege of inviting any guest I chose. On that occasion the conversation turned on a scurrilous pamphlet which had preceded me in Glasgow, Dundee, and Edinburgh, where it was published, and which pamphlet I was then informed had been written by four Edinburgh reporters.

After dinner my health was proposed, and in a jocular manner the way I had been treated by certain few members of the Press was alluded to. In my reply, having this pamphlet and its authors exclusively in my mind, I said, in a bantering sort of way, that it was useless to consider everything that was written about one, as a dramatic critic was a man who required training, experience, and culture, so that his opinions would carry weight—that in every profession there were black sheep—and (still thinking of this pamphlet) I said, that dramatic notices were sometimes written by such people, and estimated their status by the lowest sums earned in their calling.

I further said in the same vein, which the entire company, principally composed of literary and artistic men, thoroughly understood, that "of course I never read the papers"—of course I never did this and never did that, with many other frivolous things too ridiculous to mention, the tone, manner and meaning being perfectly intelligible to any mind except the dullest.

So greatly did I feel my obligations to the Press, that on the occasion alluded to, I turned to a gentleman who was invited to this dinner at my express desire, and thanked him for the kindly and able manner in which (as I thought and had been told) he had criticised me in a daily paper with which he was connected. This gentleman replied that the dramatic criticisms had not been written by him, but by one of his confrères—whereupon I begged him to express my thanks to the writer of those criticisms. I then invited him along with my other friends at the table, to supper during the following week. He replied that if able he would gladly come, cordially shook hands, and expressed his pleasure at our meeting.

I should also say that "The Press" was proposed, and replied for in grateful terms by this gentleman.

Judge of my amazement when, on the following morning, I read in the newspaper with which this gentleman was connected, a serious, lengthy, and inaccurate report of the few jesting words I had said at this perfectly private dinner—and in that report no allusion whatever was made to the circumstances under which certain words had been said.

These, Sir, are the simple facts of the case, and I leave it to you, and every member of a profession I so highly esteem, to say whether the treatment I received was justifiable.

In nearly every city I have visited I have been treated by the press with the greatest consideration, kindness, and courtesy; and many of its members I number amongst my personal friends. I am, dear Sir, yours obediently,

HENRY IRVING.

VIENNA.

(From a Correspondent.)

Herr Hellmesberger, the successor of the late Johann Herbeck as first Hof-Capellmeister, is the twenty-sixth artist who has held the post since it was first instituted in 1543. Those who held it longest were Salieri, who counted thirty-six years of service, and Philippus de Monte and Johann Josef Fuchs, who are to be credited with twenty-five each.—The Komische Oper, which has ruined six different managements in the modest four years of its brief existence, has been re-opened under a seventh manager, Herr Swoboda. Otello was given on the opening night by an Italian company under Sig. Morini, who himself impersonated the hero. This company will continue its performances two or three weeks, to allow Herr Swoboda time to form his German company, and make the arrangements necessary for carrying on the campaign. Perhaps it would have been better had Herr Swoboda done all this before throwing open the doors of his theatre.—The Society of the Friends of Music have given a grand performance of Mozart's Requiem in memory of their late conductor, Herbeck. The artists of the Imperial Operahouse and of the Conservatory, as well as the members of the Male Vocal Association and other societies, took part in it. The solos were sung by Mmes Wilt and Gindele, Herren Walter and Rokitanaky. Herr Hellmesberger conducted, and Professor Zellner presided at the organ.

JOHANN HERBECK—DEAD.*

Herbeck dead!—in these two words, which a treacherous illness of scarcely a week has thus terribly combined, there is contained a fearful fact, for which we vainly seek consolation; and every pen that records it must do so tremblingly, and every eye, not yet dried up by artistic and social phariseism, must fill with tears; for not only has Vienna lost in Herbeck one of her most eminent citizens, but she buries with him one of her brightest ornaments, and German Art one of her most vigorous supporters. Yesterday morning, at a quarter to ten, the artist turned his head with indescribable weariness to the right, heaved a deep sigh, and quietly expired, without a pang, and without a struggle, as though he wished to spare the loving ones around him at least that agony. After it was quite light yesterday morning, Herbeck, who probably had heard but too plainly the summons of the Angel of Death, begged that his two friends, Herr Dumba and Herr Schön (Imperial Councillor), might be sent for to his bedside. These two gentlemen came, but the sufferer could not pronounce an intelligible word; he evidently exerted himself as much as he possibly could to say something, but all he could utter was: "Cover me, cover me—cold!" His two attached friends remained with him till all was over. Two days previously, having passed a somewhat less feverish hour than usual, he called his wife and sister, and said: "Send for the priest, my dears; it is not for myself I wish this, but, if it is not done—you know very well there would be too much worry after my death." On the ladies' trying to drive away such gloomy thoughts, he observed with a sad smile: "It's no use your talking—I know best how I am; but, but why could it not have happened after the Ninth! I had so looked forward to it." The last things he conducted—his illness, as we are aware, commenced on Monday, the 22nd inst., the last practice evening of the Singverein—were by Schubert and by Beethoven!

Schubert and Beethoven! It was of these two great Departed that his friend Dumba thought the moment the inevitable had taken place; Herbeck should lie near the immortal singer whom he had been most instrumental in digging out of the dust and rubbish of old archives, and near the gigantic master of the Symphony, for the most perfect interpretation of whose works he would have given his heart's blood. A messenger was quickly despatched to Mährling, to inquire whether there was still a little space left by the graves of Schubert and Beethoven, and, on the receipt of an affirmative reply, Herr Dumba instantly made application to the proper authorities. It is true that Herbeck had often spoken casually of the Nödlinger Cemetery as his future resting-place, but he never expressed a really definite wish on the point; and he was so thoroughly a Viennese, he had so grown up in, with, and for Vienna, that the city or its immediate neighbourhood had undeniable claims upon him.

Herbeck's artistic career is, on the whole, pretty generally known; but some special details of his eventful life, now, alas! terminated, may well be once again recalled to the memory. Johann Herbeck was born in Vienna, on Christmas Day, 1831, his father being a mechanic in somewhat poor circumstances. The child soon exhibited a strongly pronounced talent for music. At the age of ten he was admitted as a singing boy in the Cistercian Chapter of the Holy Cross—hence his unvarying love for the woods and valleys of the Wienerwald, amid which the Chapter lies so sweetly embosomed. He created so great a sensation there that he was taken back to Vienna, that he might study under Rotter. Both as a boy and as a youth, he set with great earnestness about all he had to do, and thus it came to pass that, besides attending to his musical studies, he devoted much time and labour to his general education. He was, accordingly, a man of very varied accomplishments, who, in his leisure hours, took an interest in scientific questions of every kind, and was thoroughly up in all the scientific and political questions of the day.

In the year 1852 Herbeck became director of the choir of the Piarists—a similar position for which he was a candidate somewhat later, at St Stephen's, was given to another competitor; in 1856 in Stegmayer's place and in conjunction with Hanns Schlager, choirmaster of the Männergesangverein; in 1858, Director of the then recently established Singverein; in 1859, artistic director of the Society of the Friends of Music; in 1863, Vice-Imperial Chapelmaster; and, in 1866, First-Imperial Chapelmaster. In 1869, by an unhappy concatenation and misconception of certain circumstances, he was placed in a sphere never really his own, which, however, decided the diagnoses of his doctors may have been, drove the nails home in his coffin. Herbeck was a musician in the most earnest, finest, and noblest acceptance of the term, but not a practical man for the stage; Herbeck was an artist, and not a doer; Herbeck's place was in the concert-room, and not behind the scenes. To the intrigues in the offices of the management, to the machinations of the greenroom, to the petty perfidies, and the shufflings of well-meaning friends, and to the wild extravagances of prime donne believing themselves aggrieved and insulted, a man of his mind was not equal, and he was finally obliged to succumb. But his retirement occurred in a manner unexpected by every one who knew how high his name stood in certain quarters. It was on the 16th October, 1869, that Herbeck, then, so to say, still musical adviser under the Dingalstedt régime and Esser's successor in the conductor's chair, made his début with the opera Mignon (in the old house); on the 21st December, 1870, the Wiener Zeitung published his nomination as manager of the Imperial Operahouse, and on the 2nd January, 1871, he held an official reception for everyone employed in the theatre. On the 6th April, 1875, after a series of the most agitating events, and controversies about deficits, Herbeck had concluded his struggles there, his dismissal, as previously hinted, being somewhat sudden, and not characterised by the smooth forms generally so popular in courtly official circles. On the 28th April, 1875, he took leave of the persons employed in the Operahouse, and, on the 4th October in the same year, the Society of the Friends of Music were fortunate enough once more to count as their own him they had so deeply missed. On that evening, for the first time, the members of the Singverein studied once more under Herbeck's admirable conducting stick, which made others so steady and was wielded with such certainty itself, while the concerts of the Society of the Friends of Music again enjoyed from that autumn their old importance which they had lost through Rubinstein and Brahms, who had not sufficient of the instructor about them, and through an interregnum.

(To be concluded in our next.)

DECEMBER.*

When loud through the forest the north wind doth blow,
And in place of green leaves hangs a mantle of snow;
When the fairy-like frost-work decks woodland and moor,
And the robin and sparrow draw near to the door;
When the lake is all frozen, and skaters glide past,
And the cry of the sea-gull is heard on the blast;
When the sun faintly shines on the icicles clear,
Then we know 'tis December, last month of the year.

The last month is passing—though last, not the least;
But, before his departure, he gives us a feast.
Father Christmas approaches, with evergreens crown'd,
And smilingly scatters his gifts all around.
He brings friends and kindred together once more,
And bids those who have riches remember the poor.
But the year now is waning, his end draweth near;
Farewell, then, December, last month of the year.

MEXICO.—Sig. Eugenio Castera, formerly manager of the Grand Theatre, died here on the 6th October. He was in the flower of his age, but had been for some time mad. He was the husband of Signora Angelica Peratta, well known as a singer in America.

BOLOGNA.—Wagner's Fliegender Holländer has been produced here, but the applause which greeted it was counterbalanced by loud opposition. Signora Durand as Senta, Sig. Carpi as Erik, and Sig. Moriami as the Dutchman, especially distinguished themselves.

WIESBADEN.—The Crown Prince and the Crown Princess of Prussia, with their family and suite, lately visited Professor August Wilhelmj, at his villa, the interior of which was elegantly decorated in honour of the occasion. They stayed a considerable time. They appeared greatly interested in the new organ, on which the celebrated artist performed—a present from some English admirers. They were also delighted with their host's violin playing.

A LECTURE ON MENDELSSOHN.

A series of popular lectures and entertainments, of a very admirable character, has been set on foot in connection with the Rev. Newman Hall's new church (Christ Church) in Southwark. One of these took place in Hawkstone Hall on the evening of Nov. 19th, when Mr Fred. G. Edwards, organist and choirmaster of the church, known as an able and rising musician, delivered a lecture entitled, "Glimpses into the Life and Character of Mendelssohn." The lecture was illustrated by a copious programme drawn from the great master's works, the extracts succeeding one another chronologically, and being intended to exhibit the development of the composer's genius, and his assured power and versatility in many styles, as well as to give the musically-unlearned of the audience an opportunity of hearing some of the most beautiful of his conceptions worthily rendered.

As far as the limits of his time allowed the lecturer gave an accurate and spirited sketch of Mendelssohn's life, necessarily including some history of the production of the chief of his works. Dwelling more in detail upon the incidents of his life in this country, and refuting the calumny that England is not a musical country, he was loudly cheered. He then attempted, not unsuccessfully, an analysis of the musician's many-sided character, and concluded with a graceful narrative of his last days, adding, we presume for the benefit of the less reflective among his audience, the lessons that were, in his opinion, deducible from the life of the man. The deeply interesting nature of the lecture was testified to by the earnest and sustained attention of the audience, which at its conclusion broke out into hearty applause.

The musical portion of the evening's programme was also under Mr Edwards' direction, and he was ably assisted by Mdme Florence Lancia, Miss Jessie Williams, Miss Annie Cockburn, Mr George Whillier, and the choir of Christ Church, numbering fifty very effective voices. The selections were as follows:—

Capriccio in E minor (composed in North Wales, 1829), played by Mr Edwards; Hunting Song and "On wings of Song" (Dusseldorf, 1834); "Jerusalem" and "How lovely are the messengers" (from St Paul, 1836); Hymn from Festgesang (Leipzig, 1840); "Praise thou the Lord" (from the Lobgesang, 1840); "O hills, O vales" (Leipzig, 1843); "The May-bells and the flowers" (Berlin, 1844); "O rest in the Lord" and "He that shall endure to the end" (from Elijah, 1846); and the "Ave Maria" (from Lorelei, 1847).

An encore was deservedly bestowed on the part-song, "O hills, O vales," sung by the choir, and on Miss Cockburn's impressive rendering of "O rest in the Lord." It ought to be observed that one is very seldom so fortunate as to meet with an amateur choir so thoroughly trained and effective as this of Christ Church. Their work is conscientious, artistic, and good.

The spacious hall was densely crowded by a most appreciative audience. A popular entertainment so ably carried out, affording an opportunity to the working class and lower middle class of instruction upon so worthy a theme and of intelligent appreciation of the best music, deserves publicity in order that it may have imitators. LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

The second of Mr John Boosey's series of four "Ante-Christmas Concerts," in St James's Hall, on Wednesday evening, was attended by an enormous audience. The artists, the same as at the concert given last week, were received with equal favour. The programme consisted of many "old favourites," "encores" being in the ascendant. Two new songs, "When thou art near," by Sullivan, and "The Tar's Farewell," by Stephen Adams, sung respectively by Mr Edward Lloyd and Mr Santley, met with genuine approbation, and were repeated by unanimous desire.

The London Vocal Union, under the direction of Mr Frederick Walker, gave "The Hunter's Farewell" (Mendelssohn), "Hart and Hind" (Bishop), "The Belegued" (Sullivan), and "King Canute" (Macfarren), in their most finished style; and Miss Margaret Bucknall sustained her reputation as an accomplished pianist by her performance of Thalberg's Study in A, and an Allegro Brillante by Schumann. Mr Sidney Naylor accompanied the vocal music.

VENICE.—Pietro Tonassi, violoncellist and composer, died in this his native town, on the 5th November, aged 76. He was very celebrated as a contrapuntist and teacher, but his life was one long series of privations, and he died in abject poverty.

EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

At the annual meeting in the Music Class Room, Park-place, Professor Sir Herbert Oakeley presiding, there was a good attendance. The Chairman said,—It may briefly be recorded that the germ of the University Musical Society is to be traced to the year 1866, when, according to classical precedent, it seems to have been realized that not only music and medicine, and music and mathematics, but also music and athletics, would go hand in hand together, and that, as in ancient Athens, these last began to take their old positions as an important element in the training of the youth of "modern Athens," for the germ to which I allude was considerably aided and invigorated by a spirited step of the Athletic Club, under the auspices of which our first concert, ten years ago, was given. The younger association celebrates its Pythian games in the shape of an annual concert in March, and the elder holds its Olympic festival a month or two later. Our last concert in March showed an advance which all competent to judge recognized as highly satisfactory. The increase in the numbers of members during the last six years is gratifying. In 1872 the number was 64; in 1873, 117; in 1874, 204; in 1875, 209; in 1876, 227; and last winter, 236. Mr Small, treasurer, read the financial statement. The income last year was £296 8s. 3d., the expenditure £192 11s. 5d., leaving £103 16s. 10d. to be carried to next year's account. Professor MacLagan, moving the adoption of the financial report, said there were now in the University about 2,300 students—a larger number than had ever matriculated since he had been connected with it, and out of that they ought to have a considerable addition to the Musical Society. Dr Hullah said he examined every year in the various training schools of England, Wales, and Scotland about 1,800 second year's students—one-half of those under instruction at training schools for masters and mistresses—and last year he rejected on account of incapacity only one. He believed there never was born a healthy child, without organic disease, who could not be made to sing. There was a time after which it became difficult to teach music of any kind, and the longer that was delayed the more difficult it became. Children from seven to nine or ten years of age could be made to read with the greatest ease. He concluded by moving a vote of thanks to Sir Herbert Oakeley for presiding. The chairman said they were all much indebted to his fellow professors and Dr Hullah for attending. He then played on the grand organ "Reminiscences of Last Concert" and "Alma Mater," which were received with loud applause.—Edinburgh Courant.

DEATH OF MR E. T. SMITH.

A name once associated with the leasehold of several resorts of public entertainment has passed into the obituary. Mr Edward Tyrrell Smith, long identified with the management of various London theatres, expired on Monday morning, after a very brief illness, at his residence, Kennington Park—aged 73. In 1849 lessee of the Marylebone, he became three years later manager of Drury Lane Theatre, which establishment he continued to hold until the autumn of 1862, when he disposed of the remainder of his lease to Mr Edmund Falconer. The Alhambra, in Leicester Square (originally styled the Panopticon), was first opened under the new name by Mr E. T. Smith on Feb. 7, 1858. It was for two years a circus; but in December, 1860, musical performances were given. In this year Mr E. T. Smith undertook the leasehold of Her Majesty's Theatre, which he retained sixteen months. Subsequently he became manager of the Lyceum and Astley's Amphitheatre, besides being lessee of Cremorne Gardens, which he directed from 1861 to 1869. He afterwards opened a theatre near the Elephant and Castle, hard by the "Tabernacle." When English opera was given during the winter months at Her Majesty's Theatre, Mr E. T. Smith brought out Macfarren's Robin Hood and Vincent Wallace's Amber Witch. These acts alone will be recorded to his credit.

BRUSSELS.

(From a Correspondent.)

M. Faure has been singing in Faust, Hamlet, La Favorita, and Guillaume Tell, at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, with the success which always accompanies him. Mad. Fursch-Madier was much applauded as Marguerite in the first of the above operas. Paul et Virginie has constituted the attraction on the off-nights. A two-act comic opera, George Dandin, words by M. Covelier, music by M. Mathieu, is in rehearsal.—A "Te Deum" by François Riga was performed at the Cathedral of St Gudule on the King's name-day, and the Mass in D, composed a short time before his death by Charles Hanssens, in the same locality on St Cecilia's Day.—The arrival is announced of a company of virtuosos, mostly of a somewhat tender age. Among them is a young violinist named Dengrémont, who has already appeared here once. He is accompanied by Adélaïde Barbé, a fair pianist of eight summers, and Madlle Nizaw, a young lady of twelve, who plays the xylophone.

ORGAN-IC REFORM WANTED.

UNDER this heading the Liverpool Porcupine has the following apposite remarks:—

"Mr Best's organ recitals at St George's Hall have gone on so long and so smoothly, so regularly and so unobtrusively, that we can well understand how in the public mind there is by this time a sort of comfortable, if vague, assurance that they will go on for ever. And if in the public mind so placid and pleasant a feeling is caused, how much more in the mind official? The mind official is always ready to acquiesce in routine. One of its pet creeds is that things will get on well enough of themselves if they are only let alone; and, unless some pressure is applied from without, matters must reach a pretty pass, indeed, before the mind official, alone and of its own prompting, makes the discovery that there is any need for reform. Now, it is gently to stimulate the somewhat languid intelligence of the department which has charge of St George's Hall that we call attention to the condition into which the organ has been allowed to relapse.

"Not to put too fine a point upon it, it appears that the instrument is in a condition which gives considerable anxiety to its friends. It is suffering severely from what may be called organic asthma. It is subject to strange internal rumblings. Its whole system, in fact, is demoralized. What wonder, then, that it should betray resentment at being forced to work in such a parlous state? Organs are notoriously sensitive in temperament; and if, neglected and snubbed, they give way to moody and variable habits, who can be surprised? So, for some time past the public performances of the instrument at St George's Hall have become dogged protests against its private wrongs. In the middle of a fine movement it maliciously contrives that two or more of its notes shall stick together, or that they shall not sound at all; or, waiting for a beautiful pianissimo, when the audience are rapt in attention to the melody, it seizes the opportunity presented by the changing of the combination of stops to break out into a volley of startling reports, as though a cartload of bricks had been 'tipped' in its interior, and each individual cube fell bounding and echoing from point to point until it finally reached the floor. Occasionally (this is, we suppose, when its indignation is unusually strong) it breaks down altogether. A consultation between the organist and his myrmidons then takes place, and a quarter of an hour elapses before the offended instrument can be induced to smother its wrath and go on again.

"It will, no doubt, be a matter of surprise to the public who don't attend the recitals to hear that affairs have reached so serious a point. We can assure them, however, that the vagaries of the organ have not been exaggerated; and, now that public attention has been directed to the subject, we hope that steps will be taken to remove all ground of complaint. If we remember rightly, the builders of the organ receive a handsome allowance—about four pounds per week—to keep it in proper order and repair, but its present condition suggests serious doubts as to the mode in which the contract is fulfilled. We don't impute to them, or to anybody, intentional neglect; but it certainly appears that long continuance in one groove, and immunity from public criticism—for the recitals are, somehow or other, rarely noticed in the newspapers—have induced apathy both on the part of the builders and on the municipal committee who have charge of the organ."

Liverpool rejoices in the possession of a great organ, a greater hall, and a greatest organist. She looks carefully enough after the hall, municipal interests being discussed and settled within its walls; but, although this magnificent structure was "inaugurated" a quarter of a century ago with a musical "Festival," under the direction of the late Sir Henry Bishop, music since that event, although taken into consideration from time to time, has hardly received from the Liverpool community the attention which, if only under the circumstances above mentioned, is its legitimate due. The great organ is suffering from a temporary malady which, under the superintendence of competent advisers, might easily be remedied. When we say advisers we mean adviser;—which is equivalent to naming Dr Best the best doctor under the circumstances that could possibly be consulted. Dr Best would treat his patient—the great organ—with the tenderness of a physician who not only wishes to cure his patient, but who loves his patient for reasons that require no explanation. His performances on St George's Hall organ have made it renowned, not only through Great Britain but through Europe. Liverpool ought to be proud of this, and take into consideration the services rendered to the art of music by the illustrious organist who has for so many years been one of her citizens. Every amateur has heard of, and talks about, the performances of Mr W. T. Best on the great organ of St George's Hall, which have conferred upon Liverpool a musical repute to warrant her to hold up her head with pride against Birmingham, Manchester, and even Leeds. Let, then, those amateurs, who wish like the promoters of the Liverpool Festival, which we should like to recognise as "triennial," use their influence in this matter. We would especially refer to Mr Eggars, and men of his stamp. They can do what is imperatively required to uphold the position of Liverpool among the truly musical towns of England. But before all let them see that the great organ of their great hall, which is played upon by their great organist, is put into repair immediately, so that it may redound to the credit of Liverpool as a town loving music for itself and desirous of promoting a taste for it among its half million of citizens. Otto Seard.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

WE understand that Schott & Co. intend publishing, in the course of next month, the following important works by Richard Wagner: The poem of his new Bühnenweihfestspiel (Parsifal), Siegfried (idyll for orchestra), and a "Sketch of a Pianoforte Sonata."

M^DM^E DABADIE, who enjoyed a short period of popularity at the Grand Opera, died in Paris on the 21st of November, aged eighty-two. Zuline Leroux, a pupil of the Conservatory, came out at the above-named theatre in 1821, as Antigone, in Edipe à Colone. The success she achieved caused her to be engaged as "double" to M^Dm^E Branchu. The year following she married M. Dabadie, who also belonged to the Grand Opera, and who had the honour of being the first representative of the hero in Rossini's Guillaume Tell. M^Dm^E Dabadie remained at the Opera fifteen years. Her chief original parts were Sinaïde, in Moïse; Lady Macbeth, in Chelard's Macbeth; and the Sorceress in Auber's Gustave III. In 1835, still young, she was compelled, through an affection of the voice, to retire from the stage, and her example was followed, in the ensuing year, by her husband, who died in 1856.

It was at the concerts of the Conservatory that Beethoven was first introduced by F. Habeneck to a French audience. At the commencement of the present century it was the custom for the violinists who had carried off a first prize at the public competitions of the institution to conduct the concerts in turn; but, as Habeneck displayed especial talent in this respect, the rule was relaxed, and he alone acted as conductor till the fall of the Empire. F. Habeneck gained the first prize of Baillot's violin class in 1804. Annexed is the first French programme in which we find a work—the Symphony in C major—by Beethoven:—

"1807.—22nd February.—3rd Practice of the pupils.—Symphony in A, by L. van Beethoven; Air from Sacchini's Clémence, by Eloy; Horn Concerto, by Puncto, executed by Collin, Junr.; Air from Gossec's opera, Thésée, by M^Dlle Palet; Fragment from a symphony by Mozart; Trio from Catel's Artistes par Occasion, sung by Eloy, Desparmons, and Albert; and Overture to Winter's Marie de Montalban.

Not long since, Sig. Lauro Rossi, as announced at the time in our columns, wrote to all the leading pianists of the present day, asking them to compose something for an album, to be entitled, Homage of Pianists to Bellini. The following artists have already returned an affirmative answer:—Andreoli, Guglielmo; Alberti, J. J.; Brahms, Johann; Blassmann, Adolf; Bruch, Max; Brüll, Ignaz; Bonamici, Giuseppe; Bülow, Hans von; Cesi, Beniamino; Coop, Ernesto; Claus-Szarvady; Eschmann, J. H.; Esposito, Micheli; Fissot, Henri; Fumagalli, Disma; Golinelli, Stefano; Heller, Stephen; Henselt, Adolph; Herz, Henri; Hiller, Ferdinand; Hans, Bronsart; Jensen, Adolph; Jaël, Alfred; Kiel, Friedrich; Kirekner, Teodoro; Krebs, Mary; Krug, Arnold; Liast, Franz; Litloff, Henry; Lechner, Franz; Martucci, Giuseppe;

Mattei, Tito; Nacciarone, Guglielmo; Palumbo, Constantine; Rubinstein, Anton; Rubinstein, Nicolas; Raff, Joachim; Russo, Michaelangelo; Rossano, Carlo; Rendano, Alfonso; Reinecke, Carl; Schäffer, Julius; Sgambati; Saint-Saëns, Camille; Simonetti, Francesco; Stark, Ludwig; Speidel, Wilhelm; Spindler, Fritz; Scharwenka, Xavier; Sohumann, Clara; Tchaikowsky; Tofano, Gustave; Volkmann, Robert; Vierling, Georg; Wüerst, Richard; and Wieck, Marie.

PRASNITZ, in the Bohemian Erzgebirge, is the centre of the district which despatches the well-known companies of Bohemian musicians to all quarters of the globe, and is especially famous for its harp-girls. Very recently, a large number of the above bands have, according to the old practice, set out, before the arrival of winter, for every part of the world. The majority are bound for Egypt, Asia Minor, Constantinople, and Greece. Russia, the Danubian Principalities, and the northern part of European Turkey, once their most lucrative fields of exertion, have been avoided since the outbreak of the war. It is interesting to glance through the school lists of the villages in the Prasnitz district. They contain the names of some truly cosmopolitan scholars, whose cradles were rocked in Trebizond, Cairo, Constantinople, Varna, Saratov, Niashney-Novgorod, &c. The correspondent of a German paper states that in one school-register he found the name of a boy whose birthplace was Abyssinia, his mother being the wife of the African traveller, Dr Pfund, who was killed during an expedition into the interior. The widow, formerly a member of one of the wandering musical associations, at present resides in Dörsdorf. In explanation of the foregoing, it may be mentioned that many married women accompany their husbands in their protracted peregrinations; hence the variety in the birthplaces of the children. The Erzgebirgian musical companies consist now-a-days of thoroughly trained musicians of both sexes, who visit together distant countries. Their behaviour is most unexceptionable and moral; they command respect wherever they go; and many of the girls, who are not too home-sick, make good marriages. The companies that travel about Bohemia belong in only rare instances to the Prasnitz district and the Erzgebirge, though many of them assert they come thence, and thus bring discredit on the real native companies. Music is the principal occupation of the inhabitants of the eastern part of the Erzgebirge. It finds employment for, and keeps, directly and indirectly, thousands, and is thus an important factor in the prosperity of the country.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

M^DLL^E SAN MARTINOS gave a concert at the Langham Hall on Saturday evening, November 17. The programme contained the names of many well-known artists, and the conductors were Sir Julius Benedict and Signor Romili, the former of whom accompanied his own song, "I'm alone," beautifully rendered by the fair beneficiaire. Signor Bisaccia, who was announced for a pianoforte solo, having been prevented by an accident from appearing, the instrumental portion of the concert devolved upon M^Dm^E Emilie Grey (harp) and Signor Scuderi (violin). M^Dm^E Grey obtained a decided and well-deserved "encore" for her brilliant performance of "La danse de fées" of Parish-Alvars. The same compliment was also paid to M^Dlle Martinos, who sang "The Blind Girl," the harp obligato part being beautifully played by M^Dm^E Grey. Signori Urio, Monari-Rocca, Francesco Vergara, and Mr Gerard Coventry, vocalists, acquitted themselves with more than usual effect. Signor Scuderi's violin accompaniment to the "Ave Maria" of Schubert, sung by M^Dm^E Sanderini, was a marked feature of the programme.

A CONCERT in aid of the Kilburn Gate Club, given in the Assembly Rooms, Kilburn, on Tuesday, Nov. 20, must have had a successful pecuniary result, the rooms being filled. The concert opened with some part-songs, sung by Mr Greenhill's well-trained choir of boys. M^Dm^E Goodman Russell, Misses Jessie Bond, McClelland, and Frances Brooke, Signor Odoardo Barri, Messrs Greenhill, Coventry, Wiltshire, and Grimsby Jopp, R.A.M., were the solo vocalists. Miss Jessie Bond sang with taste Balfe's "Killarney;" Miss F. Brooke, a song by Miss K. Ward, "Tell me, my heart" (Bishop), and, with Mr Grimsby Jopp, John Barnett's "Singing Lesson" (encored). Miss A. McClelland, Mr E. Barry, and Mr Gerard Coventry also contributed songs with more or less effect. Mr H.

Wiltshire gave a finished interpretation of Ascher's "Alice, where art thou?" (encored). Mr Grimsby Jopp (pupil of Mr Cox, R.A.M.), a rising young baritone, sang with taste and expression, especially a new song, written for him, by Mr Wellington Guernsey, entitled "The North Sea Fisher." We must not omit mentioning the capital performance on the violin by Signor Erba of a fantasia solo of his compositions on airs from Lucrezia Borgia. Messrs Barth, Partridge, Barry, and Bevan accompanied the vocal music. We have one more remark to make in justice to the artists who give their services gratuitously. It was a miserable, cold winter night, yet in the artists' retiring room there was not a spark of fire in the grate. Some consideration for the artists ought to have been shown, either by the proprietor of the hall or by the parties who gained so much by their exertions.

THE Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden are over (says the Press and St James's Chronicle of Nov. 17th). The "Classical Nights" have had their share of admirers, while the ballad nights have held their own. On Friday, last week, there was a most enjoyable programme. M^{me} Nouver gave Bishop's "Lo! here the gentle lark," and Miss Mary Cummings—a promising débutante—"The Lady of the Lea," and both met with success. A novelty was introduced in the shape of a ballad, entitled "No" (the words by Mr Novra), and met at once with approval, being far removed from the ordinary run of commonplace songs. Miss Blanche Lucas, for whom it was composed, possesses a bright soprano voice, and her expressive singing well deserved the applause it obtained.

ATHENÆUM.—A correspondent writes us as follows:—"I send you a few lines to give you a résumé of the doings at the Athenæum on Friday, the 23rd [November]. The chief features were Miss Lillie Albrecht's pianoforte playing, Mr Schröter's violin solos, and Mr Moore's singing. Mr Moore is quite young (about twenty), and is only beginning his professional career. Chopin's Polonaise in E flat was charmingly rendered by Miss Albrecht, who never played with greater delicacy and more finished execution. Her second piece, Liszt's 'Rigoletto,' the audience were evidently quite pleased with; and at the conclusion of her performance the applause was so hearty that she was compelled to return to the platform, when she gave her own arrangement of 'The Blue Bells of Scotland.' A quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola, and violoncello, by Mozart, played by Messrs Beddome, Wallis, Ivimey, Schröter, and Hennell, was received with great favour. The 'Readings,' however, were not remarkable. The hall was crowded."

PROVINCIAL.

TORRINGTON (DEVON).—A concert of sacred music was given on Thursday evening, November 17th, in the Town Hall. Selections from the works of Handel, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Spohr, &c., were fairly rendered, especially "Let the bright seraphim," by Miss Sharland, and "If ye will obey my voice," from Mr Howell's Land of Promise, sung by Mr Sydney Harper (encored). Mr Backhouse presided at the harmonium, and Mrs Palmer at the pianoforte.

ARUNDEL.—At the concert, under the direction of Mr J. Parry Cole, given by the Mayor of Arundel in honour of the marriage of the Duke of Norfolk with Lady Flora Hastings, the vocalists were Misses K. Oscar Byrne, Marie Stuart, and Mr Gerard Coventry. The programme was made up of compositions by English composers, Mendelssohn's "For these and all Thy mercies" being the exception. Among the most admired songs were Cowen's "It was a dream," sung by Miss Stuart; Sullivan's "Sweethearts," and Glover's "Mary, dear," both sung by Mr Gerard Coventry.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—Mrs John Macfarren has lately given two pianoforte "recitals" to the members of the Literary and Philosophical Society, who keenly appreciated the programmes provided for their entertainment. On both occasions the accomplished pianist fully maintained her well-merited reputation. Among the pieces which created the most powerful impression were Beethoven's Sonatas in C sharp minor and B flat; Weber's "Moto continuo;" Schumann's "Des Abends" and "Traumgeswirren;" Chopin's Impromptu in C sharp minor; Rubinstein's Barcarolle; and Brissac's "Valse brillante de Bravoure." Some vocal pieces entrusted to Miss de Harpe, who has a full soprano voice of agreeable quality, gave variety to the entertainment.

LIVERPOOL.—The members of the Societa Armonica held their fifty-third "open rehearsal" in the Liverpool Institute, Mount Street, on Saturday, November 24, and a large audience testified to the well-merited public appreciation of their labours. It is gratifying—says the Daily Post—to record the steady progress which the society continues to make year by year in the interpretation of some of the most neglected compositions. The concert of Saturday was worthy of the reputation which the Societa Armonica has now attained, and the prominent position it occupies amongst the musical societies of the town. The following was the programme:—

Overture, Alphonso and Estrella, Op. 69 (Schubert); Scena, "Vi Ruvizio" (Bellini); Song, "He was despised" (Handel); Symphony, No. 4, in E flat, Op. 60 (Kalliwoda); Recit. and Air, "A Father's Love" (Wallace); Incidental Music, Louis XIII. (H. Lawson); Ballad, "Enchantress" (Hatton); March, "Abraham" (Molique).

Schubert's overture and Kalliwoda's Symphony were played by the orchestra in a manner which evoked general approbation. Mr H. Lawson's "Incidental Music to Louis treize" evidently interested the audience, who heartily applauded it. The vocalists were Miss Marie Ternan and Mr Orlando Christian. Mr Lawson led the band, and Mr Armstrong conducted.

MAIDENHEAD.—The members of the "Maidenhead Philharmonic Society" gave their eighth concert on Tuesday evening, the 13th inst., in the National Schoolroom. The solo vocalists were Misses Jessie Royd, Lucie Hann, Messrs Mellor and Orlando Christian. The society's orchestra was strengthened by a few instrumentalists from the Crystal Palace, and was led by Herr Rosenthal, who enjoys a deservedly high reputation as a premier violinist. The conductor was Herr Schultz, and Mr Goulden presided at the pianoforte. The society has always maintained a high standard, and has preferred giving first-class music, even at the risk of a money loss, to descending to that of a less worthy order. The selection of Samson for Tuesday night's concert was a sufficient proof that the society was determined to continue in the course originally marked out. The performance of the oratorio gave evidence of careful rehearsal, the choruses were sung with a precision that raised warm applause; the solos were given with spirit, and well executed, and the orchestra fairly out-did itself.

MR AND MRS GERMAN REED.

Prominent in the small band of clever writers who give wit and fancy to the miniature plays produced at St George's Hall, is Mr Gilbert à Beckett, whose work is light and ever welcome. Working in harmony with Mr Vivian Bligh, Mr à Beckett has contrived one more change out of old but popular materials. If, indeed, the sketch, called Once in a Century, reminds the audience of old friends here and elsewhere, it does not follow that it is unpleasant. On the contrary. The only people to be pitied are those with inconvenient memories. Why should we be so accurate on the subject of dramatic situation and comedy complication? We hear a good story at the club or anecdote at dinner, and forget it. The cares of life and hurry of business drive it out of our heads, and we in turn want to be amusing, and to make friends laugh. We are at fault if a certain mental process of patching and piecing is not gone through before the lips are opened. If at any time we are pleased with a song, some consciousness of the pleasure remains, though "we cannot for the life of us remember the tune." But the dramatic situation and idea cling as ivy, to an uncomfortable mind, and the existence of similarity is urged as a reason why the new turn to the old tune should not be admired. This is a mistake. There is nothing new under the sun. Take, for example, Once in a Century. We know that the boy and girl lovers, in Play, were sent by Mr Robertson into the ruins of the Alte Schloss, at Baden, and, thanks to Mrs Bancroft and Mr H. J. Montagu, had a charming love scene. But that is no reason why Mr Arthur Law and Miss Fanny Holland, as Michael Angelo Brown and Lilian, should not do the same thing. We cannot always see Play, but are here presented with Once in a Century. True Mr Planché wrote a fanciful legend, called A Romantic Idea, in which commonplace people were turned by the magic of imagination into mediæval knights, fair maidens, and spectres with hollow coughs; also that Mr W. S. Gilbert, gave us Ages Ago, and made the frilled and sworded ancestors step down from picture-frames; but why should we not laugh at Mrs German Reed as Lady Leolinda; at Mr Arthur Law as Sir Bouillon de Beuf (a capital name, by-the-bye); at that comical caricature by Mr. Corney Grain as Humphrey the Headsman. If so, we should miss Mr Grain's song descriptive of the spell, and be deprived of another exercise of that refined burlesque for which Mr German Reed's company is celebrated. The new entertainment is as lively and pretty as its predecessors, and Mr Corney Grain's descriptive song, "At the Seaside," is rewarded with uproarious applause.

MUNICH.—Herr Ignaz Brüll, composer of Das goldene Kreuz, was the solo instrumentalist at the first concert of the Musikalische Akademie; Señor Sarasate, at the second; and M. Saint-Saëns at the third.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

The Choral Society connected with the Albert Hall began a new series of concerts with a performance of Verdi's Requiem Mass, written in honour of Manzoni, and first heard in England, under the personal direction of the illustrious composer, in May, 1875. This was beginning well, if only because of the disposition shown to travel from the beaten track. But as much might have been expected of any society under the direction of Mr Joseph Barnby, who has never manifested a fondness for humdrum routine. To Mr Barnby the lovers of musical progress owe a good deal, and the debt is likely to be increased this season, thanks to the boldness which has set down for performance two works by an Englishman—the St John the Baptist and Joseph of Professor Macfarren. In saying this we are not necessarily blaming the musical societies which keep to music that is well known and safe. Every institution of the kind has its own public, and if novelty be not popular in the Strand, the acceptance of novelty farther west is no reason why Exeter Hall should run counter to the wishes of its patrons.

We can say nothing new of Verdi's Requiem. It has been heard often enough, and discussed at length sufficient to settle its rank and claims, while there is reason to believe that the settlement has not done injustice to a work of high genius. Naturally it was judged by a good many people at the outset according to the ordinary English canons of sacred art, and found wanting in dignity and sobriety. Some called it theatrical, others flippant, and others, again, moved by the odium theologicum, regarded it as approaching blasphemy. But straightforward English honesty soon prevails over the twist of prejudice. Rossini's Stabat Mater was once abused up hill and down dale by the very people who now hear it with open-mouthed delight. So it will be eventually with Verdi's Requiem—so it is now in a large measure, the fact winning more and more recognition, that what is sacred music in one country may, as such, be rejected in another, and that for the enjoyment and appreciation of all sacred music one must put aside narrow and local views. The reception of Verdi's work on Thursday was cordial in the extreme. Nearly every movement elicited hearty applause, and the whole was heard with unflagging attention. Of the performance, looking at the difficulties to be overcome, we can speak well. Since last year Mr Barnby has considerably augmented his choir without accompanying increase of strength by loss of efficiency in other respects, so that he now controls a body of singers creditable to the metropolis and able to hold its own against the formidable rivalry of the best provincial associations. The choruses in the Requiem were for the most part admirably rendered. Indeed, the performance of the opening number, "Requiem eternum," was a masterpiece of refinement and expression, and such as could not anywhere be surpassed, if it could be equalled. Let all honour be given to Mr Barnby and his choristers for a result so adapted to uphold the standard of excellence at a time when a good deal that is slipshod passes muster. The solos were in the hands of Mme Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Redeker, Mr E. Lloyd, and Mr Thurley Beale, who, we must frankly state, found it no easy task to keep ahead of the chorus in the race for the prize of excellence. Mme Sherrington—correct, painstaking, and artistic as ever—sang with uncommon fervour and success. Miss Redeker's efforts were marred by a vibrato more than usually pronounced; but her knowledge of the work and her adequate conception of its requirements, were obvious. As for Mr Lloyd and Mr Beale, it will suffice to state that they did again, as well as ever, what they had, to the satisfaction of all, done before. The band was excellent, and Mr Barnby conducted with decision and skill.—D. T.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Manchester, Nov. 23, 1877.

The production of a new symphony is not an everyday affair, and more than common interest had been excited by the announcement that Goldmark's "A Rustic Wedding" was to be performed by Mr Hallé's orchestra last week. It was known that the symphony had been rehearsed more frequently than is customary, and that not a few excellent judges were enthusiastic in their estimation of its merits. For once, anticipation was more than justified, and seldom have the subscribers to these concerts been so unanimous in their verdict about a new work. You would not have space for a long notice of this cleverly constructed and beautiful symphony, or I would send you one of the very eulogistic descriptions which appeared in the Manchester newspapers; and I cannot doubt that a work in which scholarly treatment is so admirably combined with original ideas and poetical fancies will ere long be heard in London. That we shall have Goldmark's symphony again in Manchester before the season is over may, I think, be confidently assumed. Mr Hallé played Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto with indescribable finish at this concert, and the charming Mme Marie Roze was the solo singer.

At Mr De Jong's concert on Saturday last Mme Sinico's concert party sang. With the popular lady appeared Miss Howson, Mdle Franchi, Signor Urio, and Signor Campobello; Mr Van Biene, the violoncellist, playing a couple of solos.

A new series of Quartet Concerts, under the direction of Mr Hochstetter, was begun on Wednesday last. Sir Julius Benedict's only stringed quartet, a work of great interest, was exceedingly well played by Messrs Risehari, Speelman, Otto Bernhardt, and Vieuxtemps; and the eminent composer, who was present, could not but have been gratified by the performance and the reception of the quartet. Sir Julius was called for, and bowed his acknowledgment of the hearty cheers from the gallery of the Memorial Hall, where the concert was given.

On Monday last there was a pleasant concert at the Concert Hall—one of the "Gentlemen's Concerts." A splendid performance of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony put every one in good humour for the rest of the evening. Mrs Beasley played Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia with considerable brilliancy; and in the second part this clever lady gave a selection from Chopin. Mr Santley, who was in very good voice, sang songs by Rossini, Gounod, Liszt, and Sullivan.

At Mr Hallé's concert to-morrow night the second half of the programme will be devoted to Wagner's music. Here is the whole selection:—

Overture, La Chasse du Jeune Henri (Méhul); Aria, "Una voce poco fa," Il Barbiere (Rossini)—Mme Trebelli; Ballet des Sylphes, Faust (Berlioz); Air, "Le retour des Promis" (Dessauer)—Mme Trebelli; Grand Symphony in B flat, No. 4 (Beethoven); Overture, Lohengrin; Air, "Elsa's Dream," Lohengrin—Mme Sophie Löwe; "Ride of the Walküren," Die Walküre; "Siegfried's Funeral March," Götterdämmerung; Ballad, "Traft ihr das Schiff," Fliegende Holländer—Mme Sophie Löwe; "The Fire Charm," Die Walküre; Introduction to the Third Act of Die Meistersinger; Kaiser March (Wagner).

For next week The Creation is promised, with Mme Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr Lloyd, and Mr Santley as principal singers.

THE "HEZEKIAH."

DR ARMES.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

The novelty now to be spoken of more in detail is a short oratorio, entitled Hezekiah, by Dr Philip Armes, organist of Durham Cathedral. Its production was a bold step on the part of this young composer, for it must be owned that the world has not been taught to regard with favour any work of the kind issuing from a cathedral. We look to the organists of our great churches for very respectable anthems and other compositions used "in quires and places where they sing," but about their chances of success in the concert-room no sanguine notions prevail. At the same time due account should be taken of the fact that the organ seats of our cathedrals are fast filling with a class of musicians who, if not more able than their predecessors, have greater ambition and wider views. The change is in every sense for the better. There was a time when everything great in English music sprang from, or belonged to, the Church, and although that portion of history can never repeat itself in the same sense, there is no reason why the results of music-culture within the Church should not extend beyond its walls, especially as regards oratorio, which, in strict truth, appertains more to the sacred edifice than to the concert-room. It is well, therefore, when a cathedral organist, as in Dr Armes' case, gives proof of a desire to win success in the highest branch of his vocation. Hezekiah is not a pretentious work. The story of the Hebrew monarch gives opportunity as well for imposing effects as for varied and intense expression. But Dr Armes, who is his own librettist, has confined himself to the simple narrative—first, of the deliverance of Jerusalem from the Assyrian, who "came down like a wolf on the fold;" and next, of Hezekiah's respite from death. A great deal of dramatic capital might have been made out of these incidents, but Dr Armes, laudably anxious to walk before essaying to run, has withstood the temptation, and given us that which is not dramatic at all. His work merely embodies the narrative, as told by the Prophet Isaiah, in conjunction with texts which enlarge expression or comment upon incident. From this it will readily be conceived that the book of Hezekiah includes no features calling for particular notice. As regards the music, let me say, before pointing out the shortcomings arising from want of experience, that there is ample evidence in it of ability. Dr Armes has something to say, and a mode of saying it, that shows individuality of expression as well as of thought. Otherwise he could not have written such a chorus as "This day is a day of trouble," with its expressive interludes for violoncelli, nor such a sustained and vigorous expression of thanksgiving as "O Lord, I will praise Thee," with its admirable introduction for voices alone; nor such a duet as "The Virgin, the daughter of Zion," which is none the less attractive because its first theme recalls the melody of the Egyptian trumpets in Verdi's Aida. Dr Armes is to be commended, further, for avoiding, on the one hand, the grave formality of orthodox ecclesiastical music, and on the other the licence in which church musicians sometimes fancy they must indulge to assert their freedom from church bondage. The Durham organist has in this matter found the happy mean; and his work, without being secular in style, is not too sacred in the ordinary sense of the term as applied to music. But Dr Armes has a good deal to learn before he can hope to make the best use of his natural gifts. He needs especially to study the scores of the great masters with a view to the form and spirit of their orchestration. It is one thing to manipulate the stops of a great organ, and quite another to deal with orchestral instruments, each of which has not only its own "colour," but its own general individuality. The comprehension and right employment of this individuality is the sine qua non of an orchestral composer who, otherwise, cannot give to each instrument its necessary independence while making it also subservient to the design of the whole. As usual with inexperienced writers, Dr Armes scores far too thickly, uses his brass with a liberality which robs it of much of its effect, and trusts more to the piling up of sound than to a play of light and shade, the power of contrast and the interest excited by an artistic development of the rich resources at disposal. But neglect of contrast—the most fatal of all sins of omission where music is concerned—appears elsewhere than in the orchestra. We observe it in the form of the choruses, which exhibit the prevailing uniformity of Handel united to means and appliances which put that uniformity out of date. In music this is the golden age of details. To use an architectural parallel, we have done, for better or worse, with Norman simplicity, and have advanced or retrograded, as the reader pleases, to the elaboration of florid Gothic. Composers like Dr Armes should bear this in mind, and learn from a master like Mendelssohn how to vary and enrich oratorio music. Let them notice, for instance, the cunning contrivance shown in such a chorus as "He watching over Israel." No sooner, in this beautiful example, does the first subject establish itself than a second appears different in character and calculated to make a different impression. Presently the first creeps in again, and the two are heard together for a while, before the second yields place, and the entire number is rounded into perfect symmetry. By such means emotional pleasure is varied, and intellectual perception gratified. It would be absurd to counsel a slavish adherence to this or any other form; but something like this is necessary in order that the most may be made of resources which, apart from such variety of treatment, are superfluous. Other points call for observation in Dr Armes' oratorio, but I have indicated those of vital importance, and now shall be content to express a hope, justified by the Durham organist's undoubted ability, that when he next produces a work of the same class as Hezekiah there will be observable in it not only a flow of adequate ideas, melodic power, and vigorous expression, but a mastery of modern orchestration and of the art of varied and interesting form.

The performance, conducted by the composer, was adequate to the claims of the work. Both band and chorus did their duty with zeal and success, while the soloists were one and all efficient. Miss Anna Williams sang extremely well in the duet already mentioned, though lacking necessary power in a trying air, "Therefore with joy shall ye draw water." Mdmé Patey gave the contralto music to perfection, as did Mr Lloyd that for the tenor, both artists showing they had studied the work conscientiously and thought it worthy of their high powers. Rarely, indeed, has a new composition enjoyed equal advantages from the co-operation of these eminent English singers. In the music of Hezekiah Mr Lewis Thomas proved worthy of his trust, as was to be expected in the case of an artist gifted with so fine a voice and having the advantage of such a ripe experience in the school of sacred music. Mr Thomas's rendering of the air, "I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions," was a model of unaffected and earnest expression. It is scarcely needful to add that, at the close of the performance, Dr Armes was called for and lustily congratulated upon a promising first effort in the highest walk of his art.—(Correspondence, Newcastle-on-Tyne.)

THE CROWNPRINCE OF GERMANY AND WILHELMJ.

Wiesbaden November 1877. The main topic of the day is the occurrence of their imperial Highnesses the Crownprince and Crownprincess (Princess Royal of England) having deigned to visit Wilhelmj at his countryseat at Mosbach near Biebrich. Wilhelmj enjoys on the whole great favour at the imperial court, being honoured with seldom distinctions.

Their imperial Highnesses and family had attended divine service at the English chapel and afterward's drove to Wilhelmj's habitation to take some tea. The mansion was highly decorated and the high guests were received with great cheering of the populace Mr and Mrs Wilhelmj meeting the imperial personages. A new kind of an organ a present of English admirers to Wilhelmj caused much attention, the more as Wilhelmj played some sacred music splendidly on this new instrument.

In accordance to the command of her imperial highness the Crownprincess, Wilhelmj played afterwards on the violin different compositions of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart and Handel.

The performance caused great enthusiasm, the play being much admired by the imperial visitors. Mr Wilhelmj understood it so well to entertain and amuse the distinguished personages, that they stayed till late in the evening. The Crownprincess, who, as is well known, understands very much of music being protectress of the fine arts, was highly satisfied with Wilhelmj's play and mentioned that after such exquisite performance one could barely bear to hear another violinist.

The next day Mr and Mrs Wilhelmj had the great honour conferred to them of being invited to dine with their imperial Highnesses. It is not necessary to state that Wilhelmj complied; the Crownprince and Crownprincess even invited the artist to visit them in January next at Berlin.

The above incident is making the round in all German papers, it being no record that the future German emperor ever having been so condescending towards an artist. In the same way as it is a high honour for Wilhelmj it graces the talents and the amiable character of the future German imperial family.

THE HYMN OF THE WATERS UPON OLD YEAR'S NIGHT.*

"For ever gone! for ever gone!" The river wails in mournful tone; The gentle brook those echoes In low and trembling accents sings. The star-lit lake's bright ripples sigh The refrain sad, full tenderly;	The foam-lipp'd fall, with mighty roar, Swells out the dirge, "Gone, evermore!" But hark! the surges of the sea In triumph shout "Eternity!" And thus is chang'd the requiem strain To jubilee of praise again.

A SOLDIER'S DAUGHTER.

ARRANGEMENTS have been completed by Atlantic Cable with Mrs Harriet Beecher Stowe (Author of Uncle Tom's Cabin) for the publication, from advanced sheets, of her new story, Our Folks at Paganuc, in the columns of the Christian Globe. The story abounds in dramatic incident, written in Mrs Harriet Beecher Stowe's well-known style, and full of that mysterious life-principle, the first condition of high art in every form.—(Communicated)

LEIPZIG.—The programme of the Sixth Gewandhaus Concert was composed exclusively of Haydn's Seasons.

BUENOS AYRES.—Sig. Pestalardo, manager of the Italian Theatre, is dead.

ROME.

(From a Correspondent.)

In the Austrian church of Santa Maria dell' Anima, changed for the nonce into a concert-room, Herr Ernst Schilling recently performed in Liszt's honour the "Tröstungen," a Sonata by Mendelssohn, two Fugues by Bach, and other pieces. The church was filled with the pick of the fashionable world, Roman and foreign. The Host had been removed from the sacred edifice, and the company conversed aloud without any restraint. After a few bars of the "Tröstungen," a door was flung open, the crowd fell back, and Liszt advanced to receive the Princess Karoline Sayn-Wittgenstein, who entered, followed by a servant, and enveloped in furs. She took her seat on a richly decorated chair. Liszt never left her side, and introduced to her the Baroness Haymerle, wife of the Austrian Ambassador, the Ambassador himself, and various other persons. Herr von Keudell, the German Ambassador, was not present, having gone to fetch his wife from Vienna.—The programme of the Teatro Argentina for the approaching season promises Il Guarany by Señor Gomez, Maria Teopolo, a new opera by Sig. Gaetano Crescimanno, and four performances of Signora Donadio, who will sing in La Sonnambula and Il Barbiere. In addition to this lady and Sig. Maurelli, engaged for these four performances only, the company will include Signora Fanny Visconti, Signori Marini, Antoni, Capocci, and Wagner.—The Orchestral Society has resumed its concerts, at the first of which the programme comprised Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, Liszt's "Préludes," Glinka's "Jota aragonesa," and a "Serenade" by a Danish composer named Ravukilde, long resident here.

WAIFS.

Mdlle Mila Rodani has left London without once appearing at Her Majesty's Theatre. If her secession, as is generally understood, arose from her unwillingness to undertake the part of Astrifiamante, she can only be praised for her reticence. The part is by no means suited to her, and in fact legitimately belongs to Mdlle Marimon, also a member of the company. Mdlle Rodani is engaged for the winter at Florence.

The report of Señor Gayarre's death is unfounded.

Sig. Marchetti's Ruy Blas is to be performed at Leipsic.

M. Gevaert, director of the Brussels Conservatory, is in Naples.

Herr Rappoldi has left Dresden for a concert tour through Denmark.

Sivori, the violinist, has given a successful concert at the Teatro Malibran, Venice.

The Barcelona Correo de Teatros has re-appeared under the title of the Correo Teatral.

Love, the tooth-ache, a bad temper, and tight boots are things which cannot be kept secret.

Herr Henschel's opera, Die Schöne Melusine, will be performed at the Stadttheater, Hamburg.

MM. Armand Silvestre and Gaston Serpette have read M. Carvalho a one-act comic opera, entitled Toby.

There will be four masked balls this season at the Grand Opera, Paris, with M. O. Métra as conductor.

The first German performance of M. Anton Rubinstein's Nero will take place at the Theatre Royal, Munich.

M. Edmond Galabert's Georges Bizet, Souvenirs et Correspondance, has just been published in Paris by Calmann Lévy.

Sig. Medica has taken the place of M. Melchisedeck, who, a short time since, unexpectedly left the San Carlo, Naples.

Mr Alexander Reichardt composer of "Thou art so near and yet so far," and other popular songs, has arrived in London.

Halévy's Mousquetaires de la Reine is in rehearsal at the Paris Opéra-Comique. Flotow's Ombre is, also, in preparation.

Mr Francis Howell's new cantata, The Song of the Months, is to be performed at Sevenoaks and Westerham on the 19th and 20th of December.

Under the direction of Mr Isidore de Solla, the first of a series of operas in English (the Trovatore of course!) was given at the Royal Westminster Aquarium.

The lectures now being delivered at the Alexandra Palace include one, on Thursday, by Mr Lindsay Sloper, on "Eminent Pianists." No one more equal to the task.

Sterndale Bennett's May Queen will be performed this season by the New York Vocal Association, under the direction of the newly-elected conductor, Mr Caryl Florio.

Miss Minnie Hauk has been invited by M. Kowalski and M. Vizentini to "create" the principal part in the former gentlemen's Gilles de Bretagne at the Théâtre-Lyrique.

The first performance at the Théâtre-Italien, Paris, of Sig. G. Villate's Ziba is fixed for to-night, with Mdles Litta, Sanz, Signori Tamberlik, Pandolfini, and Nannetti in the leading parts.

A picture of happiness, supreme and complete, is an American Indian lad with two hats on his head, a man's boot on one leg, a woman's gaiter on the other, and a flag of truce fluttering in the wind.

Signor Pinsuti's opera, Il Mercante di Venezia, is to be performed at Florence on the opening of the Carnival, Dec. 26, and his other opera, Mattia Carvino, during the Carnival at Pisa, and probably at Modena and Venice.

In the course of twenty-eight years Herr Theodor Wachtel has appeared more than 800 times as Chapelou in Le Postillon de Longjumeau. He first sustained the part during his third engagement at Würzburg in 1849.

Mdme Marie Roze sang before a large audience at the Brighton Aquarium on Saturday afternoon. She was re-called after each song. It is her last appearance at Brighton for some time, as she sails for America on the 20th inst.

Herr Hermann Franke leaves next week for a professional tour in Germany, but will return in January to resume the series of concerts announced for February and March, to take place in the new concert room of the Royal Academy of Music.

The Association des Artistes-Musiciens celebrated St Cecilia's Day by a performance in the church of St Eustache, Paris, of Cherubini's Messe Solennelle. The orchestra and choir were under the direction of Deldevez, and Tamberlik was one of the singers.

M. Victor Maurel, lately of the Italian Opera, Covent Garden, proposes giving this winter, in the great towns of France, a series of classical concerts. He will be assisted by Mdlle Derval, of the Opéra-Comique, M. Paul Viardot, the violinist, and other artists.

The first Symphony Concert of the Harvard Musical Association took place at the Music Hall, Boston (U.S.), on the 8th Nov. The programme included compositions by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Julius Rietz, Mozart, and Schubert. Mad. Emma Dexter, was the vocalist.

A poor monomaniac, Charles Hugo, who dubbed himself "Prince of tenors," and inventor of the Canto-Mimique, has just died at Milan. He used to recite, play, and sing Homer's Iliad, and give concerts in which the jokes of the audience formed a prominent part. Hugo was by birth Hungarian.

Herr Ignaz Brüll lately passed through Berlin on his way to Königsberg with the intention of appearing as a pianist. From Königsberg he returns to Vienna, where he will compose the recitatives required for the representations of his Goldenes Kreuz in Italy. —(Wonderfully interesting!)

Miss Florence Sanders (pupil of Mr. W. H. Holmes), played the Barcarolle and Finale of Sterndale Bennett's Concerto in F minor (No 4) at the Crystal Palace Concert on Friday morning, November 23rd, with brilliant success. The talented young pianist was called forward at the end and unanimously applauded.

ST GEORGE'S HALL, LANGHAM PLACE.—After the 26th December next, St George's Hall will be under the entire management of Messrs Alfred Reed and Corney Grain, and will, as hitherto, still be available for amateur performances, concerts, &c., on the afternoons and evenings not devoted to Mr and Mrs German Reed's entertainment.

The Dundee Amateur Musical Society has announced a performance of Mr J. F. Barnett's cantata, The Ancient Mariner, on Wednesday next, and the same composer's Paradise and the Peri in January. There is to be a chorus and orchestra numbering 150 performers, with Mr Carrodus as leader, and Mr John Kinross, conductor.

The first of the Saturday evening Handel concerts was given in the Central Hall on Saturday evening by the Alexandra Palace choir of 1,000 voices, assisted by Miss Annie Sinclair, Mr Vernon Rigby, and Mr Lachner; Mr M. Smythson conducting, and Mr F. Archer playing the organ. To-day the third of the afternoon series of concerts will be held, and on Saturday evening next another Handelian performance.

M. Koning intends devoting the Théâtre de la Renaissance exclusively to works in the opéra-comique style. He has been promised the co-operation of MM. Léo Delibes, Poise, and Salvayre. He pledges himself to give two works by Auber. [At last some Frenchmen—with a German name, by the way—remembers that France once boasted of a dramatic composer named Auber, whose equal is yet to be found!—D. P.]

Signora Marietta Venturi Ricordi, widow of the late Giovanni Ricordi, founder of the musical publishing firm, Milan, died on the 19th November, at Blevio, on the Lake of Como.

Mdlle Toni Hiller, the charming and histrionically-gifted daughter of Dr Ferdinand Hiller, was recently married to Herr Kwast, professor of the piano at the Cologne Conservatory.

The Chevalier Antoine de Kontski is at present in Paris, where he intends remaining for the winter. (He will with his brother, Leopold, the violinist, be remembered in London.)

At the first concert of the present season of the Leeds Philharmonic Society, Miss José Sherrington sang in Rossini's Stabat Mater, and was called upon to repeat the "Inflammatus."

Wagner has won his action against the Vienna music-publisher, Herr Adolf Fürstner, who is to refund the sum received from the Imperial Operahouse for the new music in the "Venusberg."

Some difficulties have arisen between M. Halanzier, M. Gounod, and M. Lemoine, the musical publisher, with regard to the libretto of Polyeucte, but it is hoped they may be settled without an appeal to the law courts.

Four new Symphonies have been found among the late Herr Herbeck's papers, and one will shortly be performed at a Philharmonic Concert. The deceased musician was in possession of a considerable number of Schubert's MSS.

The concert tour, organised by Herr Ullman, through Denmark and Sweden, has proved very successful, financially and artistically. The members of the company, Mad. Padilla-Artôt, MM. Wieniawski, Bottesini, Padilla, and Louis Brassin (instead of Alfred Jaell), are now giving concerts at some of the principal towns in Germany.

The late Herr Herbeck left no will. His musical manuscripts will be arranged by Herr Nicolaus Dumba and Professor Epstein. Last spring the deceased received an offer from Dresden of the post of Director-General of Music, but declined it, having resolved, notwithstanding many bitter experiences, not to leave Vienna.

The fifth of a series of six lectures for the "Penge Working Mens' Institute" was given on Monday December, 3rd. The lecture was by Mr Frederic Archer (organist of the Alexandra Palace) his subject, "Popular Music." It abounded with instructive hints and amusing anecdotes. Mr Archer contributed many pianoforte solos, as "illustrations," and his playing of a Fantasia on Welsh Airs, by Sir Julius Benedict, was very clever. The programme was interspersed with songs, done full justice to by Mr Greenhill. Great praise is due to Mr F. S. Knott, the Treasurer and Manager, for his interesting perseverance and unceasing energy in making these lectures as acceptable as possible. Judging from the enthusiasm of the audience, the entertainment proved a great success.—F. A. J.

LAST WORDS! *

(For Music.)

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grist, Lablache, Santley, &c. NOTES OF TRAVEL.*

Or would you prefer for a title: "Inappropriate Remarks on Things in General," O my respected patron of many years? I at once call your attention to the fact that one part of the above heading may agree too well with the contents of my articles, and that you may feel bound suddenly to stop your recent puff of my talent as a writer of operatic notices (of course, at watering-places only). By the way, was not there a slight flavour of irony about that said puff? Is it quite certain that you did not mean to characterize me as a Jack-of-all-trades? However, be that as it may,— "Bin fremd dem Literatentreiben, Kann ungedruckt im Pultbleiben."

The fact is, it amuses me to chat, purposelessly, with you, public or privatim, and I am amply rewarded for my trouble by a friendly smile from you in your study. I have, unfortunately, no connection with the ideal Corinth, where the much-lauded fair friends of Herren Eckert, Hiller, and Lindau are said to thrive, and I sometimes suffer from a yearning to unbosom myself. It matters, therefore, little to me whether you preserve the dry flowers of my ink-bottle in your herbarium of epistolary celebrities, or —. Our good friend Pohl, poor fellow, is unfortunately not in so enviable a position. It was absolutely necessary for his "Friendly Letters from Bayreuth" to be printed at any price. To ensure his pamphlet's appearing with any approach to neatness of form, he was compelled, nohlens pohlens, to dedicate it to the editor of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, the second husband of Herr Brendell's widow.

He would probably have been glad enough to select a fair being, younger and prettier than the individual chosen, as his addressee; Herr Pohl, however, like myself, seems unable to obtain letters of recommendation to — Corinth. But this is enough in the way of prelude, as the key is settled.

Thomas dead.—Meyerbeer still alive—Robert . . . but not the Devil . . . and Richard . . . but not Cœur-de-Lion.—Gratification, despite the police, of the impulse to manufacture operas.—Conductororial pantomimism.—Sansculottism in the Pianoforte Playing of the present Day.

You see, respected Sir, that I have not been in America quite for nothing; I have gone through a course of study of the Yankee newspaper style, and it is with unconcealable satisfaction that I perceive spreading over your features a look of electric expectation, like that in the case of a "fifth," at the fourth desk of the first fiddles in the hall of the Gewandhaus, when a new Canonic Suite is being played. Do not be alarmed, I am not cruel, and you shall not snap, or "go off with a bang," like the fifth in question. I can now quite imagine the feeling, for, on Thursday evening, I myself was very near it—"going off with a bang," to wit—in the Théâtre de la Monnaie, at one time with rage and at another with weariness. Had I been a crowd in myself I might have confounded the little successor of the great Auber at the Conservatory with the wholesale murderer of the same name at Bremen, translating dynamite by embêtement. (He has nothing to do with Theodor Thomas of New York.) I say: "near it;" I was saved solely by the partially very admirable manner in which the persons engaged performed their tasks, and by the friendly way in which my colleague and respected neighbour in the parquet, M. Louis Brassin, shared my torture. I shall speak further of my benefactor presently, when I have somewhat got over my excitement; the latter would render me without more ado capable even of "praising asses," were such a course not forbidden by the virtue which after we have cut our wisdom teeth becomes a duty; I mean modesty. The fact is that it was especially myself who was the "ass," for having had the hardihood to appeal from the miserable impression produced on me by the perusal of Hamlet in the pianoforte score to the impression acoustically receivable from a scenic representation.

The empty nothingness, devoid of all special physiognomy, which marks Thomas's music, as likewise its pretentious conceit, was then for the first time apparent to me in all its glaring brightness. Even in purely technical matters, such as the instrumentation, where Meyerbeer has shown us that, like Vatel, a man may by skilful preparation render even boot-soles palatable, I was most bitterly disappointed. The only miserable joke my ear came across was in the second act: the goings-on, not so droll as repulsive, of a saxophone which was new to me, a bastard of bass-clarinette and English horn, a pair of wooden bellows, certainly not generated by any natural combination, and therefore, thank heaven, not destined to live. Do not think, my dear Herr Senff, that I went to the theatre afflicted with German prejudices or specific musical whims. The sounds of Fidelio, the opera with which I had entered on my duties as conductor, had completely died out of my ears, and, shortly before leaving Hanover, I had thrown my whole heart into directing the production of La Muette de Portici and Lucrezia Borgia. Still less, though a Wagnerite de la veille (I have been one for thirty-five years, that is, from the very first performance of Rienzi at Dresden, in October, 1842), am I to be reckoned among the adversaries of the great Giacomo; on the contrary. With the approbation of my new chief and old colleague, Herr von Bronsart, I hope to give during this present season a comparatively model performance of Les Huguenots, such as the latter work needs (unfortunately!) more than Lohengrin, which, by the way, can be and is given as it ought to be given, in Munich alone, where it is so performed par ordre de Mufti. Nor has my reverence for Shakspeare ever excited me to consider it a crime, in MM. Verdi and Taubert, for instance, to transfer Macbeth to music-paper, though I cannot help thinking that with his Lustige Weiber von Windsor (Merry Wives of Windsor) Otto Nicolai did the great Briton higher honour. The boldness of philosophizing in notes (the setting of the soliloquy, "To be, or not to be," to a certain extent the most endurable bit in the opera, is, however, purloined from Berlioz' Damnation de Faust) would, moreover, not have offended me in the least; I became inured to this sort of thing, prompted by earnest intention, from Tristan und Isolde. So, naively sine ira et studio, I listened to M. Thomas's strains ("abgeschiedene Vielfraßerei," as David sings in Die Meistersinger), and, thanks to M. Brassin's spiritual consolation, continued listening up to Ophelia's scene of natation at the end of the fourth act. The result is short: a most deep-seated conviction on my part of the rottenness of this usurper of the inheritance left by Meyerbeer, Halévy, and Auber, and the most open-mouthed astonishment at those gentlemen who lay down the law, and who are incapable of distinguishing apparent life and apparent death. There is no doubt that M. Thomas writes correctly, and "academically," if you like, something in the same fashion that M. Jules Simon conducts politics; but mere smoke is the most the absence of talent in him can produce, accompanied, as the latter is, by such importance that, in its want of character and style, it cannot clear even the rock, want of taste, a rock generally avoided by educated French musicians. Verdi with all his former roughness, and even with his present queer notions, is quite another kind of fellow, and M. Thomas is not above levying the most continuous loans on him. I say nothing of Gounod; that composer's want of character, or euphemistically speaking, his "eclecticism," has method about it, and in his own circle he has notions which his intellectual guardians did not possess before him. In a word, he belongs at all events to the first of the two classes of operatic composers in which I would divide the entire species—though the worthy non-elect among the so-called "German" incapables desirous of musicalizing dramatically will not agree very cordially with the notion—the said two classes being those who can add something to the hurdy-gurdy, and those who are compelled to borrow the most necessary things from it. The dislike I entertain for those of the last sort—a dislike I am least capable of surmounting when, devoured by the same thirst for success as their more frivolous but more highly gifted brethren, they pretend to the orchestra and the critics (they are not able to swindle the singers and the public), that it is solely from "modesty" that they neglect the means of success—induces me now personally to beg Herr von Flotow's pardon for all the rude things once written and spoken by me against him. When, at a period of such operatic poverty, of such noisy sterility as the present, Master Giacomo is loudly cried down, and the pigmies of to-day, jealous of his triumphs, appeal, as they cry him down, to the Olympian audacities which Robert Schumann hurled against the presumed Antichrist, forty, and Richard Wagner twenty-five years ago, we must simply rep'y: Quod licet Jovi non licet bovi. Schumann understood just as much about an opera as Rossini understood about a symphony; Wagner was guilty of injustice with greater consciousness, though he may be excused in consideration of the hard laws of a "struggle for existence." But "everything has happened before," says Ben Akiba; let the reader call to mind how adverse Weber was to Beethoven, &c. Epigoni, however, who do not deserve being named in the same day with Wagner, even as a specific musician, and whose most striking success will never equal the flauto d'estime achieved by Genoveva, should, before they are bold enough to try to write operas, poke their respected noses a trifle further into the scores of men like Meyerbeer, Halévy, and Auber, and see whether they possess sufficient talent to derive some little practical benefit from the process. The more sensible among them might then come down a peg or two and grow rather disheartened, which would be all the better for poor operatic conductors. For the others I will cite the winged words of Arthur Schopenhauer: "When a book and a head cannon together and produce a hollow sound, that is, once for all, not the fault of the book."

* From the Leipsic Signale, edited by Herr Senff.

But do you not think, my dear Herr Senff, that it is time for me to conclude my digression? "The art of wearying consists in holding nothing back," says a French moralist. I will, therefore, cure my attack of sentimentality by a bit of triviality, and quickly tell you something which will interest you most deeply. It is that Mdle Hamackers, though no longer a young, was a very excellent, and, vocally, blameless, Ophelia, and that M. Devoyod, who played Hamlet for the first time, achieved a success as brilliant as it was merited. The chorus astonished me by its precision and freshness; and the orchestra was, in every respect, wonderfully good. I was agreeably impressed by the deep depth of the space it occupied, so indispensable an element for the promotion of discreet accompaniment, without anything threadbare about the tone; I was less edified with the arrangement which strives to realize the old periwig-principle of separating the strings from the wind with the reform introduced at Berlin by "Cæsar" Spontini, nearly sixty years ago (and long since adopted in large towns like Vienna, Munich, Dresden, &c.). It is true that bow instruments ran correctly like a red thread through the whole territory, but the contrast, equally important for audience and performers, between brass and wood had been neglected. The person of the evening who possessed the greatest attraction for me was the conductor, M. Dupont, a brother of the well-known virtuoso on the piano and Conservatory-professor. He is one of the most circumspect, most gifted with delicate feeling, most "ubiquitousish," and consequently most warm-blooded and most active of his "caste." These conductorial pantomimics ruffle me less than others, as I know the reasons which make them necessary in complicated modern works. The inhabitants of small German towns, accustomed to pitiless metronomes of flesh and (not too much) blood, who, for instance, have never witnessed a good operatic performance in Italy, take great umbrage at them, and, not having the courage to look over the conductor, are apt to complain that their enjoyment is interfered with. Il est difficile de contenter tout le monde et son père. Such must be the consolation of a man when people find fault with him, and when, not having learnt to squint, he is unable to combine the discharge of his duty, which is to signal orders for preparation, of encouragement, and of animadversion to the four quarters of the compass, with a stylobatic bearing of the upper portion of his body.

And now, by way of farewell to-day, a word of thanks to my faithful companion in suffering, M. Brassin! I cannot tell you, O my respected patron, what good it did me at length to meet once more a "real pianist in trowsers." Such beings, especially when real individualities, have now become as rare as the "pianists in petticoats" have become legionary. And—your hands on your hearts, ye admirers of the fair sex—is there one pianoforte virtuoso who can artistically reproduce, for instance, Beethoven's G major concerto, Op. 58, unless he knows the score inside-out and upside-down? But can any fair pianists do so, except their queen, Mad. Clara Schumann! It is not difficult to draw a conclusion. Ladies' emancipation is beginning to discredit pianoforte playing. The gap occasioned by Carl Tausig's early death has not yet been filled up; I believe, however, that it may be by M. Louis Brassin. Despite his grey hair, he is as fresh, bodily and intellectually, as he is mature; he has, hitherto, not condescended to be his own propagandist, though his talent, as a composer as well as an executant, would have fully justified such a course. He sacrificed long since all interest in himself to his "Nibelungen belief." His new paraphrases of fragments from Der Ring are the best and most useful things I have seen. Yet he, by no means, belongs to the non-independent Bayreutherians,* whose organ is the Fritzian Monitor of leading Motives. His three new pianoforte studies: "Impressions d'Automne," for performance at concerts, I warmly recommend to all those among my colleagues who are good enough to consider me not quite incompetent in such matters. He is moreover meditating a second Concerto—so it is time to think about the first.

Perhaps it is rather like offering you mustard after dinner, my dear Herr Senff,† if I recall to your mind an amusing anecdote, dating from 1862, and related of Dr Liszt and Chevalier de Kontaki at Darmstadt; but it is worth warming up again.

Attired in his most magnificent Spanish uniform à la Marfori, the Polish martyr in search of court-concerts called upon the Grand Ducal Capellmeister, and solemnly offered, in the guise of a present, the first copy of his latest offspring in the instructive line: L'Indispensable du Pianiste, to the said Grand Ducal official. "My dear friend," observed the latter, "when you again want to indulge in a bit of humbug, you may as well do it in a slightly less rococo style. For my part I can assure you, as a person not entirely devoid of experience in such affairs, that I know of only one real indispensable du pianiste—and that is a decent pair of trowsers—Countersigned,—Quant ben Bulew."

THE RED CROSS KNIGHT.

(A Moral Mediæval Ballad.)

The wind was cold, the sky was dark,
It was too early for the lark
Which slept within its nest,
When sounded loud the clarion clear.
The Red Cross Knight growled out,
"I hear!"
And turned again to rest.

Upon his pillow sank his head;
Once more it roused him from his bed,
That clarion at his door! [cried.
"Awake, Sir Knight!" the Page-boy
"All right!" a drowsy voice replied,
"Just wait five minutes more."

Again, again the trumpet-call
Came echoing from the outer wall;
He knew he must arise:
So out of bed he jumped, and rubbed
His shiv'ring form (they never tubbed),
And yawned with watery eyes.

His hands were red, his feet were cold,
He felt infirm, and weak, and old;
His Squire brought a light:
Then to his lips strange oaths arose—
His eyes were red, bright red his nose;
He was a red, cross Knight!

Then first he donned his shirt of mail—
A trifle stiff about the tail—
Which made the Warrior frown!
In armour he encased his toes,
And, with a view to warm his nose,
He kept his beaver down.

Then, ere his charger he bestrode,
From off his mind he took a load
By kicking left and right;
The Seneschal, the Warder, Page,
He kicked, nor cared for youth nor age,
This very red, cross Knight!

Loud cried the Squire, "En avant!"
The surly Knight growled "Get along!"
"You stupid ass!" he said.
The snorting horse the sharp spur feels,
And throws, with two upheaving heels,
Its rider o'er its head!

Within an hour there came a Leech,
Who found him wandering in his speech,
With hot and fevered brow.
"He went upon his head," quoth he;
"The consequence of which will be
That he'll go off it now."

Imaginary Turks he slew,
As fiercer and more red he grew,
Then sank, as slain in fight!
"He," says his monumental stone,
"Was, of all Red Cross Knights ere known,
The Reddest, Crossiest Knight."

THE MORALS.

One Moral is—Your temper curb.
Another—Sleepers don't disturb
Whatever hour may strike.
No one is bound to be exact;
Sleep, or arise, when called. In fact,
You just do what you like.

OPERA IN FRANCE AND NORTH GERMANY.

Reminiscences of 1873.

By MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

The Opera in London being always sung in Italian, the compositions of the French, German, or any other school, in order to be introduced there, must necessarily be adapted; and however welcome they may be in this form to amateurs—who indeed have to accept them thus, or not at all—a certain incongruity cannot well be avoided. For even supposing the singers and the work to be of the same nationality, as is not unfrequently the case, since our opera companies are truly polyglot, the former have still to sing their music in a foreign language, and are thus, to a greater or less degree, in proportion to the versatility of their talent, hampered in their ability of interpretation. Then, again, it often happens that the dialogue in the original version was spoken, and so musical recitatives must be composed, spoken dialogue being, for some reason impossible to divine, seeing how sweet and flowing the language is, tabooed on the Italian opera stage. And these recitatives no matter how skillfully prepared and fitted, inevitably convey, to some extent at any rate, a sense of patchwork. The primary idea of the composer—unavoidably, it may be—is sacrificed. The joinings, however artistic, are—only joinings after all. The foregoing remarks, however, are no plea, nor should they be, for confining the repertory of this or that theatre to any particular school. Opera, like everything else, thrives best by interchange and variety. The wider the list of composers included in the plan of any operatic management, the higher does that management stand in the estimation not only of the dilettanti, but in that of the general public. Only it must be acknowledged that when an opera of one country is presented in the language and by the artists of another, however acceptable and successful it may be, something is lost in the transition—it is not quite the same thing. And that some operas are more capable than others of adaptation to the Italian stage, is a fact no less certain than difficult of explanation. All frequenters of Covent Garden will admit that Auber's Fra Diavolo, as there given, has in it a "go," if the expression may be allowed, which could not be exceeded in the Opéra-Comique—its original home. Yet the same composer's Le Domino Noir, which pairs off with Rossini's Il Barbiere—than which no higher praise can be given—when produced there, left an impression of clumsiness difficult to be comprehended by those who have only witnessed its effect, and its undying popularity, in Paris. The Oberon of Weber was Italianized for Her Majesty's Theatre in 1860; and, notwithstanding the difficulty of efficiently casting so elaborate a production, retained its hold upon the audiences until the destruction of the Old House seven years afterwards. Der Freyschütz is different. It has been refitted for foreign stages by M. Hector Berlioz and Sir Michael Costa, the merits of whose arrangements have been justly upheld, each by their separate circle of admirers. But the idiosyncrasy of the opera is such, and the goblin legend is so purely national, that it cannot be disguised either by French or Italian dressing-up. Grand as its music may be, there is an angularity in Der Freyschütz, when given elsewhere, impossible wholly to round off or conceal. To be presented in its most effective form, it should be heard in Germany, and in Germany alone. When lately performed at Hanover, the overture was superbly played, although not more so than it has been, times out of number, in England and elsewhere. In the very first chorus, however, after the rise of the curtain, and even yet more in the mocking refrain to Killian's air, which immediately follows, the difference was indescribably great. For the chorallists not only sang and acted, but contrived somehow to throw a distinctness and individuality into their respective parts, which was to a stranger nothing less than extraordinary; and throughout the three acts every person, from the highest to the lowest, concerned in the representation, conveyed the idea of being thoroughly at home. Of the principals, Kaspar was intrusted to Herr Bletsacher, said to be past his prime, a fact which would otherwise be difficult to discover, for his voice and method were irreproachable, his general performance very striking. The Max was Herr M. Müller, who is engaged here for two years, and is at present in the first stage of his career. Herr Müller is an excellent actor, but does not seem as yet to have acquired complete control over his organ, a resonant and powerful tenor, though it would not be easy to take exception to his singing in the famous "Durch die Walder" ("Through the forest"), which could scarcely have been rendered more melodiously or correctly. The Agathe, Fraulein Aglaia Orgeni, formerly a pupil of Pauline Viardot, may be recollected as having sung at Covent Garden early in the season of 1866, but did not remain in England long enough to confirm the good impression which her few appearances then created. The voice of Fraulein Orgeni can never have been really fine, and, whether from some temporary cause, or physical decay, is just now nearly extinguished, but both as a singer and an actress she proves worthy of her great preceptress, being "every inch" an artist. In her delivery of the well-known scena, "Nie nacht mir der Schlummer," breadth, sentiment, expression, could not possibly be surpassed; vocal power alone was wanting. Fraulein Pauli, a daughter of the admirable leading violinist of the theatre, was the representative of Aennchen. She is only twenty years of age, and her powers are as yet undeveloped, but she played the part nicely, and sang it very carefully. Aennchen would seem to be traditionally handed over to a comprimaria, although the music is of no mean importance, and as an acting part its gaiety forms a most effective foil to the pensive melancholy which distinguishes Agathe. This is not, however, the only instance of a rôle—and its music—sacrificed, in the first place, to that professional jealousy and caprice which lead vocalists to imagine that the co-existence of "two suns" is as impossible in the operatic firmament as elsewhere—until by long custom it has come to be regarded as of merely secondary consequence. True that, out of respect for Mozart, Madame Viardot once sang Papagena, in Il Flauto Magico—at Covent Garden, in 1851—to the Pamina of Grisi; but then Madame Viardot was in every sense an artist such as few have ever been, and self-abnegation in the cause of art is a quality unhappily rare. Something of the same feeling might be traced in the present performance of Der Freyschütz, when Herr Schüssler, by accepting the small part of Ottokar, who only appears in the last scene, not only reflected credit on himself, but, as might be concluded, raised the character to a prominence of which in less able hands it might not have been deemed capable. The perfection of the orchestra and chorus need not be dilated upon, whilst in the matter of spectacle the Wolf's Glen, with its practicable waterfall and burning trees, its fiery skulls and phantom processions, had so awful a reality that it was absolutely a relief when the curtain fell upon such a chapter of horrors. Possibly the incantation scene was never more powerfully or graphically depicted before.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

(From the "Daily Telegraph," Dec. 10.)

The past week was neither the least active nor the least interesting of Mr Mapleson's pre-Christmas season, several of the more attractive operas before given being repeated, and one added that never fails to draw a "house." Ruy Blas, of course, figured in the list, for the operatic public is large enough to require several representations, in order that curiosity might be exhausted. But it becomes more and more evident that Marchetti's work cannot hold its ground in this country, where amateurs care little for pretty music if attended by dramatic weakness or impropriety. Should Mr Mapleson, or any other manager, bring out a light opera from the pen of the Italian master, there would be a pre-disposition in its favour; and that is all that has come of Ruy Blas. Faust was given in the course of the week, with an important change of cast; the part of Marguerite being assumed by Mdle Marimon, and that of Mephistopheles by Signor Foli. There is good reason to doubt whether Mdle Marimon does well when she plays characters of sentiment. She is a brilliant singer—so brilliant that very few indeed are her equals—and as a comedian, using the word in its restricted sense, she is frequently happy (witness the music scene in La Figlia); but the range of her dramatic feeling is narrow, and parts like that of Marguerite are outside its limits. This, however, by no means implies that Mdle Marimon's performance on the present occasion was destitute of charm, and it will be accepted without question that her singing of the air des bijoux met with extreme favour. As a vocal display nothing better could have been desired; while throughout the opera proof appeared that a vocalist of rare acquirements was in presence. Signor Foli reassumed his old character under conditions of much difficulty, because year by year the public grow not only more familiar with, but more appreciative of, the impersonation which, immeasurably before all others, they regard as ideal. Comparisons may be odious, but are inevitable; and it is only fair to point out how, as in this case, an artist, without directly challenging them, may be placed at a disadvantage through their operation. There is not a doubt that in every scene Signor Foli's Mephistopheles was put alongside that of M. Faure—sometimes with an unfavourable result which was, also, necessarily unjust. The assumption should have been regarded for itself alone, and given the credit due to an exercise of laudable ambition warranted by the artist's resources. That Signor Foli was loudly applauded for his singing of the Calf of Gold song and the serenade it is superfluous to mention. The other leading characters were sustained by Mdle de Belocca (Siebel) and Signor Runcio (Faust).

On Thursday, Mr Mapleson added Don Giovanni to the popular repertory, and was rewarded for so doing by a very full house. Mozart, indeed, as represented by Le Nozze di Figaro, Il Flauto Magico, and his masterpiece, is the hero of the season. The Wagner fever, which raged so furiously amongst us for some time, subsided—it was but "as the crackling of thorns under a pot"—without affecting, in ever so slight a degree, general content with opera as Mozart left it. So it must ever be when the dominion of pure and true music is assailed. You cannot make a fantastic slave of that divinity. She has a classic habit of winning her cause, and old "Timotheus," even if his name be Wagner, has to "yield the prize." Don Giovanni was very fairly cast on Thursday evening, with Mdme Marie Roze as Donna Anna, Mdle Valleria as Donna Elvira, and Mdle de Belocca as Zerlina, the male characters being represented by Signor Bettini (Don Ottavio), Signor Del Puente (Don Giovanni), Signor Monari Rocca (Leporello), Signor Zoboli (Masetto), and Signor Brocolini (Il Commendatore). A strong cast, measured by some we wot of, this can hardly be called, but it sufficed for the pleasure of the audience, and did in an acceptable degree a measure of justice to the work in hand. The successes of the evening when Don Giovanni is performed can, as a rule, be foretold with small danger of error. But the rule has exceptions, and it sometimes happens that the public, passing over their most favourite numbers, give to others the largest measure of approval. This was, to some extent, the case on Thursday. "La ci darem," sung by Mdle de Belocca and Signor Del Puente, met with its usual encore; but, on the other hand, "Batti, batti" excited no demand for a repetition, nor did the favourite trio of masks, while the supreme reward was bestowed on Signor Del Puente's "Deh vieni," and Signor Bettini answered two calls after "Il mio tesoro." Signor Bettini, by the way, who always sings the music of Don Ottavio very carefully, had a marked success throughout the evening, warm applause, and a re-call, for example, following his delivery of "Dalla sua pace." Into minute criticism of the performance it is hardly worth while to enter. Enough, as regards the leading characters, that Mdme Roze made a strenuous effort to succeed in the important part she assumed, that Mdle Valleria was intelligent and artistic as Elvira, and that Mdle de Belocca looked charming in her pretty Spanish dress; while, if not a model Don, Signor Puente offered a very fair conception of a proverbially difficult rôle. The band and chorus were not less efficient than in other operas equally well known. Der Freischütz on Friday and Les Huguenots on Saturday brought the week's work to an end.

This week is the last of the present season, and, from the announcements already made, it seems that the production of La Forza del Destino, with Signor Verdi's amendments, has been postponed. Judging from what the public know of the opera in its old form, Mr Mapleson need not distress himself by fancying that he has given cause for serious disappointment.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

We subjoin the programme of the last fortnightly meeting of professors and students, which took place on Saturday, Dec. 8:—

Fugue, in B flat, organ (Bach)—Mr G. F. Smith, pupil of Dr Steggall; Two-part Song, "Greeting" (Mendelssohn)—Miss Sophia E. Jones* and Miss R. Dunn* (pupils of Mr Regaldi)—accompanist, Mrs Clarke; Fantasia, in C minor, pianoforte (Mozart)—Miss E. M. Turner, pupil of Mr W. H. Holmes; Song (MS.), "A Glimpse" (Charlton T. Speer, Student)—Mr George, pupil of Professor Macfarren and Mr F. R. Cox—accompanist, Mr C. T. Speer; Sonata, in F, pianoforte (Paradies)—Miss Alice Davis, pupil of Mr H. R. Evers; Slow Movement from Concerto in D, violoncello (Raff)—Mr Elliott,* pupil of Mr Pettit; Recitativo, "Oh patria," ed Aria, "Di tanti palpiti," Tancredi (Rossini)—Miss Bashford, pupil of Mr Benson—accompanist, Mr Hooper; Prelude and Fugue, in C sharp, No. 3, pianoforte (Bach)—Miss Fosskett, pupil of Mr Walter Macfarren; Sonata, in B flat, Op. 65, No. 4, organ (Mendelssohn)—Mr Corke, pupil of Mr Rose; Adagio, in D (MS.), pianoforte and violin (F. Sewell Southgate, Student)—Mr. F. Sewell Southgate, pupil of Professor Macfarren and Mr F. B. Jewson, and Miss Julia de Nolte (Professors' Scholar), pupil of Mr Sinton; Song, "Orpheus with his lute" (Sullivan)—Miss Cornish, pupil of Mr Goldberg—accompanist, Mr Hooper; Sonata, in E, Op. 14, No. 1, pianoforte (Beethoven)—Miss Edith James, pupil of Mr F. B. Jewson; Cantata Exulta (Carissimi), the accompaniment by Ridley Prentice—Miss L. Evans and Miss Henderson, pupils of Mr F. R. Cox—accompanist, Miss Ethel Gould (Lady Goldsmid Scholar); Dix-sept Variations Sérieuses, in D minor, pianoforte (Mendelssohn)—Miss Fortey, pupil of Sir Julius Benedict; Quartet (MS.), "Blow, blow, thou vernal gale" (A. Jarratt, Student)—Miss Kendal, Miss E. Thomas, Mr Seligman, and Mr A. Jarratt, pupils of Mr H. Banister, Mr Gilardoni, Mr Garcia, and Mr Fiori; Duet, in E flat, pianoforte (Silas)—Miss Law* and Miss Holmes, pupils of Mr Kemp; Air, "The Morning Prayer," Eli (Costa)—Miss Lily Twyman, pupil of Mr Fiori—accompanist, Miss Alice Heathcote; Sonata, in F, violin, double-bass, and pianoforte (Corelli)—Mr Sutton (pupil of Mr Sinton), Mr C. B. Waud (pupil of Mr White), and Mr Sewell, Balfé Scholar (pupil of Mr Westlake).

CARL ROSA AT MANCHESTER.

The Manchester Examiner and Times speaks as follows about the production of Otto Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor by the Carl Rosa company:—

"To Mr Carl Rosa's enterprise and discrimination the amateurs of Manchester have been indebted in former seasons for many previously impossible gratifications; not only has he produced well-known operas with a completeness in every department seldom secured in the provinces, but he has permitted us to hear important works which until his day had been either entirely neglected or seldom given. It is pleasant to remember that Mr Rosa's confidence in the success of good music well performed met with great encouragement in the past, and assuredly it is not less so to record that his production of Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor was received with such favour by a crowded house as to warrant the belief that it will become one of the most popular in the repertory of the company. This opera, though very popular in Germany, and has been given in London at both Italian Operahouses, has been almost unknown to the English public. Why it is not easy to determine; the libretto, compiled by Dr Mosenthal, includes the most telling situations in Shakspeare's comedy, and the music from first to last is thoroughly attractive. Bright, genial, and graceful, often brilliant, and never commonplace, it combines to a remarkable extent some of the pleasantest features of the melodious Italian with the more scholarly characteristics of the German school. The composer, thoroughly impressed by the spirit of the comedy, allows nothing to interfere with the irresistibly humorous story, and, in spite of alterations, the lover of Shakspeare is never offended. In the English version, by Mr Hersee, the dialogue is, indeed, taken entirely from Shakspeare, and thus, though the author has not attempted to intensify the local colour of his opera by any affectation of the style of early English music, or, indeed, by any free use of archaic forms, the language of Shakspeare must always tend to make this opera dear to an English public."

Our respected Lancashire contemporary then enters into an analysis of the music, in connection with certain situations and incidents of the plot, which London readers, who have been regaled with many columns, in many newspapers, on the same subject, would hardly take the pains to read. From this he goes on to the performance, his appreciation of which is for the most part worth quoting:—

"Of the performance we are able to speak in the highest terms. Mr Rosa never produces a new work without due rehearsal, and in this case Manchester had the advantage of successful repetitions at Edinburgh, Aberdeen, and Leeds. The scenery was all exceedingly pretty, the costumes picturesque and artistic, the 'business' of the forest scene was very well managed, and the principal artists—we may add the band and chorus also—might have been as familiar with The Merry Wives of Windsor as with The Bohemian Girl and Maritana. Miss Gaylord has seldom been seen and heard to greater advantage than as Mrs Ford; she sings the music, to which her sympathetic voice is admirably adapted, with fluency and intelligence, and she acts with unfailing spirit and vivacity. Miss Yorke is also very effective as Mrs Page; she must have studied the music with care, and she has not often acted more cleverly. Miss Cora Stuart in Anne Page shows herself possessor of a sweet though not very powerful voice, her song in the last act and duet with Fenton being both very favourably received. Sir John Falstaff is, of course, the hero of the opera, and Mr Rosa is fortunate in having so versatile and accomplished a singer as Mr Aynsley Cook to take the part. No character, indeed, comes amiss to this very clever artist, and his Falstaff is assuredly one of his best parts. He sings the music with great care and with all the requisite gusto; his love-making scenes and his carousals are equally happy, and his terror excites our laughter by perfectly legitimate means. Mr Cook, indeed, may be complimented for avoiding extravagance in scenes where exaggeration might perhaps be pardoned. We do not always expect high-class Shakspearian comedy on the operatic stage, but the fat Knight has often been less faithfully represented in the legitimate drama than by Mr Aynsley Cook in Nicolai's opera. Another exceedingly effective impersonation, which we do not hesitate to call Shakspearian, was Mr Lyall's Master Slender. The 'make-up' of this consummate and truly original lyric comedian would excite the envy of Mr Marks, and his quiet humour might be studied with advantage by many actors supposed to be comic, who are often nothing if not obtrusive. Mr J. W. Turner's Fenton is careful and measured; he sings the music with nice feeling, and we have seldom heard him use his fine voice more skillfully. We have had occasion to notice the conscientious and painstaking efforts of Mr Ludwig in less important parts, and it is gratifying to record his satisfactory appearance as Master Ford; as singer and actor he contributed materially to the general effect. Similar praise may be given to Mr Snazelle. Mr Dodd, as Dr Caius, is droll, if not quite according to tradition. The Merry Wives of Windsor was enthusiastically received, and with excellent reason."

Let us hope that a similar reception may be accorded when Mr Carl Rosa introduces this English version of Nicolai's opera to his London patrons at the Adelphi.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

The fourth of Mr John Boosey's Ballad Concerts was given on Wednesday evening. St James's Hall was completely filled, and numbers were sent away, unable to gain admittance. Mr Sims Reeves and Mr Santley, both at their posts, were received with unusual warmth. Mr Reeves was in excellent voice. "The Requitel," "Come into the garden, Maud," and "My pretty Jane" produced more than usual demonstrations of approval, and vociferous demands for repetition; but Mr Reeves would only return to the platform and bow his acknowledgments. Vincent Wallace's "The Bellringer," Stephen Adams' new ballad, "The Tar's Farewell" (words by Mr F. C. Burnand), and Molloy's "The Vagabond" were Mr Santley's contributions to the programme. He was compelled to sing again the first and second, but resisted the demand for a repetition of the last. Mr Edward Lloyd and Mr Maybrick, established favourites at Mr Boosey's concerts, met with their accustomed success. Mr Lloyd, after "My sweetheart when a boy" (which he sang admirably), was unanimously recalled; and Mr Maybrick, after "The Village Blacksmith," was encored, when he gave his popular song, "Nancy Lee." The London Vocal Union, headed by Mr Frederick Walker, took their usual "positions," and sang their best. It would have been more gallant to accord "place aux dames;" but better late than never; we will make the amende honorable the first time we have a chance of again writing about them. We can only now state that Mrs Osgood was as attractive as ever; Mme Antoinette Sterling (sterling as ever) was called upon to repeat "The Old Sailor-Wife;" Miss Orridge (looking interesting as ever) sang with true pathos Henry Smart's beautiful song, "The Lady of the Lea;" Miss Beata Francis, a rising young vocalist, met with general approval; and Miss Margaret Bucknall, in Beethoven's Polonaise in C and Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," confirmed the good impression made at previous concerts. Mr Sidney Naylor accompanied the vocal music. The next concerts are announced for Saturday morning, January 5th, and Wednesday evening, January 16th.

THE DRAMA AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

The Boulonnais are a strange race. They like grand operas, opera comique and bouffe, demand during the winter months drama, comedy, vaudeville, &c., but never patronise them. Since Le Tour du Monde has been withdrawn M. Froment has placed on the boards of the Salle Monsigny Les Dominos Roses and L'Etrangère (not to mention Le Bossu, for the delectation of a Sunday audience), interpreted by the same talented company which drew crowded houses for 25 consecutive nights with Le Tour du Monde. Well acted, and well put on the stage, these pieces were worth a visit. "Mauvais temps," &c., is an excuse; but why did a hurricane burst during most of the run of Le Tour du Monde, and yet the house filled? The fact is, the Boulonnais is an animal who must have his ears tickled by music quoi que ce soit, and if a hurdy-gurdy were only to put in an appearance in a drama, all the world (Boulonnais world) and his wife would flock to hear it. Les Dominos Roses was perfectly played, but wanted a "little go." Les Dominos Roses will be repeated on Saturday, preceded by Le petit Faust. L'Etrangère was also well acted. Les Cloches de Comeville, with an old friend, M. Kellotz (tenor), and a new soprano, will be given to-morrow. A concert is being got up for the benefit of aged "pumpers" (i.e., sapeurs pompiers), who, having assisted at so many fires during half a century, want to be put out themselves. After being put out of the service, they want to be kept warm!

Boulogne-sur-Mer, Dec. 5, 1877.

WEIMAR.—The Biblical opera of Dalila, by M. Camille de Saint-Saëns, has been produced at the Grand Ducal Theatre.

* This has nothing to do with Oxford degrees.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A WOULD-BE PIANIST.—The Sonate Melancolique of Moscheles only consists of a single movement, in F sharp minor. Moscheles published a grand sonata in E major, which he dedicated to Beethoven. This should be heard at the Popular Concerts—where not a note of Moscheles has ever been given. A hint to Agnes Zimmermann.

INQUIRER.—All we have to do with public artists is to criticise them as representatives of the art they profess. How they may live privately, is their own affair—not ours.

DR BLIDGE.—Dr Bledge be blowed! 500,000 bouquets! How long did it take him to count them? And who allowed him to inspect them?

DILETTANTE.—The Matrimonio Segreto of Cimarosa has been played at both our Italian operahouses—under Mr Gye, as under Mr Lumley.

AN OLD OPERA-GOER.—Mlle Anna de Belocca was encored in the second air given to Siebel in Faust, on the night to which our correspondent refers. Moreover, she well deserved the compliment, having sung the air to perfection. We quite agree with "An old Opera-goer" as to the beauty of Mlle de Belocca's voice, and the quiet grace of her acting.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The Office of the MUSICAL WORLD is at Messrs DUNCAN DAVISON & Co.'s, 244, Regent Street, corner of Little Argyl Street (First Floor). It is requested that Advertisements may be sent not later than Thursday. Payment on delivery.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1877.

THE Manchester Examiner and Times, in noticing a performance of Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, by Mr Carl Rosa's excellent company, objects to certain "anachronisms" in the maps hung on the screen in Mr Ford's house, and further asks—"What was Bardolph smoking, we wonder? Not tobacco, surely, near two centuries before Sir Walter Raleigh?" About the screen anachronisms of Mr Ford we have nothing to say;—as well talk (ask the learned Dr Hueffer) of Rome being enslaved to a bald-pate Nero:—

—et calvo serviret Roma Neroni!

But with regard to the other part of it, we may be permitted to observe, that the Falstaff of The Merry Wives of Windsor is by no means the Falstaff of the days of Henry IV. and Prince Hal. Heaven forbid! It was a whim of Queen Elizabeth's to make the fat Sir John what he could never, under any circumstances, possibly have been—in love, that is to say, with other than himself, or Mrs Quickly (on conditions). So, then, let Bardolph smoke as him listeth. This Bardolph was a Bardolph of Queen Elizabeth's imagining; and Sir Walter Raleigh, who composed his History of the World in the Tower, had previously put down a velvet cloak for his future "Bess," in order that she might not wet her precious feet—which she did all the same, whereof we have concurrent testimony. Falstaff in the "Wives" is a miserable Falstaff compared with the Falstaff who stretched out two men in buckram into eleven (seven of whom he "paid"); or the Falstaff who said, "Two misbegotten knaves in Kendal Green let drive at me behind—it was so dark, Hal, thou couldst not see thine hand;" or the Falstaff who slew Percy, after letting Douglas ride over him "a kimbo;" or the Falstaff who said to Poins—"I call thee coward! I'd see thee d—d ere I call thee coward;" or the Falstaff who described Master Shallow, and who—who—who did, and uttered, many other things of note worth a dozen "Merry Wives." Falstaff is not Falstaff in the "Wives," and Shakspeare did no more than write up the "doubtful" (Wagner) play called The Merchant of Venice, comprising (Bassanio excepted) hardly a single character that is not more or less contemptible (so unlike Shakspeare).

Could Otto Nicolai have painted musically, or musically painted, the real Falstaff? No—a thousand times no; no more than could Michael William Balfe. Ne sutor ultra crepidam. He could (feebly, it must be admitted) paint such a fiery Templar as the one conceived by that greatest of literary "scenic artists," Walter Scott; but he had no more idea of Shakspeare than a hammer, a needle, or a scolopendra, of the Immortality of the Soul. Therefore, let Bardolph smoke in peace, and perform his functions. Bardolph was hanged for stealing "a pix of little price" (ask Pistol), before the Merry Wives was dreamed of; and, as Nym would say,—"that is the humour of it." Bother anachronism, where the play itself is an anachronism. Did ever woman (Catherine of Russia unexcepted), imagine such a thing possible—to say probable would be to say too much? No—never. Falstaff in love! Quid tum?

Thophilus Quer.

To Sir Flamborough Head.

Macfarren's "Joseph."

THIS great work—greatest of its kind, beyond comparison, since Mendelssohn's Elijah—was performed, for the first time before a London audience, on Tuesday night, at the Royal Albert Hall. Mr Joseph Barnby and the Albert Hall Choral Society deserve much credit for the idea of bringing forward such a splendid example of English art; but they would have deserved still more had they devoted sufficient time to its preparation. Those who enjoyed the inestimable advantage of hearing the truly magnificent performance at Leeds, under the direction of Mr Walter Cecil Macfarren—unless they had perused the score, so as to become well acquainted with its manifold beauties—could hardly have believed that the Joseph before them was the Joseph which, three months ago, had transported them to the seventh heaven of delight.

"Is that you, Joe,
Old Joe?"

No, it am 'Punch'—"

—said the late Gilbert A'Beckett, twenty-nine years since. "No," indeed—a thousand times "No;" it was not our Yorkshire Joseph (Heaven bless those Yorkshire singers!), but quite another thing. Why, however, shirk the truth? The Royal Albert Hall, no matter what remedies may be devised, can never be made favourable to musical effect. As Coleridge says, in the Ancient Mariner:—

"Water here, water there,
And not a drop to drink!"

so may it be said of the Royal Albert Hall—

Echo here, echo there,
And not a sound to speak!

It must be added that a looser performance, take it for all in all, is almost without precedent—owing, in a large measure, as we have hinted, to insufficient preparation. Nevertheless, Joseph is still Joseph. It remains, and must ever remain, a masterpiece. At Exeter Hall the admirable Sir Michael Costa would have rendered it intelligible enough (no disparagement to Mr. Barnby); and at Exeter Hall, as the last great work of an illustrious Englishman, it should have first been heard in London. But what can we expect from the Sacred Harmonic Society, which all these years has left our own Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria out in the cold? That Joseph was heard with unmitigated pleasure, and its composer called for at the end, to be enthusiastically applauded, need hardly be said. But this is beside the question.

The leading singers were Mmes Lemmens-Sherrington, Patey, and Osgood; Sig. Foli, Messrs Edward Lloyd and Santley. Dr Stainer, of St Paul's, was at the organ—the right man at the right instrument (no euphemism intended).

Septimus Widd.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

MISS MINNIE HAUKE has concluded a successful tour in Holland under the direction of M. Strakosch. She was assisted by the violinist, Ole Bull, and Fr. Rummell, pianist. A previous starring engagement at Liège, Antwerp, Ghent, and Bruges, during which the operas were La Traviata, Il Barbiere, and Faust, also resulted in great triumphs for Miss Hauke, and crowded houses for the managers. Little Minnie Mignonette, now the spoiled child of the Brussels public, which at first snubbed her, has signed a second engagement for two months, on higher terms than previously, with the director of the "Monnaie." During this engagement she will sustain the following new characters: Carmen, Julie, Selika, Virginie, and Elsa. She has them all, the pretty "fogy," in her head and heart. Her eyes will do the rest.

THE sale of the Sax Collection was brought to a close on the 6th inst. The total realised was about twelve thousand francs. The principal lots fell to M. Gustave Chouquet for the Museum of the Conservatory, Paris (fifty-four instruments); to M. Mahillon, for the Museum of the Conservatory, Brussels (some fifty instruments); and to M. Charles Meerens, for the private collection of M. César Snoeck, at Renaix in Belgium (some thirty). The chief acquisition made for the Paris Conservatory is the collection of Saxophones is about 800 specimens. M. Meerens is preparing a catalogue, to be published next year.

ADELINA PATTI returns to the Scala, Milan, next March, after singing at the Paganini, Genoa; the Pergola, Florence; the Apollo, Rome; and, the San Carlo, Naples. Her success at Milan exceeded anticipation. (From a private letter.)

MR. CARL ROSA has returned to town. In consequence of the destruction by fire of the Worcester Theatre, the tour of his celebrated opera-company, now playing at Bolton, is shortened by a week. The London performances begin in February, at the Adelphi Theatre.

WE read, in some London and New York papers, that Adelina Patti has been a failure at Milan. That, it may be presumed, is the cause why she is engaged (at her own terms) in all the other important Italian cities, and, moreover, is to give ten more performances (at her own terms) in the capital of Lombardy (where she failed!) The truth is that Mme Patti's success has been extraordinary. How this world is given — &c.

MR. GEORGE OSBORNE, the eminent pianist and composer, has started for a tour in the East. His first destination is Palestine.

DISTURBANCES have been reported from Glasgow. We do not believe one word that has been written. Dr. Hans von Bülow is the least Atlantic of litterateurs. Read the letters to his friend "Mustard"—of the Leipzig Signale. They are pure Saxradian.

WHAT the Crystal Palace Concerts are to orchestral music, the Monday and Saturday Concerts are to the more modest branches of the art—the quartet, the sonata, the song. Their close in March marks the beginning of the musical interregnum, their opening in the dreary month of November the commencement of a more tuneful epoch. As to the unrivalled position of these concerts, not as regards London only, but England, and, we may safely add, Europe, nothing need be said now. Several enterprises have been started of late years, with the laudable object of popularizing the classical and modern masterpieces of chamber music; but none have attained a position at all equal to or even approaching the universal excellence of the Popular Concerts. As in former years, Mr. Chappell has engaged a brilliant array of artists.—Examiner.

MISS DORA SCHIRMACHER's début at the Monday Popular Concerts was a decided and well-merited success. We shall have more to say about it in our general notice of the pre-Christmas series. Mr Charles Hallé's return to the post he has occupied with such distinguished honour for eighteen years was hailed with enthusiasm. Mad. Norman-Néruda is still the Patti of violinists, and Piatti still the Patti of Piattis.

ERRATUM.—In a notice of the Grosvenor Gallery last week—for "Mr and Mrs Dorrell, so well-known and esteemed in the musical profession," read Mr and Miss Dorrell. With regard to Mrs Dorrell, we can only say that such a personage is at present in nubibus. Nevertheless, we may add, according to trustworthy information, that—Il (Dorrell) y pense.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

SIGNOR GUIDO PAPINI gave a matinée musicale on Wednesday, Dec. 12, at 28, Ashley Place, Victoria Street, by permission of Major Wallace Carpenter. The vocalists were Mdlles Lisa Perdi and Bauermeister (by permission of Colonel Mapleson), Mme Papini, and Mr William Shakespeare. The instrumentalists were Mr Stoëger (pianoforte), Signor Pezze (violoncello), and Signor Guido Papini (violin). Signor Papini—evidently a favourite with the "upper ten thousand"—played several of his own compositions: "Conte Oriental," a Ballata in B minor, the Andante and Finale from his Second Concerto, and the Romanza from the same work; as well as Bazzini's "Ronde des Lutins," Vieuxtemps' "Souvenir Caprice," and two movements of Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor (with Mr Stoëger and Signor Pezze). Mr Shakespeare sang "Ecco Ridente" (Barbiere di Siviglia) and a charming song by Mr Walter Austin, "Chi è;" Mdlle Lisa Perdi gave Gounod's "La Serenata" (violoncello obligato, Signor Pezze); Mdlle Bauermeister a song by Lord Dunmore, "Liebesgeständniss" ("Tell me truly"), accompanied by Signor de Rialp (pianoforte) and Signor Papini (violin); and Mme Papini some Variations by Paganini, on Paisiello's "Nel cor più." Mr Stoëger played some studies by Chopin and his own "Valse Brillante" in a way that showed him to be a pianist of the highest ability. Signor Alessandro Romili was accompanist. The room was crowded. More ought to be heard of Signor Papini, one of the most finished and accomplished of Italian artists.

MDME TALBOT CHERER, an "associate of the Royal Academy of Music," and a well-known and highly esteemed professor of singing, gave a "vocal recital" in the new concert room of the institution in Tenterden Street, on Tuesday evening, December 4th. The programme was, so to write, somewhat historical, beginning with Alessandro Stradella, and ending with Arthur Sullivan. As the curiosity of our readers may possibly be aroused by what they read, we will satisfy it by subjoining the list of compositions after the order in which they were given:—

PART I:—Song, "Let my entreaties!" Aria di chiesa (1667) (Stradella); Aria, "Vo solcando un mar crudele" (Leonardo da Vinci); Song, "My heart ever faithful" (Bach); Recit. and Air "If guiltless blood" (Susanna) (Handel); Aria, "Sen vola lo sparvier"—The Nightingale's Song—Admetus (Handel); "Ave Maria" (organ obligato, Mr C. W. Le Jeune) (Cherubini); Cavatina, "Nel cor più non mi sento" (Paisiello); PART II.—Cantata, "Mad Bess" (Purcell); Songs, "Would you taste the noontide air" (Comus), "Where the bee sucks" (Tempest), and "The Soldier tir'd" (Artaxerxes) (Dr Arne); Song, "By the simplicity of Venus' doves" (Bishop); Song, "The Abbess" (Henry Smart); Song, "The lost cherd" (Sullivan).

The endeavours of Mme Cherer to interest her audience (a large one) were crowned with success, and our readers will, we doubt not, agree with us that the talented projector richly deserved it. Not only does the musical research of Mme Cherer deserve to be recorded, but her musicianly style deserves the highest praise. Messrs Le Jeune assisted Mme Cherer by playing instrumental compositions (solo and in "combination"). Mr E. M. Lott was accompanist.

MR W. F. TAYLOR, organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church (St Mary's), Battersea, and well known by his vocal and instrumental compositions, gave his annual "parochial concert" in the Vicarage Room, Battersea, on Thursday evening, December 6th, under the patronage of the Rev. Canon J. Erskine Clarke (Vicar), the clergy of the district, churchwardens, members of Parliament, and leading parishioners. Notwithstanding the inclement weather, the room was well filled. Mr Taylor had the assistance of Mdlle Gilbert, Misses Stansfield, pupil of Mr Taylor (her first appearance), Kathleen Oscar-Byrne; Messrs J. Parry Cole, R.A.M., and Ernst Gaskin. Miss and Master Taylor (aged eleven and nine) played a duet for pianoforte and violin. Mr Gerard Coventry was announced to sing, but at the last moment sent a "medical excuse." The concert was satisfactory in every way. The singing of Mdlle Gilbert was highly appreciated. Misses Stansfield and Byrne were called upon to repeat Mr W. F. Taylor's song, "I loved in days gone by," and "Barney o' Hea;" and Mr J. Parry Cole, Mr W. F. Taylor's "Saucy Jane" and his own "Married Life." Not less successful was the instrumental portion of the concert. The performances of Miss and Master Taylor were greatly applauded; their duo, "March of the Men of Harlech," with variations for violin and piano, was unanimously encoored. Mr Taylor played with great skill Liszt's "Illustrations of the Prophet," earning a hearty re-call; and Mr Gaskin (a pupil of Mr Taylor's) did credit to his instructor. Several concerted pieces, by the principal vocalists, and part-songs by the choir of St Mary's, were well rendered, and a Christmas song and chorus, "The King of our Saxon Yule," must be specially praised. The accompanists of the vocal music were Messrs Dawre, Taylor, and J. Parry Cole.—A.B.

THE students of the London Academy of Music lately gave two sorées, under the direction of Professor Wyld, at St George's Hall. Among those whose progress was specially noticeable were Misses Kate Griffiths, Hutchinson, and Fuller, vocalists; and Miss E. Bonson, pianist. M. Marlois and Herr Lehmyer were the accompanists.

MR C. J. BISHENDEN'S concert was given, for the début of his pupil, Mr W. H. Nelson, at Langham Hall, on Tuesday evening, December 4. Mr Nelson possesses "any amount" of voice, but must work hard before he can obtain—what no doubt he aims at—a high position as a vocalist. He, of course, was well received, and called upon to repeat both his songs. Mr Bishenden assisted his pupil by singing "The Village Blacksmith," &c. Misses Guest, Britton, and Leigh were the other vocalists. Dr Bernhardt and Mr Mew played some duets for the pianoforte and harmonium. Mr Mew was conductor.

PROVINCIAL.

BRIGHTON.—The Guardian has the following:—"Miss Blanche Lucas has again entered upon a brief engagement at the Aquarium. She is a great favourite; her songs are not only exquisitely rendered, but they are varied and well selected; and the reception which she met with was not only most encouraging, but a well-merited tribute to a talented and rising young artist." Miss Lucas appeared each evening during the week, and also at the afternoon concerts (Wednesday and Saturday). Mr Vernon Rigby sang "The Thorn" and "Sound the alarm" in his best manner.

BRISTOL.—The Messiah was given in Colston Hall, on Thursday evening, November 29, and attracted an enormous audience. The chorus numbered about 300, assisted by an orchestra of nearly 40. The solo vocalists were Miss Julia Wigan, Miss Florence Wydford, Messrs Harper Kearton and Lawford Huxtable. Miss Julia Wigan, says The Daily Post, delighted every one. Her voice, rich and melodious, is enhanced by her refined and cultured style. This was manifested in the pure and elevated feeling with which she gave the recitative, "There were Shepherds," and again in the bravura air, "Rejoice greatly," rendered with an artistic finish that elicited loud applause. As an example of expression and vocal grace, we may instance her refined delivery of "Come unto Him," in which she again evoked the warmest applause. The conductor was Mr Stanley Hatton.

BANBURY.—One of the best concerts, writes The Guardian, we have had for some time was given in the Corn Exchange on Thursday evening, November 22, when Mr Phasey, the celebrated euphonium player, gave us an opportunity of hearing some singers new to Banbury. They were Mdme Ida Gillies Corri, Mdme Alice Barth, Mr Bernard Lane, and Mr Henry Corri. Mr Fountain Meen was the accompanist. The vocalists are members of the Crystal Palace Opera Company. The programme included Mozart's comic opera, The Impresario, and a miscellaneous selection. Mdme Alice Barth's song, "Tell me my heart," was remarkably good, and the demand for its repetition unanimous. Mdme Barth, however, gave "Cease your funning" instead. Mr Bernard Lane, sang Blumenthal's "The Message" exceedingly well; and Mr Phasey sustained his high reputation by a splendid performance on the euphonium of "O ruddier than the cherry," which was enthusiastically encoored.

VIENNA.—Oberthur's overture, Rübezahl, with which Ed. Strauss began his series of concerts at the Grand "Musikverein's Saal," has been repeated, and again met with a flattering reception. The work which, by the bye, is published in score and parts by Schott & Sons, at Mayence, has now been performed in most of the principal cities of the continent.

CONCERTS IN VIENNA.*

The banner and token of the present concert-season is still our lively remembrance of Herbeck. Up to the present moment, every important musical performance has been, over and above everything else, a memorial solemnity in honour of the Departed whom we love so well. Like the great Cid, who, when his corpse was set on horseback, won a battle after his death, Herbeck's shadow flits like a victorious hero before his faithful hosts. His spirit transformed the concert-room into a church, where the notabilities of musical art in Vienna performed there Mozart's Requiem for the great soul mourned by all. The programmes of the Society's Concerts are still those drawn up by Herbeck's hand—in them he still rules from the grave as "Artistic Director;" in the air from Graf von Gleichen, he arose before us as the discoverer of Schubertian relics; with his last orchestral work, the members of the Philharmonic paid homage to him as a composer; and of what we have lost in Herbeck, the conductor, we were reminded by the last performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony.

Herbeck's Symphony in D minor, performed at the second Philharmonic Concert, is the last work composed by him, and, as regards sterling merit and musical concentration, one of the most excellent things he ever wrote. In the first place, it strikes us by an innovation hitherto unknown:† the co-operation of the organ. The part for this instrument is obligato, and determines from the outset the character of the entire work. This notion of the organ was probably suggested by the large instrument in the hall of the Musical Association; once accepted, it must have exerted a seductive influence over one so fond as Herbeck was of new and choice musical effects. In his first Symphony (C major), he made a similar obligato use of the harp through all the four movements, not as Berlioz did, in the service of a definite poetic meaning, but for the sake of the brilliant effects of sound. Herbeck was attracted, in the first instance, by the harp, and in the second by the organ, as a source of acoustic impressions never before essayed in the symphonic style. Both instruments lead inexorably to non-symphonic bye-ways: the harp to the stage, and the organ to the church. A harp-symphony will, to a certain degree, sound Meyerbeerish, and an organ symphony, Bachish. Of the two somewhat strange guests, the latter is certainly the more noble and powerful; by its mere sound the organ imparting to every musical composition a deeply earnest and religious character. Herbeck had experienced, in the hall of the Musical Association, the grandiose and incomparable effect of the organ in completing the mass of sound in oratorio; but the idea of employing it in a symphony was a natural, while, at the same time, a new and dazzling idea. A happy idea, in my opinion, it is not. As an obligato orchestral instrument, the organ immediately clutches for itself the supremacy over everything else, and this supremacy is very hard to bear all through a symphony in four movements. The organ's mighty roar swallows up, like a greedy flame, all the other instruments. In addition to this acoustic despotism, the "King of Instruments" exercises æsthetic despotism: its ecclesiastical character permits of no secularization; it forbids the charming mobility, the change of mood, and the dramatic life, which we require from the modern symphony. The contrast of character in the four movements—that undisputed art-law of the symphony—is brought down by the organ to a minimum. Herbeck felt this drawback, and therefore allowed the organ to rest during the Scherzo. But, in consequence, the Scherzo differs palpably from the style of the other movements. Perhaps the composer would have done better had he entirely omitted the Scherzo (the least successful of all the four movements), and returned to the old form of the symphony in three movements. Prelude, Andante, and Finale would have constituted a far more homogeneous and less fatiguing whole. If Berlioz built up his "Symphonie Fantastique" in five movements, instead of the usual four, why should not another son of the present century venture for once upon the number three?

(To be continued.)

A STRAY THOUGHT.

There are feelings which never are told
By the wildest or tenderest word;
But our sighs all their passion unfold,
In our sobs all their anguish is heard.
Chains, never in life to be broken,
Tell the heart a close prisoner is;

SERIOUS AND BUFFO OPERA IN VIENNA.*

(Concluded from page 815.)

At the present moment, a new three-act operetta, Tivolini, der Bandit von Palermo—in the original, Le Pompon, by Charles Lecocq—is being performed with the best results. The immense success of Madame Angot has seduced the composer, besieged by managers on all sides, to wring from his industry more than his musical capabilities sanctioned, at least, in so short a time. Not one of his subsequent works attained the freshness of Madame Angot, though, at the same time, it must be confessed that no other was supported by so happily imagined and so skilfully conducted a libretto. Lecocq has exhibited no diminution of zeal and careful work in his later buffo operas, and, like the rest, Tivolini is to be recommended for its becoming tone and graceful realisation. Lecocq's praiseworthy efforts to refine buffo opera, and raise it to a higher artistic level, takes him near, perhaps too near, opéra-comique, properly so called. The short farcical story of Tivolini is filled by him with music to overflowing. The index contains nineteen musical scenes, many of which include three or four numbers, making up some thirty in all. This is a great deal too much for a buffo opera, in which we do not like to see so great a concession made to the music at the expense of the action and of the amusing dialogue. Of these numerous pieces, there is scarcely one of marked originality and thorough effectiveness, though we meet with much that is pleasing, joyous, and graceful. We would especially distinguish Piccolo's first couplets in G major; the chorus: "Ila le pompon, le pompon," in the first finale; Fioretta's romance: "Une Voix," in the second act; and lastly, the scene in court (chiefly effective through the acting). The funniest and most applauded number, the buffo trio: "Durchgebrannt," is composed by the Capellmeister, Herr Brandl. The opera has the advantage of being excellently performed. Knaack and Blasel provide admirably for those who like a laugh, while Mdlle Meyerhoff and Herr Rüdinger delight the lovers of graceful singing. Herr Rüdinger, the tenor, surprised us most agreeably by the good taste he displayed, especially in the first act; in the afterpart of the evening he was unfortunately compelled to force his small but pleasing voice. However, he is a valuable acquisition for the Carl-Theater in characters demanding a refined vocal style.

When we have acknowledged the becoming tone and appreciated a few pretty numbers, we have done all Le Pompon deserves; it does not possess the importance and value attributed to it by certain Paris papers. There is a journalistic party busily intent in France on praising its hero, Lecocq, to the clouds at the expense of Offenbach. For originality and freshness of talent, for wealth of melody, and for a spirit of rhythm, however, Lecocq is in no way to be compared with Offenbach. Consequently Offenbach's extraordinary gift of musical comicality is only to be found a hundred times diluted in Lecocq. Offenbach has repeated himself very unmistakably, and fallen off considerably; but even in his subsequent and less pretentious works, such as Margot (La Boulangerie), Madame l'Archiduc, &c., he still presents us with musical aperçus which would never have struck Lecocq, and comic scenes of which Lecocq would never have been capable. Offenbach possesses, at any rate, an original style, and a particular cachet of his own; we instantly recognize him in his own operas as well as in those of others. Lecocq owes the style he has cultivated so successfully to the example set by Offenbach, just as he owes him the commencement of his career. As founder of the Bouffes Parisiens, Offenbach offered a prize for the best setting of a one-act buffo opera, Le Docteur Mirabolan. No less than sixty-eight composers tried for it—a remarkable sign of musical fertility in France! The prize was obtained by Georges Bizet (the composer of Carmen) and Lecocq between them. Mirabolan was played on alternate evenings, first with Bizet's music and then with Lecocq's; but neither setting was especially successful. Since then (1867) Lecocq presented the public with numerous buffo operas, but only one, Fleur de Thé (performed as Theebülthe at the Carl Theater), proved anything like a hit. His first great success was achieved (in 1872) by his Cent Vierges, and the greatest of all by his Madame Angot, which was composed immediately afterward, and which ran in Paris for more than four hundred successive nights. Yet, while decidedly inferior to Offenbach in original and spirited invention, Lecocq enjoys one advantage over him, the richer store of resources derived from his musical education. Lecocq is a thoroughly trained musician; he gained in his time, at the Conservatory, the first prize for composition, and a second for organ playing. Such systematic schooling was beyond the reach of Offenbach, who was flung from out his struggles for daily bread into the most brilliant triumphs and the most exhausting exertions. A proof of such musical erudition as few composers of buffo operas could give, has just been furnished by Lecocq in his edition of Rameau's famous opera, Castor et Pollux. Rameau, to whom a monument has lately been erected in his native town, Dijon, was the first Frenchman who, carrying much further the work of the Italian, Lully, marked an epoch in the history of French grand opera. By his original system of harmony, by his operas, and, lastly, by the considerable influence he exercised on Gluck's style, he occupies a very important position in the estimation of every musician. The more deeply, therefore, do we feel the inaccessibility of his scores. Even of his most celebrated and best opera, Castor et Pollux (1737) there is only one engraved score in existence, and that has become a very great rarity. The manuscript scores vary exceedingly from each other, and there are no pianoforte arrangements at all. Lecocq has devoted the leisure hours of several years to preparing a faithful and complete pianoforte score of the work with the text, and this has just been published in a handsome and convenient form by Legoux of Paris. Beyond, as well as within the borders of France, this conscientious work will be joyfully welcomed; though it will hardly attain such widespread popularity as Madame Angot, it will, in its way, do M. Lecocq no less honour.

WAIIFS.

Mr Carl Rosa and his company have been playing this week, with their accustomed success, at Bolton. All lovers of English opera look anxiously for their return to London, and their opening performance at the Adelphi Theatre.

Many besides musicians are partial to a bar's rest.

Mrs Osgood is expected back in America next spring.

The Teatro Alfieri at Genoa has been destroyed by fire.

La Statue and Gilles de Bretagne are in active rehearsal at the Théâtre-Lyrique.

Liszt is at Pesth, where he will pass the winter. (Hope it won't be cold.—D. P.)

M. Louis Ketten is nominated professor of singing in the Conservatory of Geneva.

Herr Abert, Royal Capellmeister, Stuttgart, has completed a new five-act opera, Ekkehard.

The death is announced of M. Ch. Desolme, founder, and formerly editor, of L'Europe Artiste.

Herr Martin Röder has been appointed permanent director of the Società del Quartetto, Milan.

Bathylle, by M. W. Chaumet, will be revived at the Paris Opéra-Comique before the end of the month.

Mdlle Bilbaut-Vauchelet has made her début at the Paris Opéra-Comique as Isabella in Le Pré aux Clercs.

Mdlle Mendes makes her début at the Paris Opéra-Comique in Un Jour de noces, by MM. Sardou and Doffès.

The new Politeama Ariosto, to be inaugurated in May, at Reggio (Emilia), will accommodate 2,000 spectators.

Sig. Jacovacci has engaged Adelina Patti for a series of performances at the Teatro Apollo, Rome, in February.

Mdlle Grandjean, who discovered Herr Theodor Wachtel, and was singing mistress in Hamburg, has died in a hospital.

After a two months' concert tour in Belgium and Holland, Rubinstein revisits Paris to superintend the production of his Nero.

Paisiello's Barbiere di Siviglia has been revived at the Teatro Vittorio Emanuele, Ancona. The work has not been often performed since Rossini reset the libretto (1812).

There is a report that Mdlle Rita Sangalli will take advantage of her leave of absence from the Grand Opera, Paris, to appear during the Carneval at the Teatro Comunale, Trieste.

Exactly one hundred years will have elapsed on the 3rd August, 1878, since the Teatro alla Scala, Milan, was opened, the opera on the first night being Salieri's Europa riconosciuta.

Camillo Sivori, Lauro Rossi, Antonio Bazzini, and Antonio Cagnoni, are created honorary members of the Academy of St Cecilia at Rome. (Interesting news and startling!—D. P.)

* From the Neue Freie Presse.

Herr Wilhelm Ronnenburger, Royal Prussian Chamber-Musician, has just celebrated his fiftieth professional anniversary. In honour of the event the Emperor Wilhelm conferred on him the title of Royal Prussian Concertmeister.

Mr Frances Howell's new cantata, The Song of the Months, is to be given, for the first time, at Sevenoaks, next Wednesday evening. The soprano and tenor parts are entrusted to Miss Ellen Horne, and Mr Albert James. Mr Howell will conduct.

Cimarosa's Il Matrimonio Segreto, with Mr Grist's new version of the words, was given at the Crystal Palace on Wednesday. The cast included Mme Cave-Ashton, Mme Alice Barth, Miss Florence St John, Messrs Bernard Lane, George Fox, and R. Temple. The well-known trio, "My Lady the Countess," was encored, and the opera is announced for repetition on Monday next.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grist, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.
